The article was written by Mr. Robert Morris, who was counsel to the minority subcommittee members.

In view of the position Mr. Morris held, and in view of the importance of the subject matter, I ask unanimous consent for insertion of Mr. Morris' article in the Appendix of the RECORD. The article comes within the rule, and involves no extra expense.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

COUNSEL FOR THE MINORITY—A REPORT ON THE TYDINGS INVESTIGATION

(By Robert Morris)

In April of this year, on the recommendation of Senators HICKENLOOPER and LODGE, minority members of the Tydings subcommittee, I was appointed their minority counsel. This subcommittee had been set up by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to determine whether or not persons disloyal to the United States were or ever had been employed by the State Department. It had been sparked by Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY'S charges that such disloyal persons were still in the Department.

The subcommittee began its work under distressing circumstances. In less than a decade the Soviet Union had expanded from 160,000,000 people to a mighty empire embracing almost a billion. Soviet expansion had been accomplished under circumstances reflecting either great incompetence on our part or downright subversion in top places. From the absorption of the Baltic countries through Poland, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and right down to China, at the very times when resistance should have been strongest, figures high in our Government, with tortuous reasoning and bland sophistry, had advocated appeasement. The intensity of these blandishments seemed to have been highest at the time any particular country was being absorbed.

When the Soviet Empire had swallowed its victim, our Government experts would denounce communism in the abstract, then help pave the way for the next act of Soviet aggression. Alger Hiss, once high in our State Department and an architect of our foreign policy, had been convicted. The first in a long list of atomic spies were beginning to be uncovered. George Wheeler, who had been high in our denazification work in Germany, had taken off his mask and gone behind the iron curtain. Rumors were rampant, and suspicions were running high.

Now an arm of the Soviet Empire was ready to start war in Korea. The country currently being absorbed by the Soviet Union was China. Anti-Communist China still held a seat in the Security Council of the United Nations, had an army of 500,000 on Formosa, and a tremendous guerrilla force on the continent that was impeding the Sovietization of China. Chiang Kai-shek was presented as an emigre reactionary, and the Chinese Communists as democrats and liberals who should have our support lest, as Owen Lattimore suggested, they gravitate toward the Soviet Union. People high in the State Department wanted these full-fledged members of the Soviet International recognized and admitted to the United Nations.

Senator MCCARTHY, chafing at this turn of events, had brought certain anonymous charges that at least 81 (and there was a great conflict in figures) State Department employees were Communists or followers of the Communist Party line. When forced by the majority on the subcommittee to name names, he identified about eight. The charge in almost all cases was that the persons were "pro-Communist," and nothing more. However, he called one man "a top Soviet agent." A well-known radio commentator identified this man as Owen Lattimore.

Such was the situation when I first took part in the hearings in Washington. The flow of events, stirred by Senator MCCARTHY, determined that the first witness should be Louis F. Budenz, former editor of the Daily Worker and former member of the National Committee of the Communist Party, who had not only abjured communism but had proved his sincerity by aiding the Government in the prosecution of the 11 Communist leaders. Budenz' testimony had initiated the Gerhardt Eisler proceedings; he had been the principal witness against John Santo, the Hungarian Communist; had aided the Government in seven other important cases. He had devotedly given many hours a week to the Federal Bureau of Investigation without ever having been shown in error. He had been vouched for by John McGohey, who was the prosecutor of the 11 top Communists at Foley Square and by President Cavanaugh of Notre Dame University, where he had taught after he first left the Communist Party.

Budenz testified to four instances that supported his conclusion that Owen Lattimore was a Communist agent. Lattimore had been a well-known expert on the Far East; an employee of the State Department on the Pauley Mission to Japan; a consultant to the Secretary of State. Though not on the State Department payroll, he had also held such high quasi-State Department assignments as political adviser to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, recommended by the President of the United States at a critical time in our history (December 7, 1941); political adviser to Henry Wallace on his mission to Siberia and China; head of a United Nations mission to Afghanistan; director of the Pacific Division of the Office of War Information during World War II.

Probably the strongest of the four instances was Budenz' testimony that in 1944 when he was editor of the Daily Worker, Jack Stachel, director of Communist propaganda, had warned him (and the warning was repeated by the party chairman, William Z. Foster) that Lattimore was doing important and secret work in the party and that Budenz should strive to conceal Lattimore's party affiliation in the Communist press. This was not a loose example of hearsay. Communist leaders do not talk lightly or with gossip aforethought under such circumstances.

Budenz cited three other such incidents and in addition asserted that in the secret listing and reference to high party members in the minutes of the National Committee Lattimore was always referred to as "X" and "XL" for purposes of concealment.

The reaction to this testimony was curious. When Budenz stated that he had evidence on other State Department employees and other individuals who had a role in shaping our far eastern policy, he was at once taken off the public stand and next heard in secret session. Barred from this next session were not only myself, though I was counsel in effect to Senators HICKENLOOPER and LODGE, but Senator MCCARTHY, on whom Senator TYDINGS and the whole Democratic administration put the burden to prove the charges. Furthermore Senator TYDINGS, until Senator MCCARTHY protested vehemently, allowed Lattimore and his attorney to remain. At this session Budenz named a present point 4 program State Department official, Haldore Hansen, and a State Department consultant, Lawrence K. Rossinger, as members of the Communist Party. He also listed as members of the Communist Party a long series of "experts" on the Far East that readers would do well to learn by securing from the Foreign Relations Committee a copy of the testimony of the proceedings.

The attitude of the Tydings subcommittee and the Democratic administration toward Budenz's testimony was shameful. The cross-examination of Budenz was hostile, intense, and wearing. It was done by the general counsel, Senator GREEN, and by Abe Fortas, Lattimore's counsel, who acted through the general counsel. A high point in calumny was reached when Lattimore introduced into evidence a sealed copy of the transcript of the Santo deportation proceedings at which Budenz had been the principal Government witness. It included a record of what the Communists through their attorney, Harry Sacher, had thrown at Budenz in that hearing. The immigration authorities, sensing its vileness, had decreed that only one copy be made, a fact that was verified in writing by the district director of immigration in New York, who asserted that this one copy had been given to Sacher in the event he had to use it on appeal. Santo never appealed; he voluntarily went behind the iron curtain. But Lattimore received (obviously from Sacher) that one copy of the transcript.

Then, surprisingly, Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ, Democrat, of New Mexico, revealed its contents on the Senate floor, even though it was sealed and the contents were never made known to Senators HICKENLOOPER and LODGE or myself. Senator TYDINGS, as chairman of the subcommittee, and Senator LUCAS, as Democratic floor leader, officially joined CHAVEZ in this attack. It was but one of many instances pointing to a secret liaison between the Communists, Lattimore, the subcommittee, and the Democratic administration. What was the purpose of this attack on Budenz and what was its effect? From where I operated in lining up a list of witnesses, mostly ex-Communists who were able to confirm the Budenz testimony about the point at issue, it served notice on such people that if they came forward and testified against a Communist in Government, they would be smeared and reviled on the Senate floor. Every ex-Communist has something to hide, and every one of the witnesses wilted in the face of it. It was a shrewd and effective move by Senator TYDINGS.

Despite this threat of pillory, there were witnesses who to the very end were willing to come forward. Senator HICKENLOOPER put on the record the fact that we had a list of 25 to 30 witnesses who would testify on vital points in the investigation. Eugene Lyons, writing in the New Leader, has brought out what Alexander Barmine, formerly a brigadier general in Soviet intelligence, would have testified about Lattimore. But Senator TYDINGS steadfastly refused to call these witnesses and reproved me for suggesting that their testimony was important and that they should be heard. Senator MCCARTHY, on whom the whole burden of proof was thrust, was attacked in the vituperative majority report.

Freda Utley, who had been called to analyze Lattimore's writings, got along well enough with the committee until she commenced to draw the parallel between Lattimore's ideas and the Communist Party line. She was thereafter rudely treated and subjected to long interrogation on her personal income and many details unrelated to the inquiry.

The only other witness of importance to be called was Frank B. Bielaski, a high official of the Office of Strategic Services. Because his testimony offered concrete and irrefutable proof that thousands of highly classified Government documents were being systematically stolen, photostated and photographed by a ring operating within the Government, it was made secretly and in camera. Documents when apprehended clearly showed that a ring still in the Department of State was linked in a conspiracy to vilify and undermine Chiang Kai-shek and the accredited Chinese Government and to exalt and strengthen the Chinese Communists. This was the real significance of the Amerasia case, which had never been investigated in spite of insistent minority pressure.

The secondary aspect of the Amerasia case, in my opinion, revolved about who was able to connive so successfully that Government employees who had turned over secret documents to the magazine, could go completely free. Philip J. Jaffe, Amerasia's wealthy editor, had been fined an insignificant amount. Even though the Justice Department and Senator TYDINGS labeled the documents teacup gossip, they contained such items as a highly confidential forecast of the Japanese war, giving secret strategic plans, the location of American submarines and the United States postwar treatment of the Japanese Emperor; the entire counterintelligence plan of naval intelligence; a top secret for eyes only message (the highest military classification I know) from President Roosevelt to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek; future military plans of the United States; future battle plans, attack routes of the Chinese Army against the Chinese Communists; many of Angus Ward's confidential reports on the situation within the Soviet Union (and they were almost the only realistic and non pro-Communist State Department records in the Amerasia papers) and many other documents so highly important that if you read of them in a dime thriller you would call them fantastic.

The subcommittee's rejoinder to this secret testimony was to call, many of them publicly, a long list of apologists for the Government's failure to prosecute. The more they testified, the more implausible and disgraceful the case appeared. In short, the crucially significant Amerasia case was never seriously investigated. Owen Lattimore was one of the original editors of Amerasia.

Senator MCCARTHY tried in vain to get the committee to look into 81 other cases. A Federal grand jury meanwhile had indicted William Remington, 1 of the 81. Senator MCCARTHY read on the Senate floor a classified Government report, anonymously as was his practice, on a present State Department employee, Edward George Posniak, whom a special agent of the FBI, who had infiltrated the Communist Party, had met and known in the Communist movement. To those who have worked in intelligence this is the most direct evidence you can expect to get. Yet Posniak, another of Senator MCCARTHY's 81 cases, was cleared by the Democratic members of the subcommittee.

In the case of John S. Service, who has just been cleared again by the State Department, the FBI testified that while he was under their surveillance they had had a microphone installed in Philip Jaffe's hotel room, and had made a record of Service saying to Jaffe, "What I said about the military plans is of course very secret." Even though the FBI showed that Jaffe was in constant liaison with the Soviet Embassy, Earl Browder, and Chinese Communist leaders, Service's explanation that he had been briefing a reputable newspaperman was accepted by the subcommittee. Senator LODGE pointed out very logically that it is not the practice of State Department officials to search out newspapermen in clandestine session and transmit secret military plans. As if this weren't enough, we introduced into the record Service's writings which invariably had praised the Chinese Communists and vilified Chiang and those Chinese leaders who were trying to hold off the Sovietization of their country. We also showed that he had a long list of associations with people whom various congressional committees had shown to be Communists and Soviet agents. And yet, when Senator MCCARTHY just called him pro-Communist, Service was one of our highest Foreign Service officials in India.

In connection with one of the present deputies to the administration of the ECA, Theodore Geiger, once a State Department employee, I sought in vain to present several witnesses who were prepared to testify (one had testified before the Rapp-Coudert legislative committee in New York in 1941) that they were in the same Communist unit as this high official. Although Geiger handles secret material today, the chairman flatly asserted that we could not waste our afternoon going into this case.

But by far the most serious delinquency of the subcommittee was its steadfast refusal to look into the nature of the Institute of Pacific Relations. It was serious because Budenz had testified (and others were prepared to do so) that this very influential organization during a particularly strategic period had been controlled by the Communists. Its executive secretary was Frederick Vanderbilt Field, who was later to become a foreign editor of the Daily Worker and who recently registered as an agent for the Chinese Communists. Its nominating committee, which reflects the real control, had Field, Lattimore, and Harriett L. Moore as three out of four members. Budenz stated that he had met Miss Moore as a Communist.

The leaders of the Institute of Pacific Relations at that time are now leaders in shaping our far eastern policy. Closely associated with the institute until 1946 was Philip C. Jessup, Ambassador at Large, whom the President sent on an official mission to Asia this year, and who has been almost top man in handling our far eastern negotiations. In fairness to Dr. Jessup, as well as to those countless millions who are uneasy about our far eastern policy, the subcommittee should have determined to what extent, if any, the Communists who controlled the institute were able to influence Dr. Jessup and other leaders.

Such were only a few of the facts uncovered by the hearings. They are disturbing enough. But when we are at war with the very force that may now be subverting our State Department, it seems shameful that an opportunity to explore once and for all, thoroughly and with sincerity, the underlying facts, should have been neglected and even thwarted. The Tydings subcommittee did not do its job. The FBI can collect the facts, but someone has to bring them out.

Acheson and the State Department Prepared the Way for the Present Disaster in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted, there is printed herewith the broadcast made by radio commentator Fulton Lewis, Jr., on Tuesday evening, November 28, 1950:

Well, this is black Tuesday, indeed, so far as the Korean situation is concerned and with developments tumbling over themselves we'll have to postpone continuation of the school textbook discussion, I'm afraid, for tonight at least.

The break-through by the Chinese Communist armies along the North Korean military front, is still completely unrepaired tonight, and hordes of Chinese Communist troops are pouring through, virtually unchallenged except on their flanks, in a threatened disaster which could, admittedly, trap the entire United Nations force in

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Korea. Officials here admit that the situation is extremely serious, if not actually critical. Two South Korean divisions at the center of the line have disintegrated to such an extent that they apparently have vanished in thin air. The whole picture is so fluid and so changing that even the field commanders there on the scene apparently do not know what is going on. Orders have gone out to hold existing lines at all costs, but no one knows a. any given hour what the next hour may bring. And here in Washington there is grave tension, deep indignation and a universal demand for immediate and effective action without the slightest prospect of any such action coming.

As of this morning, President Truman apparently was completely uninformed on the whole business. A White House spokesman said that whatever action the State Department takes will be with the knowledge and approval of the President. Later in the day he did call a meeting of his security advisory council, together with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and conferred with them for an hour and 15 minutes.

For General MacArthur and the men who face the grim realities of possible annihilation in the frozen mountain areas of North Korea, something more effective than talk is necessary. There has been talk for a long time. The business of running a military action from the debating tables of the United Nations organization already has reaped its whirlwind, and it's a whirlwind of death, tragedy, and despair.

In administration circles, embarrassed politicians tried to maneuver the blame to the shoulders of General MacArthur, for the reported statement about the men in Korea getting home for Christmas. The Army's Public Relations Chief, Gen. Floyd Parks, said he does not believe General MacArthur made the statement. It will be noted that in none of the dispatches was the item in quotation marks.

My good colleague Raymond Henle, of the Three Star Extra news program, did a more specific and constructive job of reporting on that subject by sending General MacArthur a cablegram, asking the specific question: Did he make such a statement? He read over his program a few moments ago the following telegram, received in reply:

"In reply to question contained in your cable of November 28, apparently greatly exaggerated statements have been attributed to some informal comment passed between my field commanders and myself in a jocular vein, expressive of the universal hope for an early termination of hostilities. The evident physical impossibility of fulfillment of the statement attributed to me should be its own best refutation. At no time have I ever attempted to predict the course or termination of this or any other military campaign. Signed, MacArthur."

Secretary of State Dean Acheson, grim, as well he might be because he sowed the seeds for this bitter harvest, went before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee this morning and this afternoon in closed sessions, for a report on the whole evil picture in Europe as well as the Far East.

The chairman of that committee is Senator TOM CONNALLY, of Texas, 73-year-old choreman of the State Department in general and Secretary Acheson in particular in the Senate. He had little to tell newsmen about what went on when the session was over, but from other members of the committee, I learned the following:

Mr. Acheson, to use the words of one Senator, was nervous as a cat on a tin roof. He was asked what General MacArthur was referring to in his statement of this morning, when he said that conduct of the "new war" would require further instructions and authority from the United Nations organization.

He said the State Department is looking into that and making a study of it.

It was suggested that it could only mean one of several things; for one, additional authority for the United Nations forces to carry strategic bombing to the Chinese Communists in Manchuria and attack supply and troops concentrations and transportation lines; is that what it meant?

Mr. Acheson said possibly it is. That such a possibility is being discussed by the Department.

Did it mean, perhaps, an authorization for the Nationalist armies of Chiang Kai-shek to be permitted to carry an attack to the mainland of China, and thus create a diversionary action which would give us an ally in the Far East? Or could it mean a suggestion along the same lines with some other Nationalist leader?

Those, said Mr. Acheson, were military matters which are being considered and discussed in the proper circles.

In fact, everything was being discussed. There was no new information or decision on anything—although the clear implication of the White House statement this morning was that Mr. Acheson was the person who would make decisions, with the knowledge and approval of the President. Apparently, the only positive statement Mr. Acheson was willing to make was that he knows "damn well" that Russia is the real force behind the Chinese Communist aggression. He has found that out. That is not the song that he and his State Department advisers have been singing in the past. For 9 years they have been telling themselves, you, the American people, and the world at large that there was no connection between the Chinese Communists and the Russian Communists; that these were just innocent peasants, not real Commuists at all; this was just an agrarian reform. He and his little coterie of pink intellectuals spent years in building State Department policy and American public opinion to support the theory that these were the leaders of China whom we should support.

Mr. Acheson helped build up and defend the pro-Communists whom Gen. Patrick J. Hurley sent home from China, for being just that. He wrote the instructions for special Ambassador George C. Marshall, and sent Marshall to China to try to force Chiang Kai-shek to take the Communists into his government on a fifty-fifty basis. He sent out the memorandum to foreign service officers all over the world, to begin to prepare and condition diplomatic minds for us to let Formosa go to the Chinese Communists by default. He and his young men forbade the American military mission to South Korea to do anything more than train the South Koreans to be defensive policemen, the avowed reason for that being that they might possibly attack the North Korean Communists. For that reason they could not be trained in the use of tanks, airplanes, heavy artillery, or even in any form of offensive military tactics.

He and his group insisted that the United Nations forces be held up at the thirty-eighth parallel for more than a week until the United Nations could, at its leisure, grant General MacArthur official authority to go beyond that point—a fact that gave the North Koreans an opportunity to regroup their forces, and provide new and costly resistance when the authority finally came.

All of those things are matters of actual record—not hearsay, not rumor; but record. And it is he and his advisers who dictate, at this minute, that the American forces must not fight the war as it has to be fought—with the bombing of strategic targets behind the enemy lines to paralyze their supplies and their reserves. That must be done by the United Nations organization, and the United Nations organization was busy today, listening to the 9 delegates from the Communist Government of China parroting the charges of the Kremlin that we are guilty of aggression in Formosa. Those delegates refused to answer any questions about Korea, and by way of assisting them, the Soviet representatives there on the security council spent the entire day in clear filibustering tactics, delaying in every way, any showdown on a resoluion to demand that the Chinese Communists withdraw their armies from North Korea. Even when the vote comes, it will be vetoed by Soviet Russia, and then must go—in the processes of Mr. Acheson's polite diplomacy—to the General Assembly in the hope that the General Assembly will override the veto. Even then, General MacArthur has no authority. Even then, all that happens is that the demand is put up to the Chinese Communist Government. It may be days before there is any answer. If an answer comes, the whole routine has to be gone through all over again in order to get passage of the authorization—and that, when every hour, every minute, counts for 100,000 American boys in the icy mountains of North Korea.

Now, prepare for a shock. From San Francisco today, 12 American mothers of marines who are fighting it out with death in Korea, sent a telegram to President Truman. It was not an appeal to get their sons home. Nothing so selfish—or so human as that. This telegram—listen carefully—was to protest against the loading of 750 tons of rubber tires on the docks of San Francisco for delivery to the Communist government of China to transport further misery and possibly death to the boys they brought into the world, nursed, cared for, and raised to manhood.

Even as this disaster is stalking our blood on the other side of the world, the provisions of this Washington Government—as administered by Mr. Acheson and his aides, with the consent and approval of Mr. Truman—is permitting the loading of a ship with 750 tons of tires for the murderers of a godless and ruthless gang of international murderers who, as of tonight, are being represented by nine of their kind, as we argue with them at Lake Success.

Reporters of the San Francisco Examiner, to whom I talked a short while ago, say the customs officials there insisted that before the tires could be loaded, they must be slashed across the tread with a knife. That makes them eligible for shipment. The reporters informed me that they had seen the tires and there was no evidence, to them, that they had been made unusable.

Furthermore, it develops that this is only part of the tire shipment. There are several hundred more tons waiting shipment on the piers of the Facific Transport Lines, they reported.

In Congress there is persistent talk that if President Truman does not act immediately to get rid of Mr. Acheson and everyone in the Department responsible for the present tragic situation, Congress itself will act.

The most probable action seems to be a resolution of "No confidence" in the Secretary of State and his present administration of that Department. Demands for some such action already are beginning to creep in on individual Members of the Senate, and for that matter, probably are beginning to reach the White House—demands that the President clean up the State Department at once.

As those demands grow, so will grow the solution of the present debacle. As public opinion mounts up, demanding at long last that there be a cleanup of the State Department—that the little gang of pro-Communists there, who have been protected and coddled and defended and covered up, be swept out from top to bottom—then will grow the flames that will produce the action by Congress, or perhaps, some action by Mr. Truman. Dismissal of Mr. Acheson is, of course, no solution at all. His successor would be merely the same prisoner of the same forces that have brought us to the present disaster. It must be a complete cleanout.

They said, these men who still sit in control and push the buttons that have brought tragedy and despair and death—they said, these were just peasants—just agrarian reformers. These had no connection with Soviet Russia; just agrarians. Well, Mr. Acheson's agrarians in China are doing some planting today. They are planting American boys.

Address by Hon. Edna F. Kelly, of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LOUIS B. HELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, on October 21, 1950, at the St. George Hotel in Brooklyn, N. Y., the Ancient Order of Hibernians for the first time in its history held its annual dinner in honor of a woman, my distinguished colleague the Honorable EDNA F. KELLY. It was a grand and deserved tribute to Brooklyn's first Congresswoman, who has made her mark as a Member of the House of Representatives.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, permit me to include my colleague's learned and interesting speech before more than 1,000 people who were assembled to pay tribute to her. It follows:

Mr. Chairman, Very Reverend Monsignor McGowen, Father Curran, officers of Ancient Order of Hibernians, members and friends before giving voice to any other expressions this evening, I must tell you, and from the bottom of my heart, how appreciative I am of the great distinction conferred upon me by the ancient order, not only in inviting me to break bread with you, but principally in choosing me as the first woman ever to be accorded the privilege of addressing you at this historical annual function. I want to thank the previous speakers, including the good fathers, for their kind words. I only hope and pray that I can live up to their tributes.

Please bear with me for following the written word. This method insures that I will not detain you beyond your endurance, and gives little sufferance to possible misunderstanding.

While I am keenly aware of the fact that the ancient order must have stretched its charity in selecting me for this tribute, I confess to feeling that it is high time some such honor was paid to us women, for, after all, we have played a part in the foundation of the order and the steady replenishment of its membership, at least in the natal stages. It is wholly and solely in this representative capacity and mood that I have assumed the courage to come forward before you this evening, to share the prominence of this dais with the distinguished persons on it. The honor is unique in that my name will be forever associated with it in the annals of the order; and, to that extent, I am truly personally grateful.

That I stand here graced with the name of Kelly is a privilege I owe to my widowhood. I bear it before you tonight, and ever in my heart in serene and happy memory of a great and a good man, a credit to his Irish ancestry, and an American of Americans. How proud my motherhood that through it I pass on to my son and daughter, not only the name of Kelly, but also the image and likeness of a father who added his personal luster to the name. Had I not the name of Kelly, the name of Flannery, which is my birthright, would bring back in sweet memory the gentle saint, that lover of God and of all his nature, who was my father. Nor would my mother, who is so proud and delighted because of my presence here, want me to omit that she is a McCarthy of the McCarthys, of Bandon, and linked to many more of the grand old folk of Cork and Mayo.

But, of what shall I speak to you tonight that is more germane to our immediate interests in the celebration of such an evening as this? Shall I iterate the path of Irish history and call to mind the Kings of Tara's Hall, or Brian Boru and the Battle of Clontarf? Shall we talk of the book of Kells, the cells of the monks, and the learning of the scholars of old? A prayerful tribute could be paid to the memory of Patrick, Bridget, Malachy, and many more. All this could we do. Or shall we dwell upon the sweetness of the land of Ireland, the brilliance of her emerald cloak, the stark beauty of the isles, the sad splendor of the gloaming upon her evening hills, the lilt of her gay little rivers and the peaceful stillness of her lakes, the rugged coasts, and the ever-sounding seas about her? Or listen to her poets, her philosophers, her scholars, her men and women of wit and charm, her bards and her minstrels? Or tell anew the myths and the fancies, the tales and the come-all-ye's, the annals of olden times, and rhapsodies of the blind walkers of the roads? Or glory in the tenacity which preserved the faith of our fathers, the holiness of martyred priest and nun, or saint, and humble laborer? And might we not join in spirit with the pilgrims wending their way to Mellray and Knock and Croagh Patrick?

How wonderful even to mention these things, and how compelling is the desire to ponder upon them. But I perceive my lack of talent for giving them their true and worthiest expression. My safest course is to tell you that I possess these beloved thoughts. They are part of my being, as they are part of yours. How better our lives, how nobler our natures, for cherishing them. Thank God we have them.

Let us not think for a moment that our riches are those of memory only. The treasury of Ireland has been indeed heavily drawn upon for the endowment of western civilization. It will never be forgotten that when darkness engulfed the minds and hearts of men, and the lamps of learning were blown out by the fierce winds of barbarian invasion and shattered by ignorance, the only light, besides the beacon of the holy faith, that the eyes of man could see and finally take bearings by was the single strong flame which was nourished and kept aline on that little green isle set in the vastness of the ocean waters. So powerful was this flame, and zealous its monastic guardians, that no assault could cause it to flicker or sink, and it burns today in every achievement of the Western World that is good and true and beautiful, and it casts its challenging brilliance even upon the far-flung steppes and tundras of Russia; its warmth is felt in a body politic shuddering in terror of the cold clammy rigor of spiritual death. And it will burn forever, because it was fed with the oil of truth and kindled with the breath of belief in God, His justice, His wisdom, His mercy, and His love.

His Holiness may be without battalions in arms, but he has the imperishable faith, hope, and zeal of his sons and daughters.

Now, since my reference to the papal armaments is an obvious allusion to the contemptuous utterance of the Red dictator, let me say here that the boasted monolith of atheistic communism, now seen as a base for Stalinist imperialism, is naught but fast-splintering shale or rotting sandstone. The true, the only, the eternal monolith is the rock called Peter. Stalin knows it; the whole Politburo knows it; every Soviet mouthpiece knows it; for its solidity and changelessness they hate and fear it. Pray God, the Russian people, under Our Lady, may again come to know its eternal truth.

There is one promise that cannot be written off with the atom bomb or the hydrogen bomb, or any other destructive force or agent conceivable by human ingenuity, and that is the promise: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My word shall not pass away." If Stalin can liquidate that promise, let us concede him the victory here and now, and set about being the subhuman zombies he seeks to reduce us all to for the service of his power-lust and for the maintenance of his new classes of Soviet princelings. But he can never banish that promise, because it was made by the Creator and the Creator is ever greater than the thing created.

What other thoughts and concerns have we in common, we who find ourselves together tonight at a Hibernian feast? We could dwell upon the priceless substantial contributions that the Irish have brought to these shores of our beloved America and the part they have played in every field of endeavor which has been for the development and permanence of this great Nation. Irish names come to mind from every decade of our history and from every quarter of the land—and from every bit of hallowed ground, far-flung throughout the world, wherein rest the bodies of our heroic American dead. Here may I not pause to ask, and I am the mother of a son of military age and of a daughter who loves him, what American mother or sister of Irish blood, knowing what the Irish owe to this country and have in its security, has failed to say to son or brother, "Go forth to battle with your shield, and come back with it, or upon it"?

We are Americans, first, last, and always. This is our own, our native land. Our loyalty to it has never been questioned. The Nation and the world know where we stand—and we stand there immovable.

As a Member of Congress, my first consideration and my desire is the good of my country, above all other things, having in mind the dictates of my conscience and the wishes of my constituents. As a human being, and preeminently as an American, it is also my desire that truth and justice shall prevail among all men everywhere, that their rights and dignity be respected as a divine imperative, that they have the greatest freedom possible to establish the seeds of good that are within them. These desires, I grant you, struggle for realization in a most complex and disordered world society. Morally and spiritually, I will continue true to them to the best of my ability before God. Intellectually and practically, I recognize my limitations in the face of the vast array of problems that are thrust before me and every other Member of Congress, problems complicated by the wishes of those who would have us decide in favor of this or that side of a question, often on the basis of an intense ex parte interest or partisan affinity. The internal affairs of the Commonwealth of Australia are not the proper subject of inquiry by our Government in the ordinary course of events. If the people of Portugal want or will tolerate a corporative form of state, that is their concern. If England favors constitutional monarchy, that is the Englishman's free choice. It is no business of ours, in fact or theory, to foist our notions of self-rule upon any other nation. While we, as Americans, Americans with a tradition of freedom postered and magnified by our Irish antecedents, would like to see all the people of Ireland free and united in one nation indivisible, such as our own, we have no right to prescribe or direct that economy for them. Nor does international law warrant our intruding. But let no one attempt to persuade us not to work and pray for the unification of Ireland, for that is our individual right as free members of a free community. In keeping with my rights, and because of my personal view of the matter, I gave evidence of my stand on the Irish partition situation by standing up in the House of Representatives on March 29, 1950, on a division vote, and casting my vote in favor of the Fogarty amendment, which was adopted, with 99 for and 66 against; then on March 31, 1950, again on a division vote, I was one of the 60 for the same amendment—against 220—when it was defeated.

Now, coming to the latter end of my remarks, and I cordially thank you for the indulgence with which you have heard me until this point, I would like to state that never in the history of the world have men and women of good will so earnestly and so pitifully sought for a sound basis of universal peace. It is a striking fact that in an era of awful physical violence and threats of worse violence to come, the hearts and minds of mankind have leaned with anxiety and the stirrings of hope toward solutions in the moral order, the order of thought and ideas, as opposed to the law of the jungle. Certainly, there will be no peace of any universality until men advance beyond practical moral considerations into the spiritual order of adjustment. It is only in spiritual ordering of their affairs and their lives that men can come to acknowledge, in humility and fraternity, the final sanction of their actions, namely, the will of God. With a widespread spiritual awakening, the terrors that best us all now will perish. Then the whole world, made free to enter upon an era of peace and charity, will do that which will put to shame the glories of the Renaissance and the other great ages of history.

We know that for the accomplishment of His greatest works, God has chosen the weak things of the world. In the great census of humanity, the Irish have been but few; they have been and are numerically weak. But they have, in the historical sum, a moral and a spiritual grandeur and effectiveness that is far out of proportion to their mere numbers. The impression they have made upon western civilization is a major mark. Indeed, they have helped shape the very mold of that civilization. It is devoutly to be hoped and prayed that their moral and spiritual grandeur and effectiveness will continue to be felt in the shaping of the destiny of mankind. The Irish race are a mystical people, and a people of prayer; let us pray for a rule of holiness.

We are a people of action; let us act in the defense of our beliefs, chiefly by the continued example of our good works in public and in private. We are a loyal people; let us never lessen our loyalty to the faith of our fathers and to this great country which we love so dearly as to die for it. Let us do all we can to hasten the day when peace once more walks the ways of this world and holds us all close in a bond of understanding and brotherly love.

Government by Millionaires

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. RHODES
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an article written by John T. Flynn, author of The Road Ahead, for the magazine Common Sense, issue of March 2, 1933. Mr. Flynn's article follows:

GOVERNMENT BY MILLIONAIRES

(By John T. Flynn)

Pious little merchants and bankers' clerks are praying that there will be no extra session of Congress. Politicians, they lament loudly, are undermining public confidence and the way to set recovery going is to get the politicians to be quiet. Such persons ought to be reminded that the crew which scuttled this ship was made up, not of politicians, but of millionaire businessmen.

Herbert Hoover makes ready to go out of office. It may have escaped the attention of many people that his going marks the culmination of an era. He was the first real millionaire businessman to be President of the United States.

When he entered the White House that ominous event marked the climax of a phenomenon which was set in motion 36 years ago when William McKinley became President. When Mark Hanna entered the United States Senate it came to be known as the millionaires' club. When Herbert Hoover entered the White House the process which made the Senate a millionaires' club was completed. This could be called a millionaires' government.

WHY BRIBE NOW?

Before McKinley's time this Government was controlled wholly by the politicians. They were, for the most part, a pretty bad lot. But they drew their commissions from the people and were compelled to pay some measure of tribute to their masters. The Government was, in fact, under this crew of politicians, an independent entity. Businessmen could deal with the Government. But they did not own it. They have, of course, always dealt with it. But their chief instrument was the bribe.

The United States Bank under Jackson corrupted Congressmen and Cabinet officers, just as the Goulds and Vanderbilts and Cookes and others corrupted them at a later day and as John D. Archbold, for instance, in the days of Roosevelt (Theodore) and McKinley, systematically bought Senators and Congressmen and judges and legislators and aldermen in dozen lots. But the medium of control was bribery and direct corruption. It is not necessary to bribe now. Business has taken over directly the management of our affairs. It was not necessary to bribe Andy Mellon to launch an attack on our income-tax and inheritance-tax laws. You do not have to hand money to the Hurleys and Millses and Adamses in order to enable them to see the point of view of big business.

Up to Hoover's day our Presidents with all their shortcomings were drawn from what might be called the political class and always from professional men. Coolidge was a lawyer, Harding was an editor, Wilson was a teacher, Taft was a statesman and judge, Roosevelt was a professional statesman and so on through Cleveland and Garfield and Hayes. When Hoover assumed the purple, the process which began under McKinley and which had slowly brought the Cabinet, the Senate, the diplomatic service, and the powerful commissions of the Government into the direct hands of wealthy businessmen, ended with putting a millionaire promoter into the White House.

WEALTH IN THE SADDLE

For 10 years Andrew Mellon, one of the five richest men in America, ruled the finances of the country with an iron hand in the interest of his class. When he left, the job was committed to the multimillionaire representative of the banking and power interests of New York, Ogden Mills.

It is worthy of note that had death not removed him, it was a partner of J. Pierpont Morgan, millionaire Dwight Morrow, who loomed as the most formidable rival of millionaire Herbert Hoover for the Presidency.

The diplomatic service has, of course, always been well sprinkled with rich men and the cubs of rich men. The price of a smart foreign legation has always been a fat campaign contribution and an income sufficient to pay for its frills. But for many years other Presidents were able to find wealthy men who pretended to some measure of scholarship or culture to fill these posts. The advent of Coolidge and Hoover, however, brought us envoys of the ninety-million Charlie Dawes type. In France we have the millionaire banker, newspaper owner, and advertising man, Walter E. Edge. In Germany it is the financier and public utility man, Frederic M. Sackett; while, succeeding Dawes in England there is the futile and fading Andrew Mellon who moves now to the final chapter of his deflated public career.

John W. Garrett, millionaire partner in the banking firm of Garrett & Sons, represents our opulent but floundering democracy at the court of Mussolini; while Irwin B. Laughlin, one-time treasurer of the Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., functions for us in Spain, succeeding there the late Alexander Moore, millionaire Pittsburgh newspaper publisher.

MILLIONAIRES ABROAD

At home, as assistant to the millionaire Stimson, we have William C. Castle, scion of a wealthy Hawaiian family, which made its fortune in pineapples, steamships, and other concessions. Before Stimson there was the regime of Joseph Clark Grew, now minister to Turkey, and related by marriage to the Morgan family. He, with Leland Harrison and Robert Wilson, ruled the diplomatic service. Wilson is the son of the rich Chicago shirt manufacturer. Harrison is a member of a wealthy New York family and now Wilson is in Switzerland and Harrison is in Sweden. There were, of course, Dwight Morrow of the Morgan outfit in Mexico; Henry P. Fletcher before Morrow and Robert Wood Bliss, son of the manufacturer of Castoria. All this moves merrily forward in spite of the explosion in the House some years ago when Representative Edwards, of Georgia, exposed the fact that promotions were systematically going to rich men and the sons of rich men in the diplomatic service.

This story could be extended indefinitely. But one further comment remains to be offered. The motion got into currency somehow that because a man had successfully gathered a great volume of dollars as a railroad manager or utility magnate or corportion promoter or Wall Street stock gambler he knew the deep mysteries of social life—what makes society function, what makes our industries move and what makes them stop, the economic processes of distribution and finance. Henry L. Mencken, in an obvious allusion, once said that statesmanship was supposed to be a branch of engineering. It was also supposed to be a byproduct of salesmanship or banking or of that even more delightful branch of business called inheriting. It was imagined that because Hoover could run a mine in China and sell its stock in London he knew how to govern wisely an almost alien people in America. Mr. Hoover was pretty well sold on this idea himself. So whenever he had a job which called for expert handling he promptly summoned around himself the most eminent grain dealers, investment bankers, automobile manufacturers, and oil magnates he could find.

When the world crashed around his ears in October 1929, he needed a rescue crew. Had there been an epidemic of some formidable and unknown disease, spreading pestilence and death, he would have summoned about him experts in disease—scientists in medicine and public hygiene. When a great economic disaster shocked the Nation, spreading around not death but unemployment and hunger, you might suppose that he would have summoned around him the best economic and sociological brains in the country. Instead he hailed a flock of some 50 millionaires. He summoned not the doctors but the germ carriers.

RECONSTRUCTION BY MILLIONAIRES

When a farm problem needed attention he gathered about him a wealthy manufacturer of threshing machines, whose chief interest was selling more machines to farmers to further bankrupt them. The Federal Reserve Board he put under the care of the millionaire Eugene Meyer, former Wall Street investment banker—also a germ carrier. The notion that the banks ought to be regulated in any other interest than that of the bankers never seemed to have occurred to him.

When the declining Nation needed reconstruction Mr. Hoover summoned the great violin player, Charles Dawes, who had been fiddling for a number of years while his bank was burning down. He named the millionaire Texas real-estate operator, Jesse Jones, the millionaire power magnate and Chase Bank director, Harvey C. Couch, and some other millionaires to reconstruct the country; a job they have carried forward in precisely the manner you would expect such men to do it, by passing out hundreds of millions of dollars to favored banks and over $250,000,000 to pay interest and principal on railroad bonds. Why not? That's what reconstruction means to these gentlemen.

And now comes Mr. Roosevelt (Franklin D.). He can do one thing to begin with. Why not try, just as an experiment, some plain, educated, honest men, whose success has been in other fields than the amassing of money? It might work.

Speech by George J. Spatuzza, Supreme Venerable of the Order Sons of Italy in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the membership of the House of Representatives and to the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following splendid speech which I had the privilege to listen to at the Columbus Day banquet at the Paxton Hotel, Omaha, Nebr., on October 8, 1950, which banquet was given by the lodges of the Order Sons of Italy in America, of Omaha, Nebr.:

I am happy to be here, in this most progressive and beautiful city of Omaha, and join with the members of the State of Nebraska of the Order Sons of Italy in America in this magnificent symposium to commemorate one of the greatest events in the history of mankind—the discovery of this Western Hemisphere by the greatest admiral of all times, Christopher Columbus.

October 12 of every year is, and by right should be, a happy day, not only for us, Americans of Italian origin, not only for every man, woman, and child dwelling beneath the skies of this grand and glorious country of ours, not only for the inhabitants of this Western Hemisphere, but for all the people, of every race and of every creed, of every country and of every clime in the whole universe, for on that day, 458 years ago, through the discovery of the New World, the whole history of mankind was altered and civilization found its greatest avenue for its onward march.

On every October 12, we should pause and think of the trials and tribulations that Columbus had to endure prior to August the 3d of the year 1492, when in the early dawn of that Friday morning, he set sail from the town of Palos on a voyage that was destined to give posterity a new world.

We should also reflect upon the trials and tribulations endured by him during the voyage—the fears of his mariners—not because of lack of courage, but because of their plunge into:

"A world of waves, a sea without a shore Trackless and vast and wild."

Mocked day after day with signs of land that neared not. And though threatened with death unless he turned back, he held steadfast in his belief to reach his goal, and in tones of authority commanded these marines to: "sail on, sail on."

Imagine, therefore, the joy of the men on the Nina, the Pinta, and the Santa Maria, when in the early hours of that Friday morning of October 12 of the year 1942, Roderico De Triana sounded the alarm that he had sighted land.

Imagine the feeling, when at the break of dawn of that day, this great admiral surrounded by his men stepped on the shore of a vast island and with tears in his eyes kissed the soil, gave thanks to God, and took possession of the land for the crown of Castile and named the island San Salvador.

He returned to Barcelona in March of 1493 to be received in regal splendor by Queen Isabella, who had pledged her jewels to finance Columbus in this great enterprise.

His succeeding voyages led to the discovery of the mainland of South America, the northern coast of Honduras, and other parts of the New World.

Ingratitude and jealousy, however, follow geat men of achievements, and Columbus was no exception.

Many were the aspersions and slanderous charges made against him by his enemies, who succeeded in having him sent home in chains on his third voyage; but the sight of Columbus in chains, however, aroused a feeling of indignation among the people and particularly his friends, who successfully defended his cause, and he again set out in 1502 on a fourth voyage, and after countless adventures, he returned to Spain in 1504—but the death of Queen Isabella destroyed his last hope of being reinstated in his dignities, and he died in poverty in the city of Valladolid on the 30th day of May 1506, without any knowledge that he had discovered a new world.

But, the acts and deeds of great men do not die with them, but live on forever, and soon comes the realization that their achievements have been of great service to mankind. It was not until this Western Continent became the seat of a high civilization that the significance of his discovery began to be realized and reflected to the glory of which Columbus had been denied during his lifetime.

Little did Columbus think, nor could he have imagined, that in this great Western Hemisphere, discovered by him, would one day arise a country which would be a refuge for the people of all nations, who believed in freedom from suppression, in freedom of speech and in freedom of worship, and that it would become a great melting pot of all peoples, who would in time be called upon to give aid and assistance to the whole world.

For indeed, not long after his discovery, we visualize the arrival of the Mayflower at Plymouth Rock and the landings of the Pilgrims who had fled the oppression and tyranny of their government to plant the seed from which a new country was to be born, destined to become the land of freedom and opportunity for all and the greatest Nation on earth.

Without Columbus' discovery, we might not have had such a landing and thereafter no Boston Tea Party, no Lexington, no Concord, no Bunker Hill, no Declaration of Independence, no independence acquired through the loss of the precious blood of the heroes of the Revolutionary War, no United States, no Stars and Stripes under which symbol our heroic men and women fought, bled, and died in World War I and in World War II so that democracy may survive—yes, no country that destiny has assigned the role of benefactor to the nations of the Old World—our great United States of America.

Yes; to this great son of Italy the world justly pays tribute.

I congratulate you, therefore, brothers and sisters, for gathering as you are gathered, to pay tribute to this illustrious man, oftentimes called the first citizen of the world, and I congratulate our entire membership, for this evening, and throughout this month, in every city, town, and village throughout America, where the thousands upon thousands of our members reside, like celebrations, under the auspices of the Order Sons of Italy in America, are being held and will be held, all of which is in response to a duty which history imposes on us, and in obedience to the laws of our order, which command us so to do.

Speaking about our order, let me congratulate you, brothers and sisters from Omaha, for all that you have done and continue to do for the triumph of the ideals of the Order Sons of Italy in America.

You have done marvelous work. You have preached the gospel of our order—gospel of truth, of brotherhood, of humanity, of democracy and Americanism — so effectively that, as a consequence, you have, during these past 3 years, increased in numerical strength to such an extent as to win the admiration of your brother members throughout the country.

More than that, through your efforts, our order has become an important factor in the life of our people residing in Nebraska, and has contributed to the welfare of your State and its citizenry, and your work, together with the work of our members throughout the land, has contributed immensely to the advancement of our great country.

Indeed, you have responded generously to all the undertakings of our order, the accomplishment of which undertakings have served the interests of our country, as well as the interest of other countries of free people. For this you have been highly praised by your Government and by the governments of other free countries; have helped to alleviate the suffering of mankind here and abroad, for which you have earned the everlasting gratitude on the part of those aided; and have served the cause of democracy and the cause of world peace as to justly deserve the admiration of all freedom- and peace-loving people.

I am confident that you will keep up your good work because you, like all other Sons of Italy in America, firmly believe that by serving your order you can better serve the cause of our people; you can pave the way for a better future for our children, the men and women of the morrow; and you can better serve the interests of the greatest country on earth, your country and my country, the United States of America.

Yes; you will continue on because you firmly believe that by serving our order, the order will become stronger and stronger, for more links will be added to our chain of brotherhood, all of which will give us more faith and confidence to undertake and accomplish greater things and matters redounding to the glory of our common heritage.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

You will continue on, because you firmly believe that such accomplishments will constitute a rich legacy for our children to inherit and to enjoy, and that such a legacy will serve to inspire them to be of greater service to mankind.

You will continue on, because in unison with your brother members throughout the country, you firmly believe, and justly so, that the more extensive our order becomes, the more adherents to the true principles of brotherhood and the more disciples of patriotism will we have, because the temple of our order is but a citadel of fraternity by and through which we gain inspiration, hope, and faith to work for a better world in which human solidarity will become ever stronger, and it is also a rendezvous of pure Americanism, where democracy is preached, our American way of life is cherished and preserved, all of which contributes to peace on earth and good will to all men.

In the continuation of this magnificent work, it is a matter of joy and pride for you to know that you have the good will of all classes of people, of every race and of every creed, and of whatever station in life, except, of course, of one class, and one class only, and of the people of that class, to your everlasting credit, you and all our members have earned their displeasure and may say their hatred. That class consists of those who profess to be the protectors of man's freedoms but who, in truth and in fact, are trying to enslave mankind; of those who profess belief in democratic ideals but who, in truth and in fact, are working to destroy democracy and substitute it with mankind's most dangerous enemy—communism.

Of this we are mighty proud. Proud because in our thirst to serve the cause of mankind and freedom, the cause of liberty and world peace, we are determined to continue to combat this monstrous evil until it is completely wiped off the face of the earth.

And on this grand occasion, we who love freedom of speech, freedom of thought, freedom of religion, and all other freedoms justly belonging to man reaffirm our pledge to spare no time and no efforts to help in the work for its extermination.

And in this fight we beseech our 10,000,000 Americans of Italian origin to continue in their role as militant crusaders. This I know they will do, because like you and me, they are all peace-loving people.

And we beseech the rest of the American citizenry to continue in their opposition of this dangerous philosophy. Let us always be vigilant and alert to the end that no Communist or fellow traveler penetrate any of the departments of our Government, because we want our Government to continue as conceived by the founders of this Republic of ours, a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Communism has been and is on the march of further conquests. Rest assured that it will not stop in its march to conquer people and countries unless a determined and united effort is made by all freedom-loving people not only to arrest its march but arrest it so that it will cease, once and for all, to be a threat to democracy. Unless this is done, we shall witness the complete enslavement of mankind. God forbid such.

And so, this evening, we reiterate again our stand that we are solidly behind the United Nations in its present struggle in the Korean situation; that we are behind our country in her effort in that struggle; that we are behind the President of the United States, and commend him for his wisdom in having taken immediate action to oppose with force of arms the unjust and brutal aggression of the free people of South Korea by the enemies of mankind. In this just cause we pledge our order's manpower and resources for the achievement of victory.

After all, we did not fight in the last war—a war in which millions of lives by the warring nations were sacrificed, millions of people made homeless, billions of our Nation's—as well as other nations'—wealth expended, a war which saw the march of civilization come to a halt, merely to enslave mankind. We fought so that nations could be free from aggression; we fought so that you and I and the rest of the world could be secure in our freedoms, and we will continue in the service of the cause until such a time as we have fully realized them.

I want to take this opportunity to report to you that during the past 3 years we have made great strides. In the first 2 of these 3 years we increased our membership considerably, and the fruits of our labor for the past year indicate that the biennium of 1949–51 will exceed all expectations in this respect. I am happy to tell you that the State of Nebraska has contributed to a good extent in this enrollment of new members. For this contribution I thank you from the very depth of my heart.

I thank you also for your contribution in all the undertakings of our order during these past 3 years. Whether we succeeded or not in all of these undertakings, it suffices to say that our efforts are indelibly written in the history of our order—are to be found in the archives of the United Nations and registered in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of our country. When our generations to come will scan these records, they will find how vigorously their fathers and forefathers strove to make this world a better world in which to live.

Indeed, we strove hard to secure Italy's admission to the United Nations, but for the stubbornness of one nation, we failed, but the time will come when Italy will sit in that most important body, for she belongs there.

We strove hard to secure modifications in the terms of the peace treaty with Italy, because we considered and still regard some of the terms of that treaty to be unfair and unjust, but for the stubbornness of one nation we failed.

In that fight, we were rewarded by the comments of President Truman, who said, "Certain of the terms of the peace treaty are not in accordance with our desire," and then added, "within the framework of the United Nations it should be possible to secure such changes in the treaty as may be required by the light of future experience." Well, I believe the experience gained in these past few years has enlightened our country as well as other free countries to make the just changes, but, of course, we will have to ask Russia if she has been likewise enlightened.

We strove hard to secure the return, or in the alternative, the trusteeship to Italy of her African colonies so as to relieve Italy of her surplus population, but we failed, except in a very, very small part. I suppose Italy's 47,000,000 people must, in the opinion of world statesmen and politicians, continue to be cooped up in an area approximately the size of the State of New Mexico. Maybe Russia and some other nation can enlighten us on the subject.

But our work was not ineffective in all of our undertakings. Indeed, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD furnishes ample proof of our efforts in the passage of the Marshall plan, the purpose of which is to aid the European nations devastated by the last war in their economic recovery; the interim program which was to aid France, Austria, and Italy before the operation of the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, and the inclusion of Italy in said pact to prevent the free nations from aggression, and all other legislation necessary for the defense and security of our beloved country, and last but not least, we contributed immensely to the defeat of communism in the Italian elections of 1948.

During these past 3 years we have made and are now making every effort to secure changes in the immigration laws. We consider these laws too restrictive, inhumane, and discriminatory. We cannot, for instance, see why Italy should be allowed an annual quota of 5,801, and other countries larger quotas. What offense Italy has committed to deserve such treatment, I know not. I do know, however, that Italy's sons, who were blessed with the privilege of entering our shores, and their children, have contributed immensely to the development and progress of this country; that in every field of human endeavor they have brought their just contributions, and in many fields they have actually become the leaders.

I cannot see the reason, for instance, why an American citizen, who found himself in Italy either as a visitor or on business, at the outbreak of the last war and was unable to return and thereafter forced to join the Italian army, or to vote under threat of imprisonment, death, bodily harm or starvation by having his ration card taken away from him should have his citizenship canceled and denied the right to return to the country to which he pledged allegiance.

There are so many defects and unjust provisions in the present laws that time does not permit me to detail them.

We have caused several bills to be presented, which, if passed, would relieve the situation, true, to a small degree, but if passed, would give us an inkling as to what more we could expect. All of these bills are awaiting action, and we hope that action will be taken soon. We shall continue in our efforts in this matter until just, decent, and humane legislation is enacted. This is a must on our program.

Another must on our program, which at present I consider the most important, is the completion of the drive to raise $1,000,000 for the erection of the Cassino Memorial Orphanage, at Cassino, Italy. This orphanage, when completed, dedicated to the memory of the American soldiers who fought, bled, and died for the cause of democracy, in the last World War, and to take care of children made orphans through that war, will serve to remind the living generations, as well as all future generations, that whenever and wherever world peace is threatened, liberty-loving people from everywhere will fight for its preservation; a reminder that people living in a democracy are interested in the well-being of all the people throughout the earth, and for our order, it shall be a reminder to our children and their children who are to come to serve its cause that fraternity, as defined in our ritual, must be strictly adhered to and religiously practiced at all times.

I deeply appreciate what you have thus far done in this behalf. I beseech you, however, to redouble your efforts so that this humanitarian undertaking may be brought to a speedy conclusion. This I know you will do. You will, because I know of no instance where the Sons of Italy in Nebraska failed to respond, and generously, to any of the undertakings of our order.

Shortly I shall leave your city. I shall take along with me an everlasting remembrance of this occasion. I leave with you my assurance of profound satisfaction for your magnificent work. Indeed, I shall always be thankful to your Supreme Deputy, my good friend Pisasale, for the work which he has done on behalf of our order. Under his guidance you have made immense progress, and you are destined to greater achievements. My sincere thanks to the president of the executive council of Nebraska, brother Joseph Vacanti. My gratitude goes also to the venerables and officers of the various lodges who have spared, and spare, no time or efforts in the discharge of the duties entrusted to them. My admiration goes to all the Sons of Italy of this great State for their deep love and devotion for the ideals of our order, for the success of which they have worked incessantly and continue to do so.

With your work and the work of the rest of the Sons of Italy throughout the Nation, and with the guidance of Almighty God, which guidance, we shall always beseech, we cannot but march on to greater accomplishments.

The Permanent Point 4

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALT HORAN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am pleased to include an article from the Washington Evening Star of Tuesday, December 5.

I have been on the campus of the American University at Beirut and can attest to the truth of Miss Thompson's observations. I have also visited on the campus of Roberts College on the Dardenelles and know from personal knowledge of the tremendous influence of those institutions, supported by American funds, in foreign countries.

It makes but little difference from what source or creed or denomination the support of these institutions comes from here in America. It is still great.

Last week it was my privilege to use the Appendix of the RECORD to point up some of the values in a letter which former Ambassador Joseph C. Grew had written to the Evening Star. It appeared on November 20, 1950.

Mr. Grew was writing about the International Christian University at Mitaka in Japan. At that time I pointed out the great value of these American missionary enterprises. It was my intention to use the word "missionary" perhaps in a broader sense than merely the "evangelical." At that time I posed two questions regarding the future of these great enterprises:

First. Will our political activities abroad diminish or distress them?

Second. Will our rising tax rate here at home dry up the source of their support?

I believe that these two questions should become a part and parcel of our American thinking.

The article referred to follows:

ON THE RECORD—CONQUERORS THROUGHOUT ALL HISTORY HAVE SOUGHT CONTROL OF MIDDLE EAST

(By Dorothy Thompson)

DAMASCUS, SYRIA.—The Middle East is that part of the Orient closest to Europe and the West. It includes the eastern Mediterranean and the Black Sea where the Dardanelles connects this otherwise Russian lake with the Mediterranean, and the Aegean Sea which Turkey shares with Greece; Syria and the hinterlands of Iraq and Iran, the latter being the only non-Soviet state on the Caspian; Lebanon, of which Israel is but a pendant backed by Jordan; Egypt, and the peninsula of Saudi Arabia.

With the exception of Turkey, Iran, and Israel, all this world is Arab. With the exception of Israel all is Moslem.

This Middle East is the crossways of the world as indicated by the signs that successive conquerors have left behind them. Visible from the Mediterranean seafront campus of the American University of Beirut is a cleft in the Lebanon Mountain which rises above the sparkling bay. Through this have come wave after wave of conquerors beginning with the Assyrians in the days of Nebuchadnezzar. Through it came the legions of Caesar.

SOUGHT BY EVERY CONQUEROR

Every European and eastern conqueror down to Mussolini and Hitler who ever endeavored to extend his domain sought the eastern Mediterranean. Whenever European nations fought each other, each tried to make an alliance with the Middle East or its dominant power—for centuries the Ottoman Empire—and conversely the defense of Europe against central Asia has demanded, and still demands, a friendly Middle East, for in the hands of a power hostile to Europe the latter would be menaced from Greece to Gibraltar.

Economically the Middle East is essential as a complement to western Europe. Iran, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia are sources of almost all the oil that turns the wheels of Europe which has none in its own lands. middle eastern oil is the nearest, richest, cheapest and, for foreseeable time, in inexhaustible supply. Europe and the Middle East are natural complementary traders, sharing as they do the common water highway of the Mediiterranean. By proximity and/or industrial development western Europe and America are best equipped to furnish the machinery for Middle Eastern industrial development.

INTELLECTUALS NOT NEGLIGIBLE

This should, furthermore, be aided by the cultural ties which have been developing for a full generation regardless of political difficulties. In every society that is undergoing evolutionary or revolutionary change, the determinant class is the intellectuals. Relatively small though this class is in the Middle East, only one generation elapsed since four centuries of Ottoman oppression, it is not negligible. The action that the Arab world consists of illiterate Bedouins, feudal landlords, and oppressed sharecroppers is a childish oversimplification.

In Syria, for example, about 1 in 300 of the population have had a university education, and these are the fermenting source in society. They are doctors, lawyers, teachers, journalists, engineers. Almost without exception, these speak one of two western languages, English or French. Wherever one goes one meets graduates of the American University of Beirut (established in 1891), the Sorbonne, the London School of Economics, Columbia, Harvard, and even the University of Iowa.

The educated Arab of this generation is intensely politically conscious, and he knows a great deal more about the west than the west knows about his world.

The Arab world owes its modern existence, for better or worse, to the revolt during World War I, in which it mobilized on the side of the west to throw off the yoke of Turkish despotism, when the Arab briefly became the hero of the Lawrence of Arabia legend.

Therefore, at the end of the First World War, when this generation of the Middle East was infant, all the breaks were with the West. Today they are not. The mind of the Middle East, like that of the Far East, is at best dubious, at worst disillusioned and bitter toward the west. This much any visitor will discover in a very short time. And it seems essential for us to try to understand why.

It Was False for Anyone To Assert That I Was Ever for Socialism, Socialized Medicine, or Compulsory Health Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I now wish to call attention to the following talk which I made over radio station KOIL, Omaha, Nebr., on October 16, 1950:

I want to repeat again to the voters generally, and particularly to those fair and decent persons who are a part of the so-called Healing Arts Committee, and to their good wives, families, and friends, that I am now and have been always against socialism, fascism, and communism, and every other un-American ism; that I am now and have been always against socialized medicine; that there is no bill pending in either the Senate or the House of Representatives creating socialism or socialized medicine; that the reactionary Republican-Democrat, bad insurance-company-inspired campaign issue of socialism and socialized medicine is a deliberate political snare, a deliberate fraud, and deceit. These reactionaries are fighting nonexistent enemies and attempting to right nonexisting wrongs. It is a phantom fight to distract the attention of the voters from the superisolationism of my opponent's bad record in Congress as far as the farmers, labor, the veterans, and honorable business, big and little, is concerned. They seek to draw your attention away from the sleepers which were on my opponent's congressional payroll, and the fact that he gave the farmers bulletins and other Government books allotted to the Second Congressional District, to other Congressmen, one of whom is an Iowan and also to a Member of the other body; that many times he voted and paired his votes with chronic dissenters who sometimes followed closely the Moscow pattern. They don't want you to think about the strange legislative conduct of my opponent, because it cannot merit approval upon close inspection and study.

I am now and have always been against compulsory health insurance, and am in favor of a voluntary plan, which like social security would not close the field entirely to private insurance companies, but permit them to exist and prosper as well.

Do not pay any attention to people who lie about me and say that I am for socialism, socialized medicine, and compulsory health insurance. I am not for them and never was for them. And if anyone, including the Omaha World-Herald and the old bellwethers of the healing arts committee, says that I am now or ever was for socialism, or socialized medicine, or compulsory health insurance, it is a deliberate, monstrous, and unmitigated lie, and perhaps also a violation of the eighth commandment: "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

I cannot understand the perverted, antisocial minds of people who would keep on insisting that that which I have emphatically denied repeatedly and often is a fact. Like communistic, morally dirty old Joe Stalin who is afflicted with leprosy of the mind, they continue to lie, and lie, and lie, and say I am for socialism, socialized medicine, and compulsory health insurance. Who do you suppose the evil person is who has practiced mass hypnotism upon this unholy horde in and out of the alleged healing arts committee?

In the past they have tried my patience sorely and to stop them I have slashed them in discourses in and out of the Congress with saber cuts of Saxon speech but like North Koreans the waves of lies come and come and come. Perhaps mass pocketbook hypnotism must have been practiced upon them by ignoble insurance companies, because no human could simply be guilty of such distortions of the truth.

The questions are asked often these days:

(a) "What did Congressman O'SULLIVAN ever do in the first instance to infuriate certain of the reactionary Republican-Democrat prima donna medical men, and throw them into such a tail spin of ridiculous hysteria?"

(b) "What made certain of these medical men wax so wroth that they have dug up their money-filled tomato cans, disturbed the secret hiding places of their dollars, opened up their money vaults with a Santa Claus clatter, and are spending their money hoards now in an effort to defeat Congressman O'SULLIVAN and buy a reactionary Republican victory for the Middle West?"

I shall answer these questions and all others of a similar nature by saying that up to the time certain of the reactionary insurance inspired Republican-Democratic doctors spoke out against me, that I had done them nothing but good. However, since they have done so, I have belabored them good and plenty.

When you press them for a reason why they took up their political cudgels against me, they say that before the last election I promised them that I was against socialized medicine. That is true, I was then and am now, and have been always against socialized medicine.

They claim further that after I was elected that I double-crossed them, and that is not true.

Fortunately I have all the original correspondence which passed between the representatives of the Omaha doctors and myself. In order to prove positively that I am right in my contentions, and that they are as wrong as wrong can be, I now ask your indulgence to burden you further so that you may actually hear these letters and papers read and then be in a position to make up your own mind from the proof I offer as to which side is right in this most unfair and unnecessary verbal medical bombardment.

During the latter part of September 1948, one of my doctor friends gave me the following letter which he had received and suggested that I answer same.

DOUGLAS COUNTY REPUBLICAN
HEADQUARTERS,
Omaha, Nebr., September 23, 1948.

DEAR DOCTOR: I wish we all could have the privilege of chatting with our Congressman, Howard Buffett, about the pending legislation in Washington to provide Federal aid to medicine.

He is convinced that aid means control and the ultimate socialization of our profession, and has repeatedly voiced his opposition on the floor of the House.

I think that the least we doctors can do between now and November 2 is to give Buffett our all-out support for reelection in the critical fight he is facing.

Our industrialized Second Congressional District is the Democrats' only hope of breaking Nebraska's solid Republican representation in Washington. For that reason, they are pouring most of their money and left-wing agitation into Omaha to knock Buffett off.

With this concentrated opposition, Howard is frank to admit that he needs all the help he can get. If you have taken your stand on socialized medicine, then you have already cast your vote for him. See that your family, your friends, your nurses do, too.

But Buffett needs money as well as your vote. And he needs the money now. Without adequate funds for literature, radio time, etc., he can't hope to meet his opponent on an equal basis, for Howard is being outspent many times to one.

Write your check today, won't you? I think we owe it to the man who is doing our fighting in Washington.

Many thanks.

EARL C. SAGE, M. D.
HERBERT H. DAVIS, M. D.
ROY W. FOUTS, M. D.
J. D. MCCARTHY, M. D.

I hope you noted that this letter was a Republican appeal for funds for my opponent written by old rock-ribbed Republicans out of the Omaha Republican headquarters.

I hope that you realized for perhaps the first time in your life that the dictionary was being Buffettized so that aid and control would mean the same thing. Can you visualize such nonsense? If you aided your father or mother, your brother or sister, your mother-in-law or your father-in-law, your relatives, or your wife's relatives, your country, your State, your city, your church, your minister, your teacher, your policeman, your neighbor, or any other worthy or unworthy cause, that under Buffettism would mean that you controlled them. Isn't that just pathetic nonsense? Did you note that line "Howard is being out-spent many times to one." Our filed expenditures show that this was not true, and that Howard was the "money bag kid" in the last election.

On my legal stationery I made the following reply to Dr. Sage's letter and sent a copy to every doctor in the district, as well as to other interested persons.

OPEN LETTER TO THE MEMBERS OF THE MEDICAL PROFESSION OF THE SECOND CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT, COMPRISING WASHINGTON, DOUGLAS, SARPY, CASS, AND OTOE COUNTIES

OMAHA, NEBR., October 20, 1948.

DEAR DOCTOR: On stationery carrying the heading "Douglas County Republican Headquarters, 415 W. O. W. Building, Omaha, Nebr., telephone HA 8604," and signed personally by Dr. Earl C. Sage, and bearing also the typewritten signatures of Drs. Earl C. Sage, Herbert H. Davis, Roy W. Fouts, and J. D. McCarthy, an appeal was made to you to support my opponent Howard Buffett personally and financially, on Mr. Buffett's claim that the "pending legislation in Washington to provide Federal aid to medicine" does not mean what it says but means "control" and the ultimate socialization of our profession.

It would appear to me that Congress meant what it said and not what Mr. Buffett surmises.

I have never been for socialized medicine as this letter seems to infer. Our family has produced doctors, journalists, lawyers, teachers, and other worthwhile really good American people. My sister, the late Margaret J. O'Sullivan, was a medical graduate from Nebraska University and also earned bachelor of arts and master of arts degrees from Nebraska University before she studied medicine. She practiced medicine in Omaha from the time of her graduation until death.

Two of my wife's brothers are doctors, they being Dr. Frank T. Lovely, of Omaha, Nebr., and Dr. James Lovely, who practices in San Jose, Calif.

If you elect me as your Congressman you will have a Representative you can rely upon and whom you may also, I am sure, be proud of.

Yours very truly,
EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN.

All was quiet on the medical front after my letter was sent out. However, many doctors worked like termites to defeat me and elect my opponent. They were wan and startled when I was elected, and hied back grimly to their practices.

On January 1, 1949, I went to Washington, D. C., and took up my congressional duties. One day in September 1949, I received through the mail at my Washington office, a very splendid pamphlet entitled "Why We Need National Health Insurance," and knowing that the doctors, hospitals, dentists, druggists, nurses, educators, and others would be vitally interested in this subject I thought that it was my duty to pass this pamphlet on to them so that they could keep up to date on Federal aid to medicine and allied professions.

I telephoned the publisher as to whether or not these pamphlets would be furnished in quantities for free distribution. The answer was no, that a charge of $15 a thousand would have to be made for them, if I desired them in quantities, but a few of them would be furnished free. I bought 5,000 of them for $75 and paid for them out of my own pocket. I bought and paid for personally, 5,000 sheets of paper and 5,000 envelopes. I composed a letter of transmittal an i paid to have the 5,000 letters mimeographed. As this effort of mine was related to pending legislation and was congressional business, I could and did mail them postage free.

The letter was as follows:

SEPTEMBER 14, 1949.

DEAR CONSTITUENT: I know that you are very much interested in the question as to whether or not we should have national health insurance, and I am therefore taking the liberty of sending to you herewith for your perusal and study a pamphlet which shows the need for the President's health program, and provides a brief description of how it would operate if it became law.

I believe that it contains much information which will be of value to you in keeping posted on this proposed legislation and will present to you the basic answers to some of the current misinformation on national health insurance which has been sent throughout the country and to you and me in letters, newspaper articles, and pamphlets which contain distorted attacks on the President's health program, which attacks emanated from interested and purely selfish sources who claimed wrongfully that if this law was passed it would be socialized medicine.

I have some decided notions on this matter which are favorable to the President's health program, and which were arrived at after what I thought was a fair and impartial survey and study of all phases of this important question.

Trusting that you will take the time to read this pamphlet, and hoping it will throw "light" instead of "heat" on this very controversial matter, I remain

Yours very truly,
EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN.

The wording on this pamphlet illustrated by pictures, was as follows:

"WHY WE NEED NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE—CAN YOU AFFORD MEDICAL CARE?

"Four out of five people need financial help to meet serious illness. This means 117,000,000 people cannot afford the full measure of needed medical care." (Citing as authority for this statement The Nation's Health, by Oscar Ewing, Federal Security Administrator, September 1948.)

"If your family's income is less than $5,000 yearly, this means you." (Based on data from AMA's bureau of medical economics, 1939, and Bureau of Labor Statistics Consumer Price Index, June 15, 1948.)

"Nearly 80 percent of all American families had incomes below $5,000 in 1947." (President's Economic Report of January 1949.)

"WILL SICKNESS STRIKE YOU?

"As an average American, your chances this year are: 1 out of 3 of being sick once; 1 out of 7 of being sick twice; 1 out of 20 of being sick three times." Citing of the Commission on the Costs of Medical Care, Publication No. 27, 1933.)

"Many more suffer from unrecognized illness. Chronic disability or physical impairment blights 25,000,000 lives today." (Citing the Nation's Health by Oscar Ewing, Federal Security Administrator September 1948.)

"At least 8,000,000 people—1 out of 18—are laid up by sickness or injury in any 24-hour period. About half of these will remain disabled for 6 months or more." (Based on Senate subcommittee rept. No. 5, of July 1946.)

"PREMATURE DEATH STRIKES HOW MANY?

"One million three hundred and ninety-five thousand six hundred and seventeen Americans died in 1946. One out of two was under 65. Five thousand one hundred and fifty-three mothers died in childbirth. One hundred and eleven thousand and sixty-three infants died before reaching their first birthday." (Citing U. S. Public Health Service, National Office of Vital Statistics Report, Vol. 28, No. 1 of September 13, 1948.)

"DO MATERNITY DEATH RATES VARY BY STATES?

"Yes; greatly. In 1946, for example: 9 to 10 mothers died per 10,000 live births in five best States—Connecticut, Minnesota, Nebraska, Oregon, South Dakota. Twenty-six to thirty-one mothers died per 10,000 live births in five worst States—Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, and South Carolina." (From U. S. Public Health Service, November 1949.)

"DO INFANT DEATH RATES VARY?

"Yes; greatly. Twenty-seven to twenty-nine babies died per 1,000 live births in five best States—Arkansas, Connecticut, New Jersey, Oregon, Utah. Forty-one to seventy-eight babies died in their first year in the five worst States—Arizona, Maine, New Mexico, South Carolina, and Texas." (Citing U. S. Public Health Service, November 1948.)

"HOW MANY DOCTORS?

"Approximately 152,000 physicians are in active private practice. Of this number, 34,000 are specialists. On the average, there is 1 active doctor in private practice for every 950 Americans." (From the Journal of the American Medical Association of May 21, 1949.)

"Ratio in 12 best States is 667 patients per physician." (From the Nation's Health, by Oscar Ewing, Federal Security Administrator, September 1948.)

"ARE M. D.'S EVENLY DISTRIBUTED BY STATES?

"They are not evenly distributed in response to population or need. One active M. D. per 437 to 636 persons in these States: District of Columbia, Massachusetts, New York, Colorado. One active M. D. per 1,502 to 1,606 persons in 4 worst States: Alabama, Mississippi, New Mexico, South Caroline." (From United States Public Health Service.)

"HOW ARE M. D.'S LOCATED WITHIN A STATE?

"Cities have more than their share. Some cities have 1 M. D. per 500 persons. Rural areas are underdoctored. Three hundred and thirty counties—10 percent of all United States counties—had less than 1 active M. D. per 3,000 persons. Seventy-five counties had no active M. D." (From the Bureau of Information, American Medical Association, 1947.)

"ARE THERE ENOUGH HOSPITALS?

"The United States had 6,335 hospitals of all kinds, with 1,423,520 beds, in 1948. There were 4,589 hospitals for general service with 576,459 beds. Judged by minimum accepted standard of 4½ general hospital beds per 1,000 population, only 14 counties in every 100 meet the minimum standard; 4 counties out of 10 have no acceptable general hospital; 15,000,000 Americans live in such counties." (From the Journal of American Medical Association of August 14, 1948.)

"ARE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICES ADEQUATE?

"No; they are grossly inadequate. One county out of three has no full-time public-health department. Forty million people live in these counties without adequate public-health services." (From the President's message to Congress, November 19, 1946.)

"There should be 1 public-health nurse per 6,500 persons." (From the Nation's Health, by Oscar Ewing, Federal Security Administrator, September 1948.)

"There were only 22,605 such nurses in 1948—1 to 63,700 persons." (From the Federal Security Agency, Public Health Service.)

"WHAT DOES ILL HEALTH COST US?

"Sickness and disability cost 1,500,000,000 days of production annually. Medical and health costs alone come to $8,500,000,000 annually. Short-term illness knocks the average worker off his job 6 days a year. Nearly 3,000,000 potential workers are incapacitated by total disability. Their productive power is lost to American economy. Estimated total cost of ill health, including lost wages and lost production, comes to $27,000,000,000 each year." (From the Nation's Health, by Oscar Ewing, Federal Security Administrator, September 1948.)

"NATIONAL SECURITY

"Over 40 percent of America's young men were unable to pass wartime draft standards. One out of six rejectees had remediable or preventable illnesses or defects." (From the Senate subcommittee Report No. 5, 79th Cong., July 1946.)

How do health funds compare?

Commodity	Amount	Percent of National income, 1947	Percent of personal income less taxes, 1947
Medical care, insurance, supplies	$5,507,000,000*	3.2	3.7
Alcoholic drinks	9,640,000,000	4.8	5.6
Tobacco	3,880,000,000	1.9	2.2
Jewelry and repairs	1,495,000,000	.7	.9

*This figure does not include an additional 1.9 billions spent for medical care by Federal, State, and local governments (from National Income Number, Survey of Current Business, Department of Commerce, July 1948).

"WHAT IS SPENT ON MEDICAL RESEARCH?

"The Federal Government spends about $20,000,000 annually for research and development in medical and allied sciences. By contrast, one Federal agency alone spent $30,000,000 for research in plant and animal diseases. Business spends about $450,000,000 a year on industrial research." (From the Report of President's Scientific Research Board, Vol. V. October 18, 1947 and Vol. 1, August 27, 1947: Budget of United States for year ending June 30, 1948.)

"HOW MANY HAVE HEALTH INSURANCE?

"Twenty seven million have doctors' services in a hospital plus hospitalization. Twenty seven million more have hospitalization insurance only. Three million five hundred thousand have comprehensive protection including preventive medicine. Ninety six million Americans have no health insurance protection at all." From the Committee on Research in Medical Economics Report, March 1949.)

"ARE VOLUNTARY PLANS COMPLETE?

"No. Most voluntary health insurance plans do not offer complete protection against sickness costs. Voluntary health insurance plans paid less than 10 percent of Nation's medical bills in 1947. Here is the breakdown:

"Hospitalizations plans: Blue Cross, pay only 21 percent of average family's medical bill.

"Hospitalization and doctor's service in hospital: Blue Cross and Blue Shield—only 35 percent of average family's medical bill. Few AMA approved plans offer all these: Preventive medicine; innoculation; pre- and post-natal care; eyeglasses; medical care at patient's home or doctor's office; periodic check-ups." (From the Committee on Research in Medical Economics Report, March 1949.)

"WHY DO WE NEED NATIONAL HEALTH INSUEANCE?

"Any one may be hit by sickness without warning. Costs may run from a few dollars to hundreds or thousands. No one can predict the size of his sickness bills next year. Therefore, everybody—except the wealthy—needs health insurance. It spreads and spaces the costs of medical care. It is the tested insurance principle of pooling resources to meet a common risk.

"WHAT WOULD NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE COST YOU?

"Under national health insurance, your family would pay less on the average than you formerly spent for medical care."

Annual earnings	Average present medical expenses	Your 1½ percent of national health insurance premium (other half be paid by employer)
$1,000	$40	$15.00
$1,500	50	22.50
$2,000	90	45.00
$4,800	144	72.00

Now what on earth was wrong or offensive about that letter or pamphlet? To a fair person, it would be appreciated, would it not?

In a few days out popped the reactionary doctors like shepherd dogs out of a brush patch. Instead of appreciating my efforts to keep them informed at my own trouble and expense, with brains headed for bankruptcy, they ranted and raged at me. I received the most insulting, bitter, and denunciatory letters from certain doctors claiming that I was wasting the taxpayers' money on these pamphlets, printed letters, and envelopes, when I paid for them personally and abusing me for sending this matter free, through the mails, charging me with fooling them into voting for me and then doublecrossing them. Of course before election—they did not know it however—I checked every doctor in my district and the great majority of them being unyielding reactionary Republicans, voted for Mr. Buffett. The strange thing was that upon making a check of my preelection survey every one of these outraged M. D.'s had voted against me according to my records. I knew from that that this whole hubbub was an insurance-minded, reactionary Republican scheme. You see they knew that I was making a splendid legislative record in Congress and they had to start to build fires under me.

I answered some of the less vitriolic letters and filed the other unmannerly blasts away for safekeeping.

Good-by and thanks for listening, ladies and gentlemen.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Everybody's Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of December 4, 1950:

EVERYBODY'S EMERGENCY

The President has given encouraging signs of restoring bipartisanship in the formulation and direction of foreign policy. The Korean emergency at last has impressed him with the doleful fact that playing the score by ear solo is not enough in this time of crisis. Hence, he has conferred with the leaders of both parties in Congress and has laid his cards on the table. We trust this arrangement will not be altered. The moratorium on politics as usual in foreign policy is a must.

But still another moratorium is needed. This relates to America's economic problem, pointed up by Mr. Truman's request last Friday for an $18,000,000,000 increase in appropriations for national defense. This will bring, if granted by Congress as they doubtless will be, the security appropriations to $42,000,000,000 for the year ending next June 30. In view of what is happening around the world this may be a conservative estimate of defense needs.

Whatever the sum, it is staggering and it means that taxes will go higher and higher. Why? Because ever if a compromise with Red China and Russia is reached in Korea, the war will not end there. Communist technique will be to force a break-through elsewhere—in Indochina, Malaya, Iran, west Europe.

Our foreign policy demands that we meet Red aggression wherever it projects itself, and this policy must be underwritten by the military strength required to make it effective. And military strength costs money, billions of it. The cold war to date has cost America upward of $100,000,000,000.

Those billions cannot be conjured out of thin air. They are extracted from the American people, through taxation in whatever form it may be imposed. The corollary of stupendous spending for defense must be careful scrutiny of how it is spent—how the people can get the most for the huge expenditures voted by Congress.

Already the cost of the Korean venture is excessively high because the Federal Government, in purchasing the matériel required to fight there, is buying on an inflated market. Under Secretary for Air McCone has said that price increases from April to last September alone weakened the Air Force's purchasing power by the equivalent of 750 F-86 jet fighter planes, largely because the cost hikes in essential materials had risen between $315,000,000 and $360,000,000 up to that date.

There is another consideration. The President has called for unity in the face of an emergency. Well and good. But Mr. Truman has yet to recognize that a united effort to win a victory over the Communists in Korea or any other place, requires more than a mere agreement on foreign policy. He is not yet willing to relinquish his fight for congressional enactment of his Fair Deal program, a domestic program that not only has no tie-in with an all-out war effort but actually retards it. Only the other day he said he would insist that Congress put into law all the panaceas he champions, and this despite Fair Deal repudiation at the polls last month.

He is still echoing the Roosevelt chant of "soak the rich." He is still insisting that the major taxes for defense must come from big business. He would impose suffocating excess-profits taxes on corporations, in naive defiance of economic laws which prove that at this time they will not return as much revenue to the Government as would a more practical system proposed by the corporations themselves.

Big business is not trying to dodge its fair share of the defense load. It is willing to pay up to the hilt, but it justly inquires how it can meet the administration demands for more and more production, for expanded plant facilities and yet struggle under the stifling imposts and restrictions requested by the administration.

The inconsistency of the President is that in time of emergency he calls on industry to come to the country's rescue, yet relaxes not a whit in his efforts to pillory business even to the extent of labeling it unpatriotic.

He is still carping about the infamous Taft-Hartley law, still telling organized labor to get what it can in higher wages while the getting is good, still following the line of arraying class against class. Management can pay the higher freight out of profits, he says almost flippantly. Again in defiance of the economic facts which relate to industry's inability to do the gigantic job it is expected to do if it is crippled by excessive taxation and dishonestly assailed as a cruel monopoly which would enslave the people.

The President wants an all-out war effort. Granted he is right. Then let him make it all-out for everybody. Business will help carry the load and its share is the largest. But let this be an all-out effort straight across the board. Let's forget Fair Deal frills. Let's cut nonmilitary spending to the bone, but give the armed services everything they need to stop Russia. Russia's blueprint which envisages the world collapse of capitalism is clear. As this newspaper has said so many times, the collapse of the American economic structure into bankruptcy is its long objective. America must keep this structure sound and strong if it is to survive. That is another must.

For heaven's sake, Mr. President, use some common sense in assessing the economic facts of life. This emergency applies to everybody—and we mean everybody.

Has the Marshall Plan Made Friends or Enemies for U. S. A.?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the latest edition of the United States News reports the following trade deals between Russia and European countries who have been receiving billions of American dollars through the Marshall plan to recover and rehabilitate their economy following World War II:

It's just as well to know what Russia and her satellites have been up to in the last few weeks. Here's the progress they've made in trade deals:

The British have been offered and will buy 800,000 tons of Russian grain. This makes sense from the British standpoint, since otherwise dollars might have to be laid out for such grain. Payment is in sterling that can be used by the Russians to buy wool, tin, rubber in the British Empire.

The French have been offered and will buy Russian anthracite. This reestablishes a prewar source for the French and doesn't cost dollars. British coal shortage makes this kind of deal necessary.

The Dutch, Danes, Norwegians, Swedes, and French are having Russian grain dangled before their eyes. Half a million tons is involved. What the Russians will ask in return is not yet known.

The Belgians have just made an interesting deal with the Russians. They will get 125,000 tons of wheat, 45,000 tons of manganese, 60,000 tons of phosphates, and 550 automobiles in return for 64,000 tons of steel products and 18,000 tons of copper, zinc, and other nonferrous metals. This at a time when metals generally are running short in much of western Europe.

The Swedes have just signed a new trade deal with Poland. They have to have more Polish coal, as British exports drop. Sweden gets Polish coal, food, and chemicals, in return for shipping iron ore, steel, machinery, and pulp to Poland.

This, mind you, is the roster of trade deals worked out just in recent weeks—the weeks since Chinese intervention in Korea.

Mr. Speaker, this is appalling with the United States engaged in a war in Korea against Russian dominated North Korea and Red China.

Apparently our American dollars have not made us many friends or loyal allies in western Europe.

I have said it before and I say it again—we cannot buy friendship or allies with dollars.

"Hard Thought Needs To Be Given as to How the United States Can Best Attain the Defense Force It Needs; Assuredly, the Air Force, the Main Striking Arm and the Country's Protector Against Air Assault, Demands a Substantial Build-Up"—Washington (D. C.) Post Editorial

OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I have, on a number of occasions, implored this House to recognize the fact that the national defense and security of these United States would primarily rest upon our ability to achieve supremacy in the air.

It was altogether because of the role that military air power had achieved in World War II that we in this body gave autonomy to and established the United States Air Force as a Department of Government.

I have on more than one occasion stated that the people of this country are not fearful of finding our seaport cities subject to bombardment by a practically nonexistent Russian Navy. Moreover, in the absence of naval transports neither are they fearful of Russian tanks rumbling down United States Federal highways, spearheading an attack by Russian infantry.

What America fears is the death and destruction which can be expected to be dropped out of the bowels of Russian bombers flying over the great metropolitan areas of these United States.

The eyes and the ears of American men and women everywhere today are glued to their television sets, the headlines in the news, and to their radios. Their hearts are torn at what is already happening, or is likely to happen to our boys in Korea; they study the hourly news as it emanates from both the White House and from the United Nation's meetings at Lake Success.

It is because of these things that I am asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a very timely editorial taken from the Washington Post of Tuesday, December 5, headed "What Kind of Defense?"

There is no question but what the Post editorial faces the real problems that confront us in making demand that "some hard thought be given to the manner in which the $18,000,000,000"—which this House is asked to vote for defense—"is going to be spent."

The Post gives top priority for all spending to air power in general, and to "strategic weapons of air in particular." Radar and radar warnings are considered next in importance. Industrial capacity, manpower, the tactical use of atomic explosion," and "the more extensive use of women" are among the means of better national defense discussed in this most sensible analysis of conditions that confront the Nation today.

That my colleagues may have the benefit of reading this most timely expression of sentiment, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include the same in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Post editorial reads as follows:

WHAT KIND OF DEFENSE?

In the light of the President's request for $18,000,000,000 more for defense, some hard thought needs to be given as to how the United States can best attain the defense force it needs. Assuredly the Air Force, as the main striking arm and the country's protector against air assault, demands a substantial build-up. If worst comes to worst and we must use the atom bomb as a strategic weapon, then we must have the equipment to deliver it. We also need more fighters to prevent, insofar as possible, enemy air attack on the United States, as well as a real radar warning system.

But, aside from the existing strategic bombing force, this is talking in futures; for Air Force expansion will be limited by industrial capacity. Moreover, there is often a tendency to assume that if the United States has the power to deliver the atom bomb it has the ability automatically to conclude a war. This does not necessarily follow. The Red Army, for example, is the Russians' most formidable weapon as respects western Europe, and it is for the most part well armed and equipped. Strategic bombing might seriously disrupt it, but probably could not destroy it.

Manpower is the element in which the United States and its allies are the weakest. New weapons, superior firepower, tactical use of atomic explosives all would help make up for a deficiency in manpower—although as respects tanks, at least, the Russians seem to be ahead of us. The proposed 60-division defense of western Europe is designed to hold the Russians at the Elbe, and operate from there. But this is a hope for the future.

Whatever kind of expansion takes place, it is apparent that the United States is going to have to make much better use of its military manpower than it has so far. When general mobilization comes, then some of the problems would be solved. Short of general mobilization, the Armed Forces will have to straighten out and toughen their haphazard attitude about Reserves, and they will have to find some way of making use of the superfluity of high ranking Reserve officers. They will have to make much more extensive use of women, especially in headquarters jobs. And Congress will have to tighten draft standards by changing physical requirements and age limits and by providing for the draft of younger veterans.

Beyond this the Armed Forces ought to put all their weight behind a plan for universal service coupled with the present selective service. In the immediate future such a plan would produce no more men. But over the long pull it would be the fairest and most comprehensive way of meeting military manpower needs.

California State Legislature Adopts Resolution Commending One Hundred and Seventy-fifth Anniversary of United States Marine Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the United States Marine Corps recently received the singular honor of a special commendation from the State of California when a resolution was adopted by both the California Assembly and Senate commending the corps "for their courage, bravery, coordination, cooperation with other branches of the Armed Forces, and in short, the fulfillment of their motto 'Semper Fidelis.'"

The United States Marine Corps has demonstrated again and again on the field of battle the tremendous striking power developed by their branch of the armed services, and through excellent coordination have achieved maximum effects in cooperation with the Army, Navy, and Air Forces. Since the first historic landing of the marines on the Bahamas during the Revolutionary War, the Marine Corps has offered faithful and courageous service to the defense of the United States. The corps has well earned the respect and affection of all Americans, and the action taken by the California State Legislature is one more expression of the people's gratitude for the loyal service of our marines.

The following is the resolution as passed by the California Legislature:

Senate Joint Resolution 1

Joint resolution relative to the United States Marines

Whereas the United States Marine Corps was originally organized on November 10, 1775, when the Second Continental Congress of the United States authorized two battalions of marines for the new Navy; and

Whereas since the first historic landing of the marines on the Bahamas during the Revolutionary War the Marine Corps has devoted 175 years of faithful and courageous service to the defense of the United States; and

Whereas during World War I the United States Marine Corps valiantly distinguished itself serving with the Army during the battles of Belleau Wood, Aisne-Marne, St. Mihiel, Blanc Mont, and Meuse-Argonne; and

Whereas this generation should never forget the role of the United States marines in World War II, nor could it forget the United States marines' part in the courageous defenses of Wake Island, Midway, and Corregidor, nor the heroism of the United States marines in the battles of Guadalcanal, Bougainville, Tarawa, Saipan, Guam, Tinian, Iwo Jima, and Okinawa, to name but a few; and

Whereas the United States marines throughout their history have shown excellent coordination in using their tremendous striking power for the maximum effects, and have shown excellent cooperation with the Army and Navy forces in keeping wars on foreign shores and away from our homeland; and

Whereas the United States marines at present are again demonstrating to the world their bravery and power in their attacks on Inchon and Seoul in South Korea; and

Whereas the multitude of American boys and young men, among them many thousands of Californians, who have volunteered and are serving, and who are now volunteering for service with the United States marines are to be highly commended on joining the marines, our first line of defense, and the outfit first to face the enemy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California (jointly), That the Legislature of the State of California hereby highly and heartily commends the United States marines for their courage, bravery, coordination, cooperation with other branches of the Armed Forces, and in short, the fulfillment of their motto "semper fidelis"; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States.

Poland: The Test Case of Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a radio address recently delivered by Mr. Eugene Lyons on the Justice for Poland radio program. Mr. Lyons is the well-known roving editor of Reader's Digest and these programs are sponsored by the western Massachusetts branch of the Polish American Congress:

Ladies and gentlemen, recently I saw a first-rate movie, GI Joe, based on the career of that remarkable war correspondent, Ernie Pyle. Maybe some of you have seen it, too. The story, you will recall, is set in Italy, and its main action unfolds in the long, bitter struggle around Cassino.

The picture, naturally, deals with the ordeal of the American soldiers involved. But, watching it, I couldn't help remembering that this area was also the scene of great suffering and great glory for tens of thousands of Polish soldiers. It was here that the second Polish army corps, better known as the Anders Army, not only distinguished itself for courage but scored the decisive victory of the whole Italian campaign.

Ever since the beginning of 1943, allied armies—American, British, Indian, New Zealand—had been storming the German Gustav line at Cassino, which blocked the road to Rome. Their every offensive had been hurled back with fearful losses. In the last days of March the Allies had battered a path to within 300 yards of Monastery Hill, the pivotal fortress of the Gustav line, only to be forced to retreat under murderous fire.

Then, on May 12, the Anders Army went into action against that hill. The battle was brutal, bloody, seemingly hopeless. "A savage, animal struggle," one reporter called it. The Poles scaled the heights under a hail of German shells. They hauled antitank guns up steep crags in the night hours. Even seriously wounded men and officers continued to fight, and when they ran out of ammunition they gathered up the grenades left by the enemy.

After 7 days of this, on the 18th of May, the Polish flag was raised over Monastery Hill. It was the telltale breach in the Gustav line, enabling the British and American forces to move forward on the road to the Eternal City.

The British commander, General Alexander, proclaimed: "This is a proud day for Poland, and I salute the Polish flag which now flies proudly over the monastery fortress." General Mark Clark, the American commander, was no less enthusiastic in his eulogies.

Polish forces, of course, had fought on every major front of the war. They had left their quota of dead on the battlefields of France and Norway and North Africa. Polish airmen had been among the so few who had saved so many in the Battle of Britain. Polish vessels had taken part in vital operations in the Atlantic, the Arctic, and the Mediterranean.

But it took the Italian campaign to rouse the world to a sharp awareness of the Polish contribution to the common cause. A war correspondent on the scene summed up the Cassino victory in these words: "The Poles had flung themselves against apparently impregnable positions—and had taken them."

What has been the reward of these sons of Poland for their sacrifices and heroism? No self-respecting American can face that question with an easy conscience.

When the victory over Germany was finally won, the survivors among the other Allies returned to their free homes. Books were written and films were made to celebrate their experience. But what of their Polish comrades-in-arms? These, alas, had no free home to return to. At the very moment they were storming Mount Cassino, American and British statesmen were bartering the liberties and the territories of the Polish people—like so much merchandise—in a cynical game of appeasement of the Bolsheviks.

In recognition of the great Cassino victory, the King of England conferred a high decoration upon General Anders: The Order of the Bath. But at the war's end Stalin and his gang conferred a different kind of title upon General Anders. In their Nuremberg indictment they called him a "war criminal." And today General Anders, one of the great leaders and heroes of the entire war, is an exile, while the country he fought for is writhing under the iron heel of Red imperialism.

And over 100,000 of the brave men who served under his command—in Italy, in France, in the skies over Europe—are likewise wanderers on the face of the earth. They had won their war—and lost their country.

This simple, tragic, terrifying truth stands as an indictment of democratic statesmanship.

Of all the forces making up the great coalition against Hitler's Germany, the Polish were by all odds the most remarkable. When the Second Polish Corps was fighting in Italy, a New York Times dispatch described it as "perhaps the greatest jailbreakers' club in history." He was referring to the fact that most of its ranks and officers had escaped from prisons and concentration camps in Germany, from Nazi-held Poland, from internment camps in Rumania and Hungary. Nearly all the rest had served time in Soviet prisons and forced-labor camps during the 2 years of the Hitler-Stalin alliance.

For other soldiers, the great adventure of war had begun when they enlisted or were conscripted. But nearly all the Polish warriors had been through great adventures before they reached recruitment centers. They had to risk their lives for the chance to fight before risking them again on the battle fronts.

There were no conscripts among them. Singly and in tiny groups they had stolen across Nazi-occupied territories, through forests, over mountains, across hostile frontiers in order to join Polish contingents in the Middle East or France, later in North Africa or Italy. Tens of thousands of them had trekked from Siberia and arctic wildernesses—ragged and starved and fevered—to reach Polish training centers east of the Volga, only to be driven forth again by the Kremlin's whim to Iran.

But however round about their route, though it took them thousands of miles from their native land, these men believed they were fighting their way back to a liberated Poland. In this illusion they were encouraged by solemn commitments by all allied statesmen. But their simple faith was cruelly betrayed. In the end, after 6 years of superb action on all fronts, half their country was swallowed outright by the Soviet Union, the other half was subjected to a ruthless Soviet-controlled puppet regime.

Poland, in the summer of 1939, could have bought a reprieve from devastation at the price of dishonor. It could have submitted to Hitler's diktat, as Austria and Czechoslovakia had done. Instead she chose to resist and become the first victim of a blitzkreig.

Attacked without warning, overwhelmingly outnumbered and outgunned, Poland yet fought gallantly for 30 days—in the seventeenth of which the Red Army struck from the rear, grabbing its half of the mangled nation. A lonely, hopeless resistance it was.

Seven months later came the turn of France. That country, by contrast, was fully mobilized and deployed, shielded by its Maginot line, supported by 10 British divisions, familiar with the nature of a blitzkreig at Poland's expense. Yet mighty France succumbed in only 36 days. Thus the world was able to grasp how truly magnificent had been Poland's resistance.

The country lay in ruins, but it was by no means finished. The German invaders were condemned to struggle without let-up against an underground home army of some 350,000. And Hitler was destined to encounter fierce, fanatic Polish adversaries wherever he turned—first in Norway and France, then in every important land, sea, and air campaign except the Russian. In Russia, Stalin had rejected every offer of the Poles to take part on the eastern fronts.

Even before the end of formal hostilities inside Poland, General Sikorski was shaping up a Polish Army out of fugitive remnants of his beaten nation and from Polish volunteers living abroad. Polish airmen and units of the Polish Navy managed to escape and join Allied forces.

Like every American GI, like every British Tommy, the Polish fighters battled in the first place for the security and independence of his native land. But blundering politicians robbed them of the fruits of their victory. The grave of every Pole who died for the Allied cause is a silent accusation. The ordeal of every freedom-loving Pole now enduring totalitarian despotism at home, or the hardships of exile outside, is a living accusation.

On June 8, 1946, 13 months after the surrender of Germany, there was a magnificent victory parade through the streets of London. Flags of all the nations that had made the surrender possible were on display. Yet there was a rift within the lute. The marchers themselves, and millions throughout the world, were guiltily aware of an absent guest. For the victorious armies of Poland were not represented.

Though they had fought as gallantly as any of the other Allies, though they had helped save the very city in which the parade was being staged, they were now denied their rightful place in the victory march. Why? Because the British Government did not wish to offend our "democratic, freedom-loving" ally in Moscow.

It was a cruel insult, and symbolic of the confusions, the stupidities, the moral bankruptcy which have crowded the world to the brink of a third world war. Time has not healed the wound of conscience represented by the betrayal of Poland. In America, as in all other countries, there are those who remember and they are determined to keep the memory fresh.

During the war it was often said that Poland is the test case of democracy. For those who fought side by side with the Polish armies-in-exile, that is still the test. They will not consider the war against totalitarian enslavement won until Poland is free.

"If the Policy of Russian Containment Has Failed, What Alternative Is Now Left?—The Atom Bomb and the Long-Range Bomber Are Certainly the Most Effective and Perhaps the Only Useful Weapons We Would Have at Our Disposal in a Full-Scale War If It Should Come in the Near Future"—Washington (D. EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, in the long years I have served in this body the editorial columns of the Washington Star have never failed to contribute substantially to a more complete understanding of almost any question which has come before Congress.

With last week's press, the commentators, and the air waves vibrant with news of world conditions, the Washington Star of Wednesday last carried one of the most thought-provoking, comprehensive, analytical, and informative discussions with respect to current happenings in Korea, at Lake Success, and elsewhere, that has yet come to my observation.

This particular article traced the history of our country from that memorable day upon which Patrick Henry made his famous address to the Virginia Assembly. In this, he warned his fellow members against the inclination of men to indulge in illusions of hope, and, in doing so, challenged his colleagues to tell how they could gather strength by irresolution of action.

Mr. Speaker, I recall but few editorials, upon any subject whatever, that were more thoroughly thought provoking and constructive than the editorial "Gentlemen May Cry Peace, Peace," as published in the Star of Wednesday, November 29, a day of dark despair. I believe it will be recorded as one of the most momentous days in the history of our Nation.

It will long be remembered as the day upon which, while hundreds of thousands of Chinese Reds were assaulting the United Nations' lines in North Korea, Andre Vishinsky was crying out his denunciation of the United States as an aggressor Nation. Concomitant with these actions, representatives of the Red Chinese were being received at Lake Success in a veritable bower of American roses and other blooms. Altogether, it completed as ghastly a word picture as one could paint of history in this modern day.

Mr. Speaker, I have been telling my colleagues in this House, for 2 years past, that "American air power is world-peace power."

I have repeatedly pointed out that the only thing that has contained the Russians, and has long kept them from openly attacking these United States, was the power of the Strategic Air Command of the United States Air Forces to deliver the atom bomb anywhere on this earth.

Now, when I say, "deliver the atom bomb," I do not mean to deliver it from an air base located somewhere in Europe, which air field could be quickly dominated and easily destroyed by the attack of the powerful air forces which we know the Russians now have.

Neither do I mean that we should depend upon delivery of the bomb from some so-called carrier or "floating air base," that upon discovery, would be sought out and bombed to the bottom of the ocean under the might of Russian bomber air attack.

My theory, from the very time it became evident that we would be called to defend our country, was to effect that defense with land-based military aircraft, which, leaving our own air fields here in these United States, would deliver a payload of atom bombs, and which aircraft, while scattering confusion, death, and destruction, over the Soviet Union, would at the same time, destroy Russia's power to make effective war upon us here in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, this country will some day recognize the debt that it owes to the foresight of Louis Johnson, Stu Symington, Gen. Hoyt Vandenberg, and all others of that little band of harrassed but patriotic public officials, who had the courage and the guts to stand up and, in the face of bitterest opposition, to perfect their plans and actually accomplish the building of a land-based fleet of United States Air Force B–36's—long-range intercontinental bombers—ships that can take off from our airfields here in the United States and, in nonstop flight, carry to the very heart of Moscow the one thing in the world that now makes the Kremlin tremble.

I well remember the aspersions, the castigations, the spreading of the "ugly rumors" here in the cloak rooms in this Capitol but a few months ago; but God bless those stalwart Americans who had the courage and the intestinal fortitude, in the interests of our national defense, to withstand the odium of vicious slander and build the United States Air Force B–36's, which, thank God, are now ready to defend this country in its hour of need.

Mr. Speaker, congratulations to the editor of the Washington Star upon that splendid article. Every Member of both Houses of the Congress, regardless of their party, should acquaint themselves with the subject covered by the Star editorial, which reads as follows:

GENTLEMEN MAY CRY, PEACE, PEACE

One hundred and seventy-five years have rolled by since Patrick Henry made his famous address to the Richmond Assembly—since he chided the gentlemen who were crying peace when there was no peace; since he warned against the inclination of man to indulge in the illusions of hope; since he asked whether we shall gather strength by irresolution and inaction. Throughout those years millions of men have given up their lives for the freedoms and liberties which Patrick Henry so ably championed. And yet, despite all of the sacrifices, despite all of mankind's material advances since 1775, the remaining citadels of freedom and liberty in the world are threatened as they have never been threatened before.

Patrick Henry was trying to arouse his fellow men, to prod them into throwing off the shackles of the mind so they would be able to see and understand the real nature of the crisis which had already begun to enguif them. We need something of the same thing today. We need to take another look at the assumptions and the hopes upon which our course of action has been based. We need to ask ourselves whether we have lapsed into a state of mind where the longing for peace and the dread of war have combined to blind us to the fact that in the larger sense there is no peace. We need to face up to the fact that we will drift into certain disaster unless we are willing to make decisions, perhaps painful decisions, and then act intelligently upon them.

What is one to think of the fantastic spectacle in the United Nations where the Chinese Communists, with blood on their hands, stand in the role of accuser and Russia's Mr. Malik puts the United States in the defendant's box? Not until yesterday, and then at the last possible moment, did our delegate, Mr. Austin, revise his prepared speech to bring a complaint of aggression against the Chinese. What is the rationale of this topsy-turvy business? It was the United Nations which decreed the use of armed force against the North Korean aggressors. Does anyone believe that the UN can serve the interests of peace, or of security, by seeking a place to hide from this new and uglier fact of Chinese aggression?

In his earlier remarks to the General Assembly's political committee, Mr. Dulles, representing this country, devoted most of his effort to a review of the occasions upon which the United States has demonstrated its good will toward China. He spoke of the bond which this record has forged between the people of China and the people of the United States—a bond "that the Soviet Government is now trying, and I am convinced fruitlessly, to break." At the moment that Mr. Dulles was speaking a Chinese Communist army of 200,000 men was smashing through the front of the UN forces in Korea—an assault which General MacArthur describes as an "entirely new war." Is it possible to square Mr. Dulles' hopeful words with the fact of what the Chinese are doing? Can we have peace with the Chinese people by closing our diplomatic eyes when their leaders wage open war against us?

If there is one clear fact which emerges from all this business, it is the fact that we are at war—now. It is not a final, all-out war, but it is war nevertheless. And it is a war which has taught certain lessons and which raises still other questions.

We should be asking ourselves whether our policy of containment has not been tried and found wanting. That policy was based on the assumption that the Communists, and the Russian Communists in particular, would continue to expand unless checked by a show of force, but that they would not expand at the risk of war. The thought was that the Russians could be held in check, or contained, by interposing against them our own military forces, or the forces of allies that had become economically and militarily strong. To say the least, that assumption has become an exceedingly dubious one, if for no other reason than that the containing military forces simply do not exist.

But if the policy of containment has failed, what alternatives are left?

One possibility is a political settlement in Asia which would enable us to break off the war. This, no doubt, is being carefully explored. But we should not build false hopes. It is unlikely that a settlement can be made which will not leave the Communists as masters of Asia, and if we voluntarily accept such a settlement we must expect to pay the price in loss of prestige and potential allies throughout the world. If we reject such a settlement we might be forced to get out of Asia as best we can. If that should happen the minimum penalty would be the loss of everything we have been fighting for there.

Another possibility is that we may accept what comes in Korea, and go on from there. But where will we go and how will we get there?

If the decision should be to fight and not to retreat, we must face the question of whom we are to fight, and where and how.

Such a decision as this could be expected to result only in total war. We would be at war with Russia, and with all of the satellites that Russia could bring into the battle. Considering the enormous superiority in manpower that the enemy would have—and manpower of excellent fighting qualities if one may judge from our experience in Korea—could we hope to fight on the ground anywhere in Asia or Europe? Would a war of land armies spell disaster for us?

Could we fight and in any sense win such a war with air power? The atom bomb and the long-range bomber are certainly the most effective and perhaps the only useful weapons we would have at our disposal in a full-scale war if it should come in the near future. What is the state of our thinking with respect to these weapons and their possible use?

A commission of eminent men, headed by Bishop Angus Dun, of Washington, has taken the position, in a report to the Federal Council of Churches, that we would be justified in using the atom bomb or any comparable weapon only after it has been used by an enemy.

This position, of course, was taken on moral grounds. But we should also consider its military implications. Suppose that this kind of thinking should prevail and that we should find ourselves at war with Russia. Where and how would we fight? Would we send an American army across 3,000 miles of ocean and attempt to fight the Russians and their satellites in Europe? If so, what is one to think of the hundreds of thousands, probably millions, of American soldiers who would be sent to their deaths in that operation? And how would we get at the real centers of Russian military power deep in the Soviet heartland? Have we forgotten the fate which overtook the German army that Hitler sent marching into Russia? Is there really any valid reason, moral or otherwise, why we must wait until the Russians have blasted our industrial centers before we blast theirs? Has anyone a moral right to insist that our hands remain tied until untold numbers of American civilians have been killed and maimed by the enemy?

Certainly all of these are questions that the American people should be thinking about, and thinking very seriously about, today. It is much easier, of course, to ask questions than it is to know what the answers should be. No layman has the competency to make the decisions that are pressing in upon us. Still, the decisions will have to be made; we cannot escape them. And that force which we speak of as public opinion will play its part.

This being so, there is compelling need for a public opinion which rests on facts as the people are best able to ascertain the facts. We have moved too close to the edge of disaster to accept decisions that are shaped by the cry for peace when there is no peace. We should admit to ourselves that any decisions will be hard decisions. There is nothing left to us except a choice among evils. If this seems to be a repelling outlook, let us remember that it is true, and true in a very literal sense, that we have come to the point where our survival depends upon our ability and our willingness to make decisions that are hard to make, and to act upon them with determinition once they have been made. If we let ourselves be borne along irresolutely by the current of events, we shall certainly be carried to total disaster.

Irish-Jewish Amity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the following summary of an address made by the Minister for External Affairs of Ireland, made in November 1950, in Dublin, Ireland, is quite interesting:

"There is nothing I would deplore more than any tendency to arouse sectarian bitterness toward any group in our midst who held religious views different from those of the majority of the people," said the Minister for External Affairs, Mr. Sean MacBride, when he addressed a meeting of the Jewish Discussion Club in Dublin last week.

"This becomes even more despicable if it is done under the cloak of religion, and is little short of prostituting the true meaning and purpose of religious faith."

He was convinced there were no people in the world more sincerely and genuinely attached to the principles of civil and religious liberty than the Irish people North and South. The Irish Constitution specifically recognized the existence of religions other than that professed by the majority of the people.

Unfortunately, religious antagonisms and prejudices were used in an effort to maintain the conquest of the country. These antagonisms and prejudices were foreign to the nature of the Irish people. One of the worst evils of Partition lay in the fact that its continuance depended upon the maintenance of religious intolerance.

"Speaking, I think, for the vast majority of our people," said Mr. MacBride, "I can say we will always guarantee absolutely fair play and equality of treatment to religious minorities within our shores. For these reasons I am sure that this government, or any other Irish Government, will always be prepared, by means of constitutional guarantees or otherwise, to meet fears which may have been created in the minds of a section of our fellow countrymen in the six counties."

Unfortunately, sectarianism and intolerance still operated in the partitioned area of Ireland to deprive those who aspired to the territorial unity of the island, of their political and economic rights.

The more violent and obvious weapons, such as pogroms, had been avoided in recent years, but in various indirect ways, such as gerrymandering, discrimination in the allocation of houses and discrimination in employment, the Nationalist population of the six counties was subjected to constant pressure.

One of the worst effects of intolerance and sectarianism was that it inevitably tended to breed counter-sectarianism. That was one of the dangers against which they had to guard. He thought they had been successful so far in avoiding any tendency to victimize any section of the minority in the 26 counties.

LOYALTY OF JEWISH COMMUNITY

"The Jewish community," said Mr. MacBride, "has always cooperated loyally with the national aspirations of the Irish Nation and as such deserves the thanks and appreciation of the Irish people. I hope that we, too, have always, on our side, shown fair play, understanding and tolerance to the members of the Jewish community in relation to their problems and aspirations.

"One of your former illustrious Chief Rabbis, Rev. A. Gudansky, often paid tribute to the fairness and religious tolerance of the Irish and pointed to the fact that, unlike many other nations, the Irish people might justly take pride in the fact that not a drop of innocent Jewish blood had ever been shed on the soil of Ireland. We are grateful for that fact, and we take pride in it."

Mr. MacBride underlined the points of similarity between the history and trials of the Jewish people and of the Irish race and pointed out that Jewish and Irish people living in other lands, while good citizens of the countries of their adoption, had maintained a deeprooted attachment to their own religion and to the ideals of the people from which they sprang.

Program for Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt that the United States is presently facing and is involved in the most serious situation in which our country has ever found itself. There is nothing accidental about Soviet imperialism forcing aggression upon and by Red China, just as there is nothing accidental about the aggressions of Soviet imperialism in Europe. Geigor Zinoviev, chairman of the Third International, is quoted as having said in 1920:

> The real revolution will blaze up only when 800,000,000 people who live in Asia unite with us, when we see hundreds of millions of people in revolt. Now we must kindle a holy war against British, French, and American capitalists.

The subjugation of the people of Asia for the benefit of the Soviet empire has been in progress for decades. The situation requires prompt and all-out action, not only for the benefit of others but for our own survival.

I believe that our manpower requirements are now closer to 10,000,000 men in the armed services than the 3,000,000 which were once mentioned. I believe that we must have universal military service without deferments for education and other matters of that kind. Many other things must be done to strengthen our Armed Forces; but I wish now to address myself chiefly to matters not purely domestic. I suggest that we do the following:

First. Issue an ultimatum to Red China to cease firing within 24 hours and remove all of its troops to the Manchurian border within 10 days, failing which, ports, munitions factories, troop concentrations, and all other military targets will be bombed with any appropriate bomb—including the atomic bomb—wherever those targets may be located in China.

Second. Give munitions and combat matériel to Nationalist Chinese guerrillas, who have been estimated to be about a million in number. But no American troops should be sent into China.

Third. Accept the offer by Nationalist China to send troops to Korea and to the mainland of China to engage in combat with the aggressor, Red China.

Fourth. Give financial aid to Yugoslavia in its present famine condition as long as it would seem to prevent a Soviet-sponsored revolution.

Fifth. Continue, but greatly diminish, Marshal-plan aid to virtually recovered Europe.

Sixth. Continue military aid to our allies but restrict such aid to those who firmly agree to assist, by fixed quotas, in putting down aggression.

Seventh. Supplement the present collaborative UN police forces by UN police-authority troops under direction of the General Assembly, UN-financed, manned by volunteers or draftees of any country, including the smaller nations and Japan and Germany. As soon as possible, Japanese and German armies should be established.

Eighth. Intervene with dynamic diplomacy in Red-threatened areas. For example, the existing government in Burma, mainly in the control of the plainsmen, should be encouraged to give more consideration to the Karen and the Mon, whom I believe to be interested in an independent Burma and not in the Soviet imperialistic desires, but who presently are so little considered that the presence of Communist troops in northern Burma and the presence of munitions in south China endanger the area very greatly.

I also believe that we should exert every effort to assist countries in bringing about land reforms. Here in America we have experienced monopolistic tendencies in management and in labor and have handled each by appropriate laws. We have never had a land reform problem of any magnitude. I believe that many countries in the world have neither management nor labor monopoly problems but have only experienced land monopoly problems. Solutions should be forthcoming in this field by taxation procedures or by other appropriate means. We should encourage European nations to agree on and effect such plans as the Schumann plan for pooling their steel and coal interests and plans to eliminate trade barriers and bring about currency convertibility, step up their production, and enforce their tax collections. Foreign nations should also be requested to assist more fully in furnishing troops and in stockpiling essential materials when they have received so much from the United States in the way of financial help.

I believe that America and the UN have followed a course of high principle and right action. I believe that good ultimately triumphs over evil and that we will win in the end; but that we must think, work and act promptly, and decisively in the present emergency. Nothing that I have said is meant to imply that I believe that peace may not yet be achieved without war against Russia. The answer to that is in the hands of imperialists in control of Russia and its satellites. So long as they act as they are now doing our chief hope lies in the rightness of our position and the armed strength of America. We have little time.

REMARKS

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to an article in this week's Sunday Star by Jessie Fant Evans, one of the outstanding newswomen in Washington. It is an account of the findings of Dr. Elizabeth Webb Wilson, internationally known woman actuary and author of a recent book on compulsory health insurance.

That the House may be informed, I am including the article with my remarks.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Sunday Star of December 3, 1950]

WOMAN GETS FIRST-HAND DATA ON MEDICINE IN ENGLAND

(By Jessie Fant Evans)

Challenging statements in regard to the British socialized medicine program are made by Dr. Elizabeth Webb Wilson, internationally known woman actuary and author of a recent book on compulsory health insurance. Dr. Wilson, a former resident of this city, is here for a series of economic conferences. She holds a Ph. D. from Radcliffe College, wears a Phi Beta Kappa key, and won her A. B. and M. A. degrees at George Washington University, as well as the GWU alumni achievement award.

She says: "The British compulsory, socialized medicine program is costing three times what the Government anticipated it would. Both doctors and patients are at the mercy of regulation by bureaucrats. For instance, a physician in Great Britain cannot now move his office into the next block, take on an assistant, or go on an extended vacation unless his petition to do so is approved by the local council, representing the Ministry of Health."

She also quotes Lord Horder, the King's physician, as saying, "The progress of British medicine has been set back 100 years by the National Health Service."

MADE SECOND SURVEY

Dr. Wilson attended the centenary of the British Institute of Actuaries in London in 1948 and was the only woman granted the privilege of speaking before it. She subsequently made an intensive 3-month study of the socialized medicine program. She recently returned from another 3 months follow-up survey of how it is working.

"I have never been so intensively occupied in my life," Dr. Wilson told me. "I visited high and low in my efforts to get accurate answers to four questions: (1) What is happening to the economy of the country because of the service? (2) How are the inevitable controls acting on the liberties of physicians and patients? (3) How is it affecting the quality of medical care? (4) What do people think of it?"

With regard to the first two questions, she stated: "Britain is spending between 4 and 5 percent of her national income for the service. This is more than 10 percent of the taxes she collects. Workers pay only a small part through payroll deductions. The rest comes from income and sales tax collections." She quoted Sir Hubert Henderson, British economist, to the effect that "expenditures for the National Health Service are peculiarly inflationary."

COST EXCEEDS ESTIMATES

According to Dr. Wilson, before the service started, its advocates expected it would cost about £152,000,000. In its third year £464,000,000 have been appropriated and possibly the estimate may be exceeded. She pointed out that this is not a complete accounting since there has been no hospital expansion although there are 90,000 in London waiting hospitalization. She also claims there are no new nurses' homes, although there are 40,000 nurses needed, many of whom could be secured if housing were available.

"Inevitably, when the bill is presented, it will be higher than the £500,000,000 set as the danger line by Dr. Ff. Rogers, British medical economist," she stated.

"Naturally," Dr. Wilson continued, "the pressure from the exchequer for economy is resulting in more and more controls. Already doctors, dentists, and pharmacists are regimented by the fact that Minister of Health Bevan is to all intents and purposes the only employer of their professional skill. As such he has cut remuneration of the dentists and pharmacists to less than was promised before the service began. The general practitioners too, are contending Mr. Bevan has never paid them their due. The result is that both English family doctors and Scottish pharmacists are threatening to leave the service."

She called attention to the threat last October of the British Medical Association to pull 19,000 doctors out of the Labor Government's free medical treatment program, unless their pay raise is significant.

With the Ministry of Health owning 96 percent of the hospitals, specialists are chained to their posts as definitely as if shackles were visible, she quoted from the Martin report.

"GROCERY STORE" MEDICINE

In answer to question 3 her examples are the hurried prescription as a palliative instead of a cure, the cursory examinations, the patients' demands for specific drugs—"grocery store medicine," the doctors call it.

In conclusion she summed up her reply to her fourth question to this effect: "I interviewed 300 people whose opinions I did not know in advance. A majority were from the lower-income groups. Much to my surprise I found that three out of four did not like the service. They criticized the quality of care and resented its cost to their government and thus to them in taxes."

In pursuit of information she visited a factory in Birmingham which turns out small household appliances. Here, she talked with each worker. "Then," she said, "I sat in a doctor's surgery, or office, as we would call it, situated in a factory district. He saw 90 patients in 3 hours, some of whom had to wait more than 2 hours for about 2 minutes of his time. I talked to hairdressers, station porters, waitresses, people, in queues before restaurants and in crowds awaiting a glimpse of Winnie (Winston Churchill) and the news of Princess Anne's birth."

Dr. Wilson was a guest at the Queen's garden party. She had tea and dinner with the Prime Minister and Mrs. Attlee and their family at Checquers and she was the first woman to have luncheon in the offices of the Friends' Provident and Century Insurance Co., of which J. Douglas Pringle, one of Britain's prominent industrialists is president. Lady Frank's father, Mr. Tanner, is chairman of the board. She sat between these two distinguished gentlemen.

Free Child's Armor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, the Mid-century White House Conference on Children and Youth is meeting this week in Washington. More than 5,000 delegates representing parents, social, medical, and other professional groups, schools, churches, civic bodies of all types, and other community leaders working in behalf of children are meeting with similar groups from all other States. Their purpose at this Conference is to share their thinking and opinions on how we can develop in children the spiritual, emotional, and mental qualities that are essential to individual happiness and to responsible citizenship. They will consider what physical, economic, and social conditions are deemed necessary to achieve this objective.

The results of this meeting, therefore, will be reflected for years to come in the programs for children which are developed by citizens in States and localities throughout the country. I should like to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial about this Conference. It is from the Washington Post for December 4. The editorial follows:

FREE CHILD'S ARMOR

The timing is perfect for the Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth which opened yesterday. For the conference in its accent on the emotional and spiritual aspects of the child's development is reaffirming the Nation's faith in the worth of the individual. It is saying: We Americans, despite the great peril we now face from the latest upsurge of barbarian forces, will not develop our children merely as cannon fodder, robots, Spartans, or even physically healthy animals. More than ever we will try to give them the inner stability that free human beings need.

The physical is not being forgotten—how could it be when four out of five children live in families with income less than $3,000 a year?—but the main objective of the 5,000 citizens attending is to find out how their communities can best help the American child to develop a healthy personality. For we are at last realizing that this is not only the best insurance against the warped mind that breeds the fanatic, the hatemonger, the tyrant, but is also the genesis of the responsible citizen upon whom the survival of free democratic government depends.

Even before world tensions grew so acute, those preparing for this fifth White House conference recognized that the way of the midcentury child would be hard. Social and technological change gave him a great test of adaptation. It was foreseen, also, that he would be shadowed by world uncertainty and confusion. Now it looks as if his way might be even more dangerous. For, in the world of this decade, for which the conference will set this Nation's major goals for children, the free child finds himself greatly outnumbered by the hordes of the regimented. As he grows up he will find himself one of a relatively small brigade that must uphold mental enlightenment and human freedom against ruthless primitive masses seeking the slavery of the spirit. To do this he must be given the "strength of ten" through his emotional stability, maturity, self-discipline and creativeness.

It is the aim of the present conference to gather together what we know today about the development of healthy personality in children and to put that knowledge to work through homes, schools, churches, community agencies. In doing that it is contributing the most valuable future defense to America.

The Lawyer in Uniform

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a portion of the speech made by Rear Adm. G. L. Russell, United States Navy, before the student body of Vanderbilt Law School on November 16, 1950. Admiral Russell discussed the Navy's part in the new military justice bill passed in this session of Congress.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE LAWYER IN UNIFORM

Dean Forrester, members of the faculty, students of Vanderbilt University, ladies and gentlemen: What, you ask me, does a lawyer in uniform do? I'll answer that to the best of my ability, but confine the description to the lawyer in the Navy, with the observation that lawyers in the Army and Air Force have a somewhat different status, and that while their duties are the same in some respects, they do not match all the way along the line.

For convenience, and I hope for clarity, law work in the Navy under my cognizance may be divided into two categories. The first, representing about one quarter of the total, is court-martial work. The other category takes in everything else except procurement, which is not under my cognizance, and which is handled entirely by civilian attorneys in time of peace. Time does not permit of more than a cursory discussion of the non-court-martial work but I will try to tell you something about it.

As you must know, there is a great number of statutes relating to the Navy and the Navy Department, some of which apply equally to the Army and the Air Force. Obviously, some one must advise the Secretary of the Navy, on what amounts to a daily interpretation basis, as to what he must do, what he may do, and what he may not do, legally, to administer his department in accordance with the law. Some of the opinions given him are not too difficult to prepare, others require considerable research. In spite of all efforts to draft laws that will be unambiguous and need no construction, we are constantly called upon to construe not only statutes, but regulations issued under the authority of statutes. Questions of pay and allowances, promotion and retirement are most frequent, but there are hundreds of others. For example, I had occasion last winter to go into the question of the power of appointment and removal vested in the President.

Since the enactment of the Federal Tort Claims Act our work on claims has increased tremendously, both in volume and importance. If a Navy plane crashes into a house, or collides with a nonmilitary plane, we get the claim. If a plane scares a farmer's turkeys, or his foxes, or his mink, we get the claim. If a Navy vehicle is involved in an accident, we get that, too. We have authority to settle these claims up to $1,000 but we do not participate in litigation beyond doing the so-called spade work for the Department of Justice.

The handling of legislation is another extremely important activity. We draft and report upon bills, coordinate them within the Navy Department, then with the Army and Air Force and the Secretary of Defense. Once that is done—and I might add that it is frequently more difficult to get a measure out of the Pentagon Building than it is to get it through Congress—it must be cleared by the Bureau of the Budget. It then goes to the Congress and when and if it is heard we furnish the witnesses and whatever information is requested. If enacted, it comes back through the Bureau of the Budget for recommendation as to Presidential action. This work is most interesting, and as I say, very important. It's quite a job to follow it all and keep all hands posted as to what happens and when. I might add that we have found WAVES very adept at keeping track of the day-to-day congressional matters of interest to the Navy Department, partly, no doubt, because women just love to be news gatherers.

In 1944 the Secretary of the Navy was by statute given authority to settle admiralty claims up to $1,000,000, and I believe I am correct that he is the only Government official except the Attorney General with authority to settle an affirmative claim. As a consequence, we do a rather large admiralty business, but as in the case of other claims, turn them over to the Department of Justice when they reach the litigation stage. The settlement authority referred to has worked unbelievably well. The great majority of claims are in fact settled to the satisfaction of all concerned, and there is a resulting saving to the taxpayer who is thereby spared the expenses of litigation. In addition a claimant does not have to wait forever to collect a just claim.

International law, covering everything from leased-base agreements to POW rules and agreements; tax law, which brings us in contact with nearly all State authorities and not a few Federal agencies; habeas corpus proceedings; questions of geographic jurisdiction; patent infringement suits; delivery of men to civil authorities and liaison with the Department of Justice are some of the other activities. Not the least work, I might add, comes in the well known administrative job of personnel planning and detailing.

Now for court-martial work, which a great many people think is all we do, and about which nearly every one has an opinion, usually violent. You will recall my remarks about the complexities of military service, and what it takes to put together, command, and support an efficient fighting organization. And bear in mind that a military organization adequate to win a war a few generations back would be not much larger than a good sized task force today. It should not be a newly discovered feature or aspect of military operations, and I don't say that it is; but it is true that we have come to realize more clearly than ever before, that the morale of an organization, which is so vital to its success, can be and will be high or low according to the quality and accuracy of the administration of justice by the responsible officers in that organization.

Here is something that has not changed, that is, no one has invented anything that makes simple justice any different today than it ever was. Human nature, I think, was pretty much the same in the days of Caesar, and of Charlemagne, and of George Washington, and Napoleon, and Sam Houston, as it is now. A square deal is still a square deal. The goal is very simple, indeed. The ways and means to attain that goal are not so easy to come by, particularly when people are under pressure. Besides, as a Congressman told me a couple of years ago, dealings in human relationships—like the law—cannot be reduced to an exact science. As it goes without saying that we can't please everyone all the time, and as we too are subject to the human frailties that sometimes lead us into error, we won't be right all the time. The best we can hope for is a good batting average.

At this point I should like to philosophize a bit more. Justice and discipline are two different things. Discipline may, but by no means must, include punishment. Discipline is the result of training, which if successful, produces the officer and men who not only carry out orders properly, but give them intelligently. In a sense, discipline has broken down when punishment becomes necessary. Also, law and justice are not synonymous, and there has been many a law school story highlighting the difference. When, then, once we are clear on the matter of definitions, is the objective?

There has been some considerable confusion of thought, I believe, with respect to courts martial as a method of trial and punishment, particularly when attempts are made to compare them to our civil courts.

One reason for this confusion, I believe, is the failure to appreciate what a system of justice in a military organization is designed to do. As I have said, it is primarily to make that organization a more effective fighting unit, whereas the criminal statutes and our criminal courts are set up for a different purpose, namely, to protect society. Moreover, we in the service try our best to keep the standards of conduct as high as possible, within reason. Times without number the welfare and perhaps the lives of a man's shipmates depend on what he does. Any comparison between courts martial and the criminal courts is therefore likely to lead to erroneous conclusions. For example, the charge has been made that because the percentage of acquittals and reversals is lower for courts martial, our courts martial are arbitrary. That by no means follows—it may even mean that pretrial investigation has been more thorough.

In any event, it was decided in 1948, following a series of surveys, boards, and committees, to modernize our systems of military justice, and while we were about it, draw up a code of uniform application to the three services. It so happens that two of the individuals who were instrumental in framing and enacting this code are right here in Tennessee, and one of them is at this very law school. Professor Morgan, as many of your know, was the author of the code, and spent some 8 or 10 months in collaboration with representatives of the three military departments and the Secretary of Defense while it was in preparation. It may well be that Professor Morgan feels that he accomplished something in spite of all the advice he received—I believe I can state without fear of contradiction that it is no easy job to referee any argument between the Armed Services.

The other individual from this State was Senator KEFAUVER, who was chairman of the Senate subcommittee to which the bill was referred. Such a bill, representing as it did, after several generations, practically a new constitution governing the conduct and specifying the rights of personnel of the armed services, required the undivided attention of top flight lawyers in the Congress, and it certainly received it in both House and Senate. Senator KEFAUVER's contribution was tremendously important, and he and his subcommittee—congressional committees and their work are frequently underestimated, I believe—gave the measure the careful and objective study it deserved.

When I was invited to come here I was told that while the subject matter of the code will be discussed here at some future date, I need not avoid all reference to it. I should be less than honest if I were to say I subscribe to everything in it, and for that matter I doubt if anyone considers it perfect, and the law itself calls for annual recommendations looking to its improvement, after it becomes effective next May.

The other day, in a conversation about the code, an attorney remarked to me that the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps had been in existence for some 150 years, and wouldn't you think some of the troublesome problems presented would have long since been settled—well, yes, I would; but the Supreme Court is still construing the Constitution, and besides, there was a widespread feeling that service personnel could do with a few more guarantees and safeguards for their protection. That, in a nutshell, is the basis and philosophy of the new code.

To quite a considerable degree, the safeguards in the code consist of requirements that the more important cases be tried by qualified lawyers, and I use the word "tried" advisedly. Every man will be entitled to a full-fledged lawyer for his counsel, and there will be another doing the prosecuting. In addition, still another will sit as a nonvoting member of the court and his duties will approximate those of a trial judge. Then when the record is reviewed in the first instance, a lawyer must have a hand in it, and finally, when it is transmitted to Washington, three more lawyers, set up about the same as an appellate court, go over it. The last word on most cases, so far as their legality is concerned, is to be lodged in a court of military appeals, to be composed of three civilian judges on the same level as the Federal circuit courts of appeal.

There are a few who are not satisfied yet, in that the new code does not completely divest a military commander of all connection with courts-martial, and they argue that so long as he has anything to do with them, there will be abuses of power. As an alternative, these few would have the commander prefer the charges and let what would correspond to a separate judiciary handle everything from there. In my judgment that would go much too far, and much farther than is necessary.

To give you some idea of how this code is being received in the fleet, I should like to read you a couple of paragraphs from a letter issued by the Commander in Chief of the Atlantic Fleet, Admiral W. M. Fechteler, on November 6, just 10 days ago. I think it bodes well for the new code.

"The Commander in Chief desires that officers and men of the United States Atlantic Fleet regard this new code as a work of progress rather than as an instrument tending to impede and confuse the disciplinary process by the introduction of technicalities and undue restraints on those in command. Certain basic principles must be clearly understood and kept in mind. In civil life, criminal law seeks to protect society from the depredations of its irresponsible members without prejudice to fundamental individual rights by hasty, ill-considered, star-chamber action. In military life, military law must not only attain these ends but must do more. The primary objective of the military services is to win wars, not just fight them. Therefore, military law must not only restrain individuals for the protection of military society but must be an instrument which will assist in attaining the requirement that all members of the service march in a prescribed order. For this reason, certain acts which are considered inalienable rights in civil society are offenses in military society. For instance, the act of "telling off the boss." This is an inalienable right of the American civilian but in the military service it may well constitute an offense punishable by courts-martial. In civil life, if a man does not like his job he can quit it. Such action in the military service would be desertion. Likewise, in civil life if a group of people decide they do not like working conditions and walk off jointly, that is a strike. In the military service it is mutiny.

"Discipline is considered to be that attribute of a military organization which enables it to function in a coordinated manner under different circumstances. Many factors contribute to the building of a well-disciplined organization. One of the instruments for achieving and maintaining a high state of discipline is military law. It is further considered that those in the military service primarily responsible for discipline are those in command. It is a primary command function. For this reason all the factors contributing to the attainment of a high state of discipline should be controlled by and exercised by those in command with intelligent understanding. To do so requires a thorough knowledge of the tools available to do the job."

Considering the requirements of the code for lawyers, and the needs of the service occasioned thereby, every Navy lawyer will have to be thoroughly grounded in court-martial law and procedure. At present not quite all of them are, but they will be in due course, before they are assigned duty that would include that type of work.

Navy lawyers in uniform fall into three categories. There are about 50 who are unrestricted line officers (like myself) and eligible to command at sea or on shore. These officers studied law, obtained a degree, and were admitted to the bar as naval officers, just as others go in for engineering, or ordnance, or some other postgraduate work. Then there are some 240 who are law specialists. They also are line officers, but of a restricted type, and their duties are primarily, but not necessarily exclusively, in law work. The rest are Reserve officers on active duty and their number will depend on the size of the Navy as determined by the Congress to be necessary for the maintenance of our world position.

I believe most Reserve officers are familiar with the procedure being followed in their call to active duty. If not, I shall be glad to answer any questions. As to the law specialist group, we have authority to commission as lieutenants (junior grade) a limited number of law-school graduates each year—this year we are taking in 14—on a career basis. I am not here on a recruiting trip, but if anyone is interested, the basic requirements are a degree from an accredited law school, membership in the bar of a Federal court, or the highest court of a State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, and age between 21 and 32.

There are, of course, a great many features of the Navy lawyers' life and duties that I could not cover this morning. I suppose also that there is a great deal more to be said about the armed services, their proper place in our national economy and way of life, and the difficulties involved in finding the right answer to the various problems with which we as a nation are faced. If however, we can see the forest through the trees, it seems clear enough that lawyers, individually and collectively, can and should make a direct contribution to our national defense. There is very definitely a place for them that can be filled by no other group of men. If what I have said this morning has helped you in your thinking, or has even stimulated your thinking, the trip to Nashville, which, as I said, has been most pleasant and enjoyable, will have been worth while.

Address of Most Rev. Richard J. Cushing, D. D.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the Most Reverend Richard J. Cushing, D. D., Archbishop of Boston, on Thursday evening, August 3, at the Hotel Statler, Boston, Mass.:

I have already wished you ten thousand times ten thousand welcomes. I renew those greetings in measure overflowing. No visitors are more welcome than the Hibernians. None should feel more at home in our city. People frequently refer to Boston in terms of its so-called Irish-American complexion and character. Sometimes they intend the description as a compliment. Whether they do or not, we always take it as one.

In any case, the most far-traveled among you must by now feel at home in Boston.

"The heart of staid Massachusetts
The home of the pike and the cod,
Where some still spring from the Pilgrims
But most of us come from the Sod!"

Tonight's dinner is really a going-away party. Many of you will now be leaving Boston to return to your several homes. Tomorrow I leave on Holy Year Pilgrimage to Rome. By this time tomorrow night I shall be on the high seas.

Ocean travel is undoubtedly a great thing, but I must confess that I share Mr. Dooley's opinion of it. Some of you must remember Mr. Dooley's famous conversation with Mr. Hennessy on the subject. It is worth recalling:

"Don't ye make a mistake. A boat's a boat. That's all it is. Annything ye can get at sea ye can get betther on land. A millyonaire is made as comfortable on an ocean liner as a longshoreman on earth, an' ye can play that comparison all th' way down to th' sterrage. Whin I read about this here floatin' palace, I says to mesilf: 'I'll add a little money, and go acrost in Oryental luxury.' Whin I got aboord th' decks were crowded with happy people worryin' about their baggage an' wondherin' already whether th' inspector in New York wud get on to th' false bottom iv th' thrunks. I give th' old an' enfeebled English gintleman that carried me satchel a piece iv silver. He touched his cap to me an' says 'Cue', 'tis th' English f'r 'I thank ye kindly' in Irish. He carried me bag downstairs in th' ship. We kept goin' down an' down till we touched bottom, thin we rambled through long lanes neatly decorated with steel girders till we come to a dent in th' keel. That was me boodoor. At last, part iv it was. There were two handsome berths in it, an' I had th' top wan. Th' lower wan was already occypied be a gintleman that had started to feel onaisy on th' way down fr'm London, an' was now prepared f'r th' worst. I left him to his grief, an' wint up on th' roof iv th' ship.

"It was a gay scene, f'r th' boat had started. Long rows iv ladies were stretched on invalid chairs, with shawls over thim, pretindin' to read, an' takin' deep smells at little green bottles. Three or four hundherd men had begun to walk around th' ship with their hands folded behind thim. A poker game between four rale poker players an' a man that didn' know th' game, but had sharp fingernails, was already started in th' smokin'-room. About that time I begun to have a quare sinsation. I haven't been able to find out yet what it was. I must ask Dock O'Leary. I wasn't sea-sick, mind ye. I'm a good sailor. But I had a funny feelin' in me forehead between me eyes. It wasn't a headache exactly, but a kind iv a sthrange sinsation like I used to have whin I was a boy, an' thried to look cross-eyed. I suppose it was th' strong light. I didn't have anny aversion to food. Not at all. But somehow I didn't like th' smell iv food. It was disagreeable to me, and' it seemed to make th' place in me head worse. Sivral times I wint to th' dinin'-room intindin' to jine th' jovyal comp'ny there, but quit at th' dure. It was very sthrange. I don't know how to account f'r it. Very few people were sea-sick on th' v'yage, but sivral hundherd who were injyin' paddlin' a spoon in a cup iv beef-tea on deck spoke iv havin' th' same sinsation. I didn't speak iv it to th' ship's doctor. I'd as lave carry me ailments to a harness-maker as to a ship's doctor. But there it was, an' fr'm me pint iv view it was th' most important ivint iv th' passage. * * * An' there ye ar're. A boat's a boat aven whin it looks like a hotel. But it's wondherful, annyhow. Whin ye come to think iv it, 'tis wondherful that anny man cud cross th' Atlantic in annything. Th' Atlantic Ocean is a fine body iv wather, but it's a body iv wather just th' same. It wasn't intinded to be thravelled on. Ye cud put ye'er foot through it annywhere. It's sloppy going' at best. Th' on'y time a human being can float in it is afther he's dead."

"Well, it's all very well, but f'r me th' dhry land," said Mr. Hennessy. "Will ye iver cross th' ocean again?"

"Not," said Mr. Dooley, "till they asphalt it an' run th' boats on throlleys."

However, I am leaving tomorrow. I ask you to think of me when I get the quare sinsation.

Much more seriously, I beg your prayers and I promise you my own. Let our prayers for one another be the favorite prayer of the Irish—the rosary. We are planning while on board ship to recite the rosary together every day, just as we have been doing here in Boston by radio for many months, just as the families of Ireland have been doing from time immemorial. The rosary has become the national prayer of the Irish. It is a prayer beloved by the sons and daughters of every land, but it is particularly associated with Ireland and the Irish, with Irish homes and Irish mothers.

There have been many poems about the place of the rosary in the spiritual life of our people. Everyone knows the beautiful verses entitled "The Trimmins on the Rosary." The other day I found some other verses entitled "An Irish Mother's Rosary."

"I bless myself and I kiss the cross, and the holy creed I tell;
And the Pat'rs and Aves trip off my tongue, for it's me that knows them well,
Sure it's many a day these same old beads I told in the same old way—
I got them my first communion morn, and that's 70 years today.
'Twas the joyful mysteries then I liked, and I said them joyfully.
When our Lord was only a child Himself at His blessed mother's knee.
Ochone!! But it's many and many a year I've turned from the joyful deeds,
And I cry on the sorrowful mysteries with the tears as big as my beads.
For my beautiful boy with the fever went and himself soon after died.
Do you wonder I think of the mysteries that end with the Crucified?
For it's then, as I'm telling each blessed bead, a-kneeling beside my bed,
We two women, God's mother and me, have many a talk of our dead.
And that's why I'm liking the beads that tell of her pains and her darling son's;
Sure it's plenty of time I'll be having in heaven to think of the Glorious One."

So let our beads during this month, while so many of us are on pilgrimage, be said for one another; joyful, sorrowful, and glorious mysteries, let them unite us all in the communion of saints with Jesus and Mary and Joseph, the Holy Family so beloved by the Hibernians.

While I am speaking of prayers, there is another plea that I would like to make to this convention. Last spring at the annual dinner meeting of our Eire Society, a Boston group which has done so much to serve the cultural interests of the Irish everywhere, I spoke of Blessed Oliver Plunket. My remarks were taken up by the Irish press and apparently reproduced wherever there are Irishmen in the world, which means in every corner of the globe. I was particularly pleased to receive a message from the venerable and beloved primate of all Ireland, the archbishop of Armagh, who told me that my few words concerning Blessed Plunket had increased the hope that the eventual canonization of the great Irish martyr may be the sooner.

I certainly rejoice if such be the case. The archbishop asked me to renew whenever appropriate the plea I made to the Eire Society. I gladly do so at this time.

Last fall we went to Ireland on a great "come back to Erin" pilgrimage. We visited many beloved spots in the isle of saints and scholars, but none more profoundly moved me than did the modest shrine in great St. Peter's Church, Drogheda, where the head of Blessed Oliver Plunket is preserved for veneration.

It is surprising to reflect on how little people outside Ireland appear to appreciate the tremendous stature and historic significance of this great archbishop, patriot, and personality. It would, I think, be most appropriate if the Hibernians would interest itself in the cause of Blessed Plunket.

My purpose in suggesting such a reawakened interest is not to recall the injustices of the past nor otherwise to inflame partisan or political sentiments in the present. Quite the contrary. It is no longer necessary to rehearse the travesty of justice which was his trial; nor the incredible barbarities which accompanied his execution.

My purpose would rather be to present Blessed Oliver Plunket as an outstanding example of what the true Christian should be at all times and as a symbol of the spirit in which the true Irishman seeks the interests of his nation.

As a Christian, Blessed Plunket was kindly and considerate. He was humble in his great learning. He was assiduous in the fulfillment of the duties of his state in life. He was filled with a holy peace and he saw all events of life in a completely spiritual perspective. Few men in history have accepted injustice and even a brutally unjust death with such magnificent dignity and devout resignation.

He was a martyr for his faith. So far as we may use the word, he was also a martyr for Ireland. But his love for Ireland, it must be noted, did not make him the enemy of any other land. On the contrary, Blessed Plunket exemplifies the truly Catholic spirit in which differences between nations must always be resolved no matter what the previous history of injustice or of bitterness on either side.

We in America who have Irish blood in our veins, Irish hearts in our bosoms, whose Christian souls are in bodies with Irish nerves and Irish temperaments, have also much to learn from the Irish example of Blessed Oliver Plunket. We have a lesson to learn from him concerning the spirit of resolute, intrepid, blended faith and charity with which we must help America meet her obligations in the international community. The spirit of Blessed Plunket impels us to meditate soberly and prayerfully the wise words with which our Holy Father, the Pope, last week renewed his plea for peaceful methods of settling international disputes so long as such methods are humanly possible.

In the spirit of Blessed Plunket, we shall continue to abhor war even when it is forced upon us. We shall continue to ask that the arts of peace be employed in the effort to restore or establish order. But we shall not be cowards if traitors at home or abroad compel us instead to practice the science of war. If we be forced to wage war, it will not be war for the sake of the violence which is the Red's objective. It will be war in accordance with the patient principle which alone inspires the Christian when finally he takes up his arms: We go to war, as St. Augustine said, for the sake of peace, to preserve it where it still survives, to restore it where it has been destroyed.

So, too, we Americans of Irish descent should be guided by the spirit of Blessed Plunket in the sympathetic interest we naturally take in the affairs of old Ireland across the sea.

There has never been any question of our dividing civic loyalty between our American fatherland and the motherland of our people. The ties which unite us with Ireland are sentimental and dominantly spiritual. They are entirely consistent with unqualified American patriotism. Our interest in Irish affairs is the interest of kinsmen in the fortunes of their physical and spiritual relatives. It is on the level of affections and prayers, not the level of politics, intrigue, or sabotage. There is no resemblance, for example, between it and the interest of bundists in the military aspirations of their fatherland. It certainly bears no resemblance whatsoever to the treacherous interest of American fellow-travelers, parlor pinks, and like disloyalists in the affairs of the Soviet. These ladies and gentlemen appear, at least as they reveal themselves in their disloyalty trials or espionage cases, to be thoroughly emancipated from any spiritual values such as constitute the chief tie between the Irish throughout the world and old Ireland. One finds in them scant trace of the sentiment or the poetry which ties hearts like yours to the land of your ancestors.

The love of our people for Hibernia has prompted them to greater, not lesser, service to America. Only in song has Ireland ever asked her sons and daughters to come back to Erin. In reality, she has always encouraged them to take their places in the communities which gave them place, retaining for Ireland only the affection of pious hearts and the gratitude of prayerful children.

Forty years ago an American writer of our own country as an example of this Irish quality of strengthening with God's grace the land which gives them shelter said: "This vast continent affords a most striking proof of what religion means to the Irish people. Count the colleges, schools, academies, hospitals, and asylums of charity that have sprung up as if by magic all over the land, and tell me is there anything that speaks more eloquently to the heart than the faith that inspired such unselfish devotion. Religion as a name is useless; it is only precious for what it enables us to be and to do. It is religion that has made the Irish people what they are. It has made them just toward others, lovers of order and progress, firm in the support of just authority, the courageous in resistance to lawless tyranny. No State can thrive without such virtuous citizens, and no country can be hopelessly lost that has the happiness of possessing them."

What Ireland's inspiration has brought into American national life, it once brought into the universal life of Christendom. Every scholar knows the part that the land of our fathers played in the Dark Ages, when once before the unity of Europe had crumbled under the attack of barbarians and the new glorius unity that was medieval Christendom was being forged by Christian apostles, so many of them Irish by birth. It may well be that once again holy Ireland is destined to play a civilizing and spiritualizing role in our divided and distraught international community, a role like to that which she played centuries ago.

In this connection I recall a prophetic word uttered with regard to the Irish people. Nearly 300 years ago a papal nuncio sent to Ireland by the Pope wrote back to Rome these words: "Ireland may yet become an outwork of the faith to Europe and its herald to America." Ladies and gentlemen, you are living in days which have seen this phophecy on the verge of fulfillment. Ireland has become an outwork of the faith to Europe, has been and is its herald to America. The Irish people, wherever they may be, are the champions of Christianity in a world menaced by Asiatic communism; they are foremost among those who, in the Old World and the New, are unswervingly committed to the traditions of Western civilization and Catholic Christianity which once gave origin, meaning, and purpose to our democracy and which can once again guarantee democracy's survival.

The enemies of faith and freedom, of democracy and Christianity, well know the devotion of the Irish people to the basic principles of western civilization. That explains their desire to embarrass Ireland whenever possible, to keep Ireland out of the councils of the world, to veto her admittance to international organizations. By such action Ireland's critics pay tribute to her integrity and reveal the malice of their own designs. By their action they confirm our conviction that Ireland, today as of yore, is the champion of light against darkness, of the things of the spirit against those of the flesh.

It seems profoundly significant, as well as bitterly ironic, that we should have read in the newspapers the other day an announcement concerning a group of volunteers from the Republic of Ireland, a republic excluded from the United Nations, who expressed their desire to fight by the side of American troops under the American flag, the United Nations or any flag in beating back the Red raiders on Korea—while the same newspapers reported to us the devices and dodges by which nations high in the councils of the United Nations still seek to avoid their responsibility in helping overcome the violence instigated by the Red regime whose representative is to preside over the deliberations of the United Nations Council this month—and whose representatives consistently and successfully object to the admittance into the United Nations of a genuine democracy, a duly constituted republic and a Christian nation like Ireland.

There is no point in attempting to understand the hypocrisy which debars Ireland from her proper place in the international community. I reaffirm my long-standing conviction that such action bears witness both to Ireland's integrity and to the fraudulent purposes of nations which unite in outlawing the Irish Republic, while making common cause with the Red regimes in Yugoslavia, Hungary, Poland, Lithuania, and the Soviet Republic subject to Moscow. The exclusion of Ireland from international organization is a fraud, a fraud which, as events are proving, will redound enormously to Ireland's good name.

So, too, our sympathetic interest in the fate of our kinsmen impels us to brand as a further fraud the reasons alleged for the continued partition of Ireland. The reasons offered are familiar. I need not rehearse them. Their wording changes according as the hypocrites who profit from the division shift their line to meet the exposure of their fraudulence.

No one will ever be able to understand why Americans, whose President gave the highest and most authoritative expression to the principal of national self-determination, should be so slow to speak up in behalf of Ireland's national self-determination. No one will ever be able to understand why Americans, who talk so much about the necessity for religious tolerance, should espouse in effect the cause of the Orangemen who hold religious tolerance in unconcealed contempt, as against the cause of the Irish whose undeniable record of religious tolerance is by all odds the fairest record of any nation in our day, our own not excepted. There is no Irish Catholic equivalent of the Ku Klux Klan, not even in reprisal. There is no Irish equivalent of the Orangemen nor of organizations like Protestants and Others United.

Last week I read in a news magazine a report filed by a group of Protestant ministers concerning what they were pleased to call violations of religious freedom in carefully selected areas of the world. I later read that some of their own leaders, lay and clerical, had repudiated the report for the specious phony that it is. But, nonetheless, it is typical of the kind of talk heard whenever one asks why a world so sensitive to discrimination elsewhere is so silent concerning the unparalleled discrimination by which an Irish minority in Ulster is virtually disenfranchised, while the overwhelming majority of the Irish people are denied self-determination of their own nation by the Orange minority in the six counties.

The fraudulent report of the ministers speaks of Ireland as one place where religious liberty is allegedly denied. For one wild moment it looked as if a truthful phrase had blossomed by chance in their report and that the ministers were referring to Northern Ireland, where religious persecution, coupled with economic and social discrimination on a strictly religious basis, has been and is the normal state of affairs.

But no. Come to find out, the report referred to the Irish Republic—and the Protestant government in Ulster was given a clean bill of health.

Seumas MacManus said the final word on this hypocrisy over 30 years ago when he wrote. "While such an idea as a Catholic mayor for Protestant Derry and Protestant Belfast is laughably absurd, such Catholic cities as Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Kilkenny, often honor Protestant citizens by making them their first magistrates. And while the idea of a Catholic Member of Parliament sitting for any of the Protestant counties of the northeast is ludicrously laughable, purely Catholic counties in both north and south frequently elect Protestants to represent them in Parliament.

"And finally, and above all, be it remembered that almost every man whom the Irish Catholics chose as their national leader from the days of Robert Emmet to the days of Charles Stewart Parnell, has been Protestant.

"There is bigotry in Ireland—bigotry of the most intolerant, most rampant type—but it is almost entirely confined to non-Catholics of the Brito-Irish part of the population."

The recent report of the ministers reminds us again of the old couplet:

"Forgiveness to the injured doth belong,
They ne'er forgive who do the wrong."

The other arguments advanced in favor of partition are equally fraudulent. Only a hypocrite would present them; only a fool would believe them. This is so much the case that I cannot believe partition can endure unless hypocrisy and folly are forever to gain the day. When common sense, common decency, and the voice of Christian conscience are again heard in international affairs, sheer logic will put an end to the farce of partition. No violent words need be spoken; no rebel shot need be fired; no involved diplomatic formulas need be devised or invoked.

That is why the defenders of partition are the only ones who are talking wildly these days. Our kinsmen, the Irish, are presenting the case against partition with reasoned dignity and Christian calm. The railing, the rudeness, and the vulgarity are all on the other side. Witness the bad-mannered, ill-considered attack of the Christian Science Monitor, for example, on the pronouncement here in Boston and elsewhere of His Excellency, the recently appointed Ambassador of Ireland to the United States. The Monitor departed from its customary pose of impartial objectivity in an attempt to render absurd the statesmanlike declaration of Mr. Hearn concerning the determination of the Irish people to achieve their national unity and their determination to achieve it without violence.

"National unity is the chief aim of the Irish people," the Ambassador said, "The whole soil of Ireland is the property and domain of the whole Irish people of today.

"Those who will tell you it is a complicated problem and plead for a division are as false as the woman who wanted to solve the problem of ownership of a little child in King Solomon's day by cutting it into two pieces.

"We want unity, but we also want peace. We are determined to achieve unity without a civil war."

That is statesmanlike talk. What is more important, it is also sensible talk. Their kinsmen in American and the lovers of justice everywhere will wish the Irish every blessing in their effort to fulfill the legitimate aspirations of their nation within the framework of a policy inspired by a love for peace and a determination to preserve it.

So, I express the hope of you all that our generation will see Ireland one day united. The end of partition will bring a breath of hope to enslaved nations everywhere. The moral resistance to partition already sustains such hope: They who struggle for freedom are already free.

We who love America are naturally interested in the land which taught our people how and why and with what passion we must love this land of liberty. We who know the joy of living in a united nation—one nation under God, one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all—are under a special obligation to be sympathetic with the aspirations of old Ireland.

God bless America. Erin go Bragh. God bless Ireland.

Telegram From Relatives of Soldiers in First Marine Division

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PRINCE H. PRESTON, JR.
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. PRESTON. Mr. Speaker, knowing the deep and heartfelt concern felt by relatives of men in the First Marine Division as they battle bitter cold and a ruthless enemy to free themselves from entrapment, I wish to insert the following telegram, which reveals that mothers, fathers, and wives of these men are praying for their deliverance and for divine guidance for those of us who occupy positions of responsibility in connection with our military effort in Korea. It is a touching message, quite unlike any other I have ever received. It should point out to everyone the importance of making Christian petition on behalf of our valiant soldiers. The telegram follows:

SAVANNAH, GA., December 6, 1950.

Hon. PRINCE H. PRESTON,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.:

Please deliver this telegram personally to President Truman. Prayerfully, our hearts bleeding by reason of the plight of our boys in Korea, we have assembled to ask God's protection for our boys and God's direction for you as you seek means to protect our boys' lives and to guarantee the priceless God-given gifts for which they have been mobilized. Following signatures are parents and relatives of First Marine Division:

Mr. and Mrs. Albert Galkin, Mr. and Mrs. Irving Alpern, Mrs. R. C. Walsh, Mr. and Mrs. I. J. Ryan, Sr., Mrs. Marie H. Rimes, Miss Cornelia Hattrich, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Lawhon, Mr. and Mrs. M. R. Gandy, Mrs. Lawrence R. Kellerman, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Bell, Mrs. Inez Hall, Mrs. William A. Hall, Mrs. James D. Hall, Mrs. Carolyn Richardson, Mrs. John E. McCrary, Mrs. Sally Stahl, Mrs. Robert Lee Weldy, Mrs. R. C. Weldy, Sr., Mrs. E. M. Howell, Mrs. John K. Stacy, Mrs. Charles G. Laird, Mrs. Julian O'Neal, J. W. Amending the Housing and Rent Control Act of 1947

OF
HON. JOHN F. KENNEDY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, last April I spoke at length on the floor of this House about the need then for continued Federal rent control. If it was needed then, as I believe it was, it is obviously most critically needed now.

In the all-out defense effort which we must make, increased taxes and controls will exact great sacrifices of this Nation's citizens. As in the past, they will bear these sacrifices gladly. But, surely, those millions now under Federal rent control have a right to expect that they will be guarded against excessive rent increases and possible eviction from their homes.

Already they are feeling a heavy burden. The October 15 consumer's index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics showed that the cost of living for the average family was 174.8 percent of the 1935–39 average, 31 percent higher than at the end of price control in June 1946 and an all-time high.

In my own State of Massachusetts an overwhelming majority of the voters in the last election, through a referendum, indicated their desire to have Federal rent control continued through next June. And, of course, in accord with the present Rent Control Act, they will be so protected, as will the others who have acted affirmatively on the matter.

I do think, however, that the seven-thousand-odd communities with a population over one thousand in the Nation which have not as yet acted on the question must be given the same protection.

It is imperative that this House pass the rent-control-extension measure now before us.

Furthermore, unless conditions improve a great deal, I, for one, will fight for a further extension of rent control in the next Congress.

The Korean Catastrophe and the Way Ahead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. STENNIS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, it was my privilege on Tuesday night to attend the annual dinner of the American Municipal Congress, held in the city of Washington, and to hear on that occasion an address by the able and distinguished junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS]. I do not recall ever having heard a clearer and more understandable expression of the events leading up to and existing in the present confused state of world affairs, nor have I ever listened to a more inspiring and eloquent declaration of certain fundamental ideas and ideals, upon which I am convinced the destiny of this great Nation rests in this most trying hour. With the same fine sense of values and with the same frankness, sincerity, and courage that he has come to personify in this body, the Senator from Illinois, in this splendid address, won increased admiration and respect from those who were privileged to hear it—a fact that was attested by the universal and extended ovation that was accorded him at the conclusion of his remarks on that occasion.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD; and I commend it to the careful attention of every Member of the Senate.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mayor Newton and friends, it is especially pleasant to have the opportunity of thinking out loud before a group of mayors and councilmen and city officials because one of the most thrilling experiences of my life was when I had the opportunity of serving as alderman in the city of Chicago. There was only one experience equally thrilling and that was when I had the honor of being a private in the Marine Corps. The two experiences were very similar, I can assure you.

I am certainly not an adequate substitute for Mr. Acheson, and I certainly do not know what the State Department's line is in the present situation, and like my colleagues, I speak only for myself, but I do want to discuss with you as best I may the extraordinarily grave situation in which we find ourselves in Korea.

We have just suffered the most crushing military defeat in the history of the United States. Our Korean allies, who have fought bravely by our side since June, have been largely broken by the attack of the Chinese Communists; our Eighth Army, which has been in the west of Korea, has been forced to retreat and is now moving southward in apparently an orderly withdrawal, but nevertheless doing so after a very bruising defeat; our Tenth Corps, consisting of my old division, the First Marine Division, and the magnificent Seventh Army Division, are surrounded by Chinese Communists, and while they have regrouped themselves, are trying to fight themselves out from a very severe trap. It is probably the most severe military defeat which our armies have suffered in the whole history of this country.

This military defeat is, of course, forcing people to think over the question of what we should do next in Korea and what we should do elsewhere. There are those abroad and some at home who say that we should make terms with Communist China and that we should seek an agreement by which we would be able to evacuate our troops from Korea in safety. I hasten to say that this is not my point of view, but it is held by many and is being advanced by some. There are those who believe that we should stay and fight it out to the best of our ability, and there are those who favor some intermediate solution.

Now I read an editorial in a leading American paper 2 days ago which implied that during this period of crisis Americans should keep still, should wait to have the decisions made by the President, the Secretary of State, and the party leaders in conjunction with the British and with some advice from the French, and that we should go along with whatever decision is made, but that we should not discuss it too much while the crucial decisions are under way. This seems to me to be in error. Democracy was not intended merely to deal with unimportant issues. If there is anything to the principles of democracy, and we naturally believe there is a great deal, they should apply to important issues, to crucial issues when the life of a nation is at stake and not merely be reserved for minor affairs.

Of course those who discuss these national issues should do so in a temperate fashion, with guarded speech, and with no intent to promote disunity, but rather with the intent to promote greater national unity. It is in that spirit that I shall at least try to speak, but I shall try to speak frankly and to the point.

THE RECORD SINCE 1945

This catastrophe which has happened to us in Korea is not an isolated act. It is the culmination of a long series of acts by Russia during the last 5½ years and is thoroughly consistent with the whole process of history during that period. I have no intention of recounting the history of these last 5½ years, but I shall very briefly contrast American policy with Russian policy so that the public at least may draw its conclusions as to which side has the preponderance of merit.

We disarmed from a strength of 13,000,000 men to 1,500,000, and at the outbreak of the Korean attack we did not have more than 12 bobtail divisions. Russia probably did not cut its total force by more than half and now has from 175 to 200 divisions which even with their smaller tables of organization amount to from 130 to 145 American divisions.

We offered to share with the entire world the great secret of atomic energy which our scientists had discovered. We offered to put our stock of atomic bombs into a world pool to be denatured and to surrender our secrets to an international authority which would henceforth use atomic energy for the purposes of peace, provided only that two conditions were met: First, that there should not be merely a verbal pledge on the part of the nations to refrain from the production of atomic bombs, but that there should be an adequate system of international inspection under which international authorities could inspect the facilities of every country to determine whether or not this pledge was being observed. The acid test of our sincerity was that we were willing to permit Russian members of the international commission to inspect our facilities on condition that American members of the international commission could inspect Russian facilities. The proposed plan provided also that if this international commission found one of the nations to be violating its agreement not to make atomic bombs, that nation, when hauled before the Security Council of the United Nations, was not to have the power of veto—that the accused in the dock should not be permitted to serve at the same time as a judge on the bench.

This was the acid test of sincerity, and it was a test which America was willing to meet, but which Russia refused to meet. Russia behaved, indeed, as though it preferred to have both countries possess the atomic bomb rather than for neither country to possess it, apparently believing that we would be prevented from using the atomic bomb in a surprise attack both by our Constitution, which gives to Congress the power to declare war, and by our humanitarianism, which would prevent an attack in the absence of a declaration of war. But Russia as a police state would not be inhibited by either constitutional or humanitarian scruples.

We have sought through the United Nations to create a pooled force which would resist aggression wherever it manifested itself. We knew that the United Nations in this phase of its work could operate only if the great powers agreed. But Russia has used the veto power even prior to the Korean crisis no less than 44 times and has prevented the Security Council from being an agency to deter aggression.

We had hoped that the new world order would be one organized not merely to prevent war but one also organized to enhance the arts of peace. And so we have been largely instrumental in building up the cluster of affiliated organizations—the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization, the International Bank, the International Monetary Fund, the organization which goes by the rather mouth-filling term of United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization, and other international orgnizations—and we have loyally supported these bodies. Russia has refused to join any one of them.

We have sought to negotiate peace treaties for Italy, for Austria, for Germany, and for Japan. After nearly 2 years of wrangling we were successful in getting a peace treaty with Italy, but Russia has prevented a peace treaty from being negotiated for Austria, for Germany, and for Japan. It refused to join in the pledge of Secretary Byrnes for first a 20-year and then a 40-year joint occupation of a united Germany which would have enabled the German people to live together and at the same time offered Russia protection from the fear of German attack which at that time she felt was real.

We have stripped ourselves of our colonial empire by freeing the Philippines, and we had given up the Platt amendment, which gave us the right to intervene in Cuba. But Russia, in violation of the terms of the Yalta Agreement, did not permit free elections in Poland, in Bulgaria, or in Rumania, and applied covert military pressure upon Hungary and Czechoslovakia; so that, while the transferences of power in those countries were ostensibly legal, they were nevertheless conducted under the threat of force.

We offered, in one of the greatest demonstrations of generosity in the history of the world, to spend our economic resources for the reconstruction of all Europe, eastern and central Europe as well as western. Russia refused to come in herself, which was her right; she refused to permit her satellites to join. She has carried on a campaign of vitriolic denunciation in western Europe which has almost amounted to direct sabotage, and she has unloosed the full barrage of propaganda against America, against American intentions, against American actions.

In a number of cases she has tried out the world will to resist by open military acts of aggression—such as keeping her troops in Persia in 1946 in violation of a previous pledge, threatening Turkey in the summer and fall of that year, in the border warfare which she conducted against Greece in 1946 and 1947, and in the suspension of land transportation to Berlin in 1948. The interesting thing is that in each and every one of these cases of aggression the powers of the world rallied with sufficient force to compel Russia to back down. It was as though each year Russia were trying the will to resist of the democratic nations and each time when she found that the democratic nations could work together Russia ceded ground.

I submit, therefore, that, while America may have had faults in its foreign policy since 1945, on the whole our policy has been one of extraordinary generosity in which we have spent nearly $30,000,000,000 for other peoples. It has been an extraordinary attempt to work with other countries for the benefit of world peace. While it may be possible to find some good features in Russian foreign policy since that time—although I confess I have not been able to find them—the distinction between us is sharp and clear, and our consciences should on the whole be easy and steady. Our record has been a good record, and, if trouble comes, there will not be much opportunity for us to question our motives or for the world to point the finger of scorn.

THE KOREAN SITUATION

You all know the Korean situation: A division of that territory at the thirty-eighth parallel, with Russia receiving the surrender of Japanese troops above that parallel, and the United States receiving the surrender below. In the pamphlet issued by the State Department on the Korean situation it was stated that the choice of the thirty-eighth parallel was purely accidental. This may be so, although I am somewhat struck with the fact that it was at precisely the thirty-eighth parallel that the Russian and Japanese division of Korea existed prior to the Russo-Japanese War of 1904.

North of the thirty-eighth parallel Russia organized a police state as it has organized police states in all of its satellite countries, a state in which only one party was permitted, in which political opponents were arrested without warrant and sentenced to imprisonment without a trial, a state in which the all-too-familiar and all-too-terrible aspects of terror as an organized force were wielded by the government.

South of the thirty-eighth parallel we organized a democratic state with freedom of speech, opposing and conflicting political parties, the opportunity of all men to speak their minds. We gladly welcomed the commission from the United Nations which asked for an election, we allowed this election to take place, and we gladly surrendered power to the government which was elected. We took extraordinary precautions to see that the police force or incipient army which we set up for South Korea should not be put in a position where it could attack North Korea. We equipped this army with small arms, machine guns, and artillery up to perhaps 90 millimeters. But we did not give them airplanes, and we did not give them tanks, because we were afraid that if these were given the South Korean Army might start trouble by invading North Korea.

Russia, of course, refused even to permit the commission from the United Nations to enter the territory north of the thirty-eighth parallel.

Then came the attack on the 25th of June. We have been proceeding on the diplomatic fiction that this was an attack by North Koreans, but we know, of course, that it was conducted with Russian consent, with Russian direction, and at least down to the divisional level that there were Russian staff officers who were assisting.

The decision that we made 2 days later to come to the aid of South Korea was made without much public discussion.

At this juncture when things have apparently turned out so badly and when whispers are being bruited about that we should not have intervened, I think it is proper to ask ourselves what would have happened had we not done so.

In the first place Korea would have been quickly overrun, but that would have been only the beginning. Almost immediately the Communists would have started at the north of the Malay Peninsula and would have worked down into Indochina. Indochina would have fallen, and then communism, under Chinese direction, would have moved down the entire Malay Peninsula, because there are underground Communist movements in most of these countries, and the Malay Peninsula would quickly have gone Communist. With India subjected to Communist pressure at the north from Tibet and Communist influence from the east in Indochina, India, too, would have gone, and in the space perhaps of a comparatively few months, certainly not more than a year or two, all of Asia would have passed under Communist control.

But the effects would not have been confined to Asia. It would have been said by the peoples of Europe that when communism attacked, the free nations of the world did not defend. The doubters, the trembiers, those whose lives were not firmly rooted in principle would have gone over to Russia. Russian prestige would have risen. Western Germany would have lost any will to resist and would have moved rather quickly into the Communist orbit. The French will to resist, which at best has been at least somewhat wavering, would have weakened, and, while conjecture is perhaps idle, it would seem to me that western and continental Europe would in a comparatively short period of time have gone Communist.

Would Russia have been appeased by our failure to intervene? The record of Russia since 1945 and the record of its fellow police states in the thirties indicate that a police state is not appeased by other nations yielding to it. Its appetite is only increased, its rapacity is heightened, its power is strengthened, its contempt for those who yield becomes still deeper.

So I submit that we should have no regrets at having intervened in Korea. We did the only honorable thing, throwing in our force to defend people who without provocation were being attacked, and we did it, at least 99 44/100 percent of the way, through the United Nations.

You may say that our first commitment of naval and air forces was in conformity with the resolution of the day before, on Sunday. Certainly our commitment of ground troops 2 days later was in conformity with the decision of the Security Council that no nation should help the aggressors in North Korea and that all members should come to the aid of South Korea. We have borne our share of the battle with honor and restraint; we have committed a large portion of our armed strength, probably indeed the majority of our armed strength. We have taken heavy casualties, at least 6,000 men killed, over 20,000 wounded. We can be proud of the way in which we have spent our blood and our resources to defend the peace of the world.

It is not for an American to criticize the decisions of other countries, and no one wishes to say anything at this hour to reflect on other nations or to disparage what they have done. But I think it is the feeling of all of us that it would have been far better if the other great powers of the world, which had joined in the Security Council resolution to come to the aid of the nation which was attacked, had made more adequate contributions in men. The peace of the world cannot be upheld by one nation alone. The United Nations can only serve if it is the expression of a combined will and determination.

Then, after misfortunes crowned with a brilliant strategic move, we came back up to the thirty-eighth parallel. It has been intimated that we made another mistake here; that we should have stopped and not gone beyond the thirty-eighth parallel. Let's examine that contention.

Suppose we had done so, what would have happened? The North Korean Army would have reformed its combat divisions north of the thirty-eighth parallel and would have been a continuous threat to our troops south of that parallel. The purpose of a police force is to break the organized will of your opponent—that is the purpose of combat—and had we stopped that organized will would not have been broken and the threat would always have remained. So I submit that we acted properly in going north and, of course, we acted in conformity with the decision of the United Nations expressed by vote of the Assembly.

It was decided that we should go ahead, but we truthfully assured the Chinese that we had no intention of pursuing the North Koreans north of the Yalu River. We had no intentions upon Chinese territory. Our only purpose was to unify Korea so that the Korean people could decide what kind of a government they wanted and so that aggression would not conquer. We gave a pledge through the United Nations that we would not destroy the power stations on the southern bank of the Yalu River which furnished power both to Korea itself and to Manchuria.

Then we found in these last 10 days that Chinese Communists, whose aid hitherto had been covert, were now sending their troops across the river and committing their half a million to a million men in an organized drive against us and against our allies.

Let there be no mistake about this: This could not have been done without Russian consent or without Russian direction. These Chinese troops, as the North Korean troops had been, were equipped, trained, and drilled by the Russians, and were fighting with Russian supplies.

WHAT SHALL WE DO?

Now, as I say, we have suffered this crushing and humiliating defeat, and this defeat has touched off currents of defeatism in this country and waves of defeatism abroad.

It is said by some, "Let's evacuate our men; if we cannot evacuate them under gunfire, let us make terms with the Chinese so that we can bring them off." That, at least, seemed to be the spirit of the United Press dispatches as of Sunday from Great Britain and France, although that sentiment may have changed in the last 2 days.

It is being said in those countries, and it is also being said to some degree in this country, that we do not have enough troops to defend both Korea and Asia on the one hand and Western Europe upon the other, and that therefore we should choose between them; Western Europe with the 50,000,000 tons of steel which can be produced there and the industrial resources of Western Europe are more important to us than Asia, and therefore we should withdraw our troops from Korea and transfer them to Europe and try to protect the Atlantic Pact nations.

Now let us examine this point of view. Let us ask ourselves what it would involve, what would happen if we were to seek, as these defeatists urge us to seek, an agreement with Communist China which would permit our troops to be brought out in safety.

The Chinese Communists told us before we were defeated what their terms were. They laid down their terms in very direct language before we suffered this military defeat. We can be certain that their terms would not be any less stringent now than they were then, that in all probability they would be more stringent. Those terms were very directly stated: That we should abandon Korea, that we should turn over Formosa to the Chinese Communists, that we should permit the entrance of Communist China into the United Nations with a seat on the Security Council.

Fut that would be merely the first consequence of any such agreement as this. Almost immediately upon the signing of any such agreement there would be the fall of Indochina which is having a hard time to keep out of Communist hands anyway, and then, as I have said, communism would go over the entire Malay Peninsula in the space of weeks and 125,000,000 to 150,000,000 Malayans would go under Communist direction, including the new, the struggling, the hopeful Republic of Indonesia. India could not hold out, and we would have at least a billion Asiatics, brown and yellow people, added to the 600,000,000 now under Communist domination. Two-thirds of the population of the world would be under Russian control.

But what would happen to Europe also? Proponents of this doctrine seem to think that our position in Europe would still be as strong. We remember the wave of defeatism which swept over the world after Munich. Believe me, the wave of defeatism after any such agreement as this would be far more demoralizing and far more terrible. Western Germany has been reluctant to arm because it did not know whether it would be defended and because it did not know whether there would be a will to resist on the part of the so-called democracies. The sentiment in Germany has varied almost directly with the progress of our armies in Korea, being proresistance when we were winning in Korea, being antiresistance or indifferent to resistance as we were losing in Korea. The abandonment of Korea under these terms would send millions, perhaps tens of millions, of West Germans into the hands of the Communists.

Can you believe that this dry rot would stop in Germany? All of Europe would feel it, France and England alike. The French have been somewhat shaky on this matter; they would become shakier still. This huge and crushing defeat would demoralize those who believe in effective resistance to aggression, and it would make France, Italy, Belgium, and Holland rather ripe plums for the Communists to take. Sturdy Britain would, of course, resist longer, but Britain is extraordinarily vulnerable to the threats of rocket attack and guided missiles from the continent and could perhaps be forced into at least neutrality once the continent of Europe was occupied by the Communists.

In my judgment abandonment of Korea under these conditions would not only mean the speedy loss of all Asia; it would also mean the loss of Europe as well. And I would like to ask—and I say this delicately because one does not wish to inflame the situation—I would like to ask whether there would be a hearty disposition on the part of the American people, after having lost heavily in Korea, then to commit their strength to the continent of Europe where a dubious fate would await our armies? Would there be much popular support for a program of supporting Western Europe with arms and troops if we had been compelled to knuckle under and sign an agreement to get out of Korea at the point of a gun? I think this position would be particularly weakened if our allies were those who urged us to get out because they thought that the risk was too great.

I know that it is easy for anyone in the Statler Hotel after a comfortable dinner to lay down a program of resistance. I think I know something of the feelings of soldiers under fire, and I think I have some concern for the lives of our men who are fighting in Korea. It so happens, as I have said, that one of the divisions which is trapped is my old division, the division with which I had the honor to fight and serve, a division which includes large numbers of my personal friends, both in enlisted and officer ranks. But I think I know also what the sentiment of all true fighting men is—that resistance is better than dishonor and that no military situation is hopeless as long as there is the determination to hold on.

We have suffered a disaster, yes, but while I do not read the military dispatches from the front, it would seem to me that the situation is not hopeless. Our Eighth Army is still intact and is apparently retreating in good form and can regroup itself north of Seoul at about the old thirty-eighth parallel. We are all praying that the Tenth Corps, consisting of the Seventh Division and the First Marine Division, can fight their way out; and if they can—I think I know something of the spirit of those men—they, too, will not want to be evacuated by ship, but they will want to take their place in a new position east of the Eighth Army.

Now we come to the possible use of the troops of the Chinese Nationalists. There have been many who have urged in the past that we should have used these troops. There are close to 600,000 on Formosa, and Chiang Kai-shek has offered something over 30,000.

For some time I admit that I was not certain in my own mind whether or not these troops should be used. I did not urge their use. I was somewhat afraid that if they were used their use would be represented as an act of war against the Chinese people, that the Chinese Communists would be able to stir up the sentiment of their people against us, and so I was one who kept his mouth shut with a good deal of uncertainty when these proposals were made. But I am uncertain no longer. We are in a desperate struggle. We need every bit of aid that we can get. The troops of Chiang Kai-shek are anti-Communist. In my judgment, we should use them, and use them as speedily as possible.

Now I know it will be said, "Yes; but he is not a decent ally." Well, I have been somewhat scrupulous on this question of allies. I was 1 of 14 Senators who voted against the loan to Franco Spain. I have had doubts about aid given to Tito. I have not wished to deal with any dictators, whether of the left or right, but all the time I have thought of an experience I had in Chicago, and I hope you will forgive me when I relate it.

Members of my party—I will not say which party—were making out a county slate one time many years ago, and, strangely enough, I was called in to consult on the making up of this slate. I was called out of the room for a telephone message. When I came back I found a certain man had been put on the ticket. I did not like him, I did not think he was a good candidate, and I rushed up to the chairman of the county committee and I said, "George, why did you put that fellow on the ticket? Don't you know he is a son-of-a-gun?" The chairman looked at me a moment and said, "Yes; he is a son-of-a-gun, but he is our son-of-a-gun."

Sometimes things get as primitive as that, and if you wait until you have perfect allies in this world, as all of you who are mayors and councilmen know, you will be very lonely.

So this is a confession on my part. I am ready to take my allies now where I can find them. It would be very rough medicine, like the sulphur and molasses my mother used to give me for a spring cleaning out, but I am ready to take Franco and I am ready to take Tito. I don't like it, but we are in a struggle for survival, and during our last struggle we took Joe Stalin as an ally. Well, surely Chiang and Franco and Tito, while they may not be candidates for a ladies' sewing circle, are not any worse than Joe. So I am ready to take Chiang, and I would like to see us get his troops into Korea very quickly.

Now, Senators have a way of popping off and creating international incidents by what they say. Someone once said that a Senator is a man who should have a clothespin attached to his upper and lower lip to keep him from talking. I hope our British and our French friends will not misunderstand me—and they are our friends, may I say—but we would welcome a larger contribution from them.

When I say that we would welcome that, I know that they have heavy burdens to bear—the French have a war in Indochina, the British have a war in Malaya, they are still recovering from having borne the brunt of the attack in World War II, and their governmental expenses are great—but I submit that the maintenance of peace is their affair as well as ours and, without embittering the situation, contributions from them would be extremely welcome.

Now I want to say something that is in no sense a threat. I have no desire to make a threat. I have no power to make a threat, and I hope it won't be construed as a threat. I should like to ask our British and French friends in all friendliness, how can they expect American lives to be poured out in their defense if they will not help us to defend Korea? In particular, cannot the British join us in a blockade of Communist China instead of allowing Hong Kong to be used as a funnel through which supplies are being poured into China to our loss? The British people, noble in their desires, do not want a small group of powerful traders to profit temporarily from this trade if it strengthens, as it does, those who are attacking our armies and who are waging an aggressive war.

We have one weapon of our own, the atom bomb—a terrible weapon, one which we shrink from using, one which we have refrained from using, one which is not particularly adapted to this type of warfare because from a military standpoint it is most effective against closely concentrated industrial targets and not upon diffused armies in the field, one which will have difficulties in its application because in battle the attackers and the defenders are frequently so close together that if you apply it to your opponents you also apply it to yourselves. But I submit—once you make the moral decision that you will resist force with force, once you make that decision, once you decide that nations in order to preserve freedom must use the weapons of the flesh to oppose other weapons of the flesh—that the atom bomb at least in its military use against opposing military forces is not generally different from any other type of force. It is merely force carried to its last and terrible conclusion. It is no more immoral to kill an opposing soldier—and I emphasize soldier—with an atom bomb than it is to kill him with a rifle or a hand grenade or a machine gun or a 155-millimeter shell.

I submit, therefore, that if it is militarily possible to do so and if we have no other effective weapons, we should not be restrained in our use of the atom bomb against the opposing military forces, although I bar from this the use of the A-bomb against civilian units in Manchuria both because of humanitarianism and because of my belief that if it were so used it would in all likelihood set the peoples of Asia against us. But I see no reason, if the situation is militarily desperate and if the atom bomb can be used against the opposing military forces without appreciably hurting our own troops, why we should refrain from its use. General Collins is doubtful of its value, but within these limited objectives I do not believe we should refuse to employ it.

Then we get to the question of what to do with Russia. We have turned the other cheek many times, but on acts of aggression we have turned it twice. We have pretended that the attack by North Korea against South Korea was purely an action of North Korea. We have pretended that the action of Communist China was purely an action by Communist China and was not an action by Russia. We know that both of these assumptions have been false, but we made them diplomatically in order to reduce the danger of a general war.

It does credit to our restraint; it does credit, I think, to our diplomacy. There is an incident from Jules Verne's Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea which is very appropriate here. I believe Mr. Stassen used this analogy in a speech in August, but since I had used it a month before, I hope you will forgive me if I again recall this story of Jules Verne which many of us read as children.

You remember that the deep sea diver in this scientific novel of Jules Verne's was at the bottom of the ocean when he was attacked by an octopus which reached out one tentacle to sweep him in. The diver chopped that tentacle off with a sharp sword. Then the octopus reached out another tentacle and the diver then chopped that off. Then another tentacle reached up and the diver decided that these movements of the tentacles were not independent but proceeded from a decision on the part of a central nervous system, and so instead of chopping off the third tentacle he thrust with his sword at the eye of the octopus.

Now as Christians we all should hold, to a large degree at least, to the teachings of Jesus in His Sermon on the Mount when he told us to turn the other cheek. This is a principle which if we have the strength of character to apply it is capable of great use on the part of one individual to another. I think the happiest moments in the lives of many of us have been when we have been able to transform enemies into friends by just such actions as that.

This principle has also great application on the part of one liberal state to another liberal state where peoples can speak to peoples, but it is relatively ineffective when applied by a liberal state to a police state because a police state does not permit you to make an appeal to the conscience of its subjects.

I have come to the conclusion, and I confess it is a largely non-Christian conclusion, that there is a limit to the number of times we should turn our cheek. We have turned it once, we have turned it twice, but I go on the old American slogan of "three strikes and you're out." I have come to the conclusion that the next aggressive movement by a satellite should be regarded by us as an act of war and that we should then unleash such power as we have directly upon Russia itself.

What I am saying is this: that the cause is not hopeless in Korea; that resistance on the part of brave men is fundamental. I believe the soldiers in the field would have us believe that bravery and courage can transform difficult situations into victorious situations. Courage is a military element, but courage is needed even more by a civilian population. We should reach our decision without bravado, without flag-waving, without denunciatory language, but with a determination that we shall continue to resist and that we will not make any deal under which we evacuate Korea.

Now if we resist it is of course possible that we may still be defeated and that we may be compelled to try to withdraw our troops from Korea by ship, but if that should happen let it be an honorable withdrawal, a withdrawal under gun fire, not a withdrawal purchased by ignominious surrender.

This is a decision which should be taken by the civilian population with full recognition of the dangers and the hardships. In my judgment, it is the only one which gives honor and which gives any chance for ultimate safety. But it must be supported with full vigor and it must be accompanied by almost complete and speedy rearmament.

I don't know whether the figures are classified, but I would not imagine that our strength now is greatly in excess of the million and a half that we had in June. While I'm not a military expert I submit that we must now really go to work and become as strong as possible in the shortest time. We need at least 4,000,000 men in our Ground Forces with at least 50 divisions, of which I hope at least 4 or 5 will be Marine divisions. In the Navy and Air Force, we shall need at least one and one-half million to two million more, making a total of 6,000,000 men under arms—or four to four and one-half million more under arms than we had last June.

If we employ the ratio of one and one-half to two civilian workers in war industries to every man in uniform, we come up with a total of seven to eight million more needed in war industries, or a total conversion of from 11,000,000 to 13,000,000 persons. Since we have virtually no unemployment upon which to draw, this will mean diversion of civilian industries to war industries. This will require the added expenditure of at least $40,000,000,000 more a year for military purposes than is in the budget for 1950–51. The total budget for war purposes which we will need will be close to $55,000,000,000, and even with the economies which we should make in the civilian budget the total Federal budget will be slightly over $80,000,000,000 or about 30 percent of total national income.

It will require a rigid program of taxation if we are to head off inflation. And I hope we will not be driven to the easy expedient of trying to borrow from banks because that will merely mean the creation of checkbook money which will send up prices and cause inflation and cause the burdens of the war to be borne by those least able to bear them. I hope we can have restraint and determination enough to see that we tax adequately or if we do borrow that the borrowings are made out of savings from current income rather than by checkbook money. It means, in short, that we must go on a war economy speedily and without delay.

You say these conditions are hard. They are very hard. They are not made of our choice; they have been forced upon us. Our choice is whether we will meet these conditions—whether we will meet the threat of aggression with determination—or whether we will weakly and supinely acquiesce. If we acquiesce, in my judgment western civilization, political democracy, and humanitarianism as we know it are doomed. The price of survival is effort and sacrifice of the most intense kind.

Mr. Newton, this has been a very somber speech but it has been somber only because of the conditions, only because I have tried, however imperfectly, to speak honestly about the dangers which are ahead.

United States Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, last Friday night, December 1, it was my pleasure to participate in a radio interview over Station WRC of the National Broadcasting Co. on the regular Forum Pro and Con. The theme of the program was United States foreign policy. I ask that the extemporaneous comments which I made on the program, as well as the questions put to me by Mr. Leif Eid, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF RADIO PROGRAM

Mr. EID. Pro and Con this week was transcribed in the Radio Gallery of the United States Senate, with Senator ALEXANDER WILEY (Republican, Wisconsin) in the absence of Senator VANDENBERG as the top-ranking Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Thus, Senator WILEY is in a position to speak from studied experience on the broad aspects of our foreign policy. Senator WILEY, do you feel, as many do, that foreign policy played a large part in the elections?

Senator WILEY. Well, Leif, you know this is no time to indulge in merely picking up things out of the past. We are faced with such tremendous challenges now that the only real question is: Where do we go from here? I think, however, that from my campaigning throughout my own State, I can say that some of the mistakes that were made by the executive branch did play a part in the election.

In other words, my constituency were very much concerned with: Where do we go from here; and whether or not in the past we had made such mistakes that they precipitated us into the present affray. I think basically that we have got to consider the present-day problem and not spend too much time on the past, except that we must profit from those mistakes.

Mr. EID. Well, Senator, with the elections over, do you feel there is more chance of bipartisanship in foreign policy—bipartisanship that will work effectively?

Senator WILEY. Of course, as you said in your opening statement, whenever America faces a crisis, or whenever we have gotten into war, we lay aside the small things and we focus our attention upon the real problem. The real problem is the preservation of America and any man who has eyes to see with and ears to hear with, as the Good Book says, must realize that that problem is the only pertinent and the only big problem, and it requires all our attention and all our vision and all our judgment and our faith.

MISTAKES OF THE PAST

Mr. EID. Well, Senator WILEY, just a moment ago you spoke of mistakes of the past. Do you feel that our present crisis is traceable to any specific mistakes in the past?

Senator WILEY. Yes; I think that in the past we have been so naive in dealing with this Russian situation—and I don't say this critically—I say it simply factually that I feel that now at long last this Korean situation has opened the eyes of those in government who should have had their eyes opened before. Certainly Korea today, with its challenge, was due in large part that we thought, as Roosevelt said, he could deal with the Russians.

Think of Berlin. Just think of Berlin. There we were so naive that we took a part of Berlin and didn't have brains enough to take even a cow path to it. As a result, came the cost of $600,000,000 in the airlift. There are a number of other instances that could be quoted. But, again I say, let us not forget the past, but let us neither center our attention upon the past. Let us learn from our mistakes and now meet the present challenge head on.

PSYCHOLOGICAL WARFARE

Mr. EID. Well, Senator, aside from past errors, what is your estimate of the present situation and the steps we should take to meet it?

Senator WILEY. Well, I spoke on the Senate floor just about 15 minutes ago on what I thought was imperatively necessary. I am not a military man, but I feel that we have not utilized those forces that we should to penetrate the Russian segment. I am talking, of course, about psychological warfare about which much has been said. I spoke on it at length today.

But I am speaking also about something else. In China today, we know that there are dissident elements there that are quite large. We should get them into action, fighting the Communists. And in Russia today there are 190,000,000 people you must know that are not Communists at heart. Practically every family, as a Washington professor said recently, has either someone who has been liquidated or someone who was in concentration camp. That provides rich soil where we can plant a seed of ferment that might well eventually overturn Russia and solve the problem far better than our going into a great world war.

Mr. EID. Senator WILEY, do you have any ideas about how to reach these people?

Senator WILEY. Yes; of course. If you have read the recent article in the Readers Digest by this professor, he tells you definitely how to do that. It is in the November issue. But I might say, paraphrasing the answer, that 2 years ago about now, while I was in Bermuda representing this Goverment as the head of a Committee to the Empire Parliamentary Conference I called to attention of the British how they could penetrate. Just think of the whole coast—the whole great mass of Russian Siberia. Think of the fact that there are over 70 different nationalities there with their different desires, and think of the purges. And you have the White Russians all over the world that, if utilized, would also penetrate. Recently people have gone all through Russia and come back and made reports. There is even a book published on dissent inside Russia, and that is the thing we have utterly failed in capitalizing upon. We have been like children—just children—in this great political world of ours.

EUROPEAN CRISIS

Mr. EID. Well, Senator, right now we have our eyes focused on Korea and the rest of Asia. But Secretary Acheson said only recently that the real danger—the real danger area—is western Europe. Do you agree with that statement?

Senator WILEY. Why the whole world is a danger area. But, of course, the Secretary's conclusion, I think, is correct. In other words, what we are really fighting for in this so-called cold war is a coalition of freedom-thinking people. So, the question is whether or not the people in Europe for whom we have done so much and for whom we have spent since the war some $30,000,000,000, whether or not their morale or backbone is still strong so that in case of a world conflict they would not lay down as France did and as Belgium did in World War II, or whether they would join us in seeking to stem the overflowing of Europe.

There isn't any question but that tomorrow with the armed forces that Russia has, that it could take Europe in a very short time, and if that were done, then the Russians would have all the manufacturing plants in Europe. That is the thing that would give them the supplement that they of course need, and if they had that, then America would be facing the Russians alone and the contest would be on for our very existence.

Mr. EID. Well, Senator WILEY, with the Republicans in this Congress—this next Congress which begins in January—with Republicans having more power, what is your estimate of the probable fate of Leave Your Foreign Policies in Congress?

EFFECT ON UNITED STATES ECONOMY

Senator WILEY. Well, you know you cannot look around the corner of tomorrow. It all depends upon changing conditions. We have under the ECA program done a grand job, but now we have gone into a military program. But insofar as our own country is concerned, we, after all, cannot kill the goose that lays the golden egg, even in going ahead in our peacetime program. The thing has to be evaluated in accordance with the changing circumstances as they exist at the time you evaluate them. I think everyone realizes that the crisis is great and whatever is necessary to do must be done. The whole thing is how many cookies there are in the cookie jar to pass around.

Mr. EID. You mean we have only a limited number of cookies?

Senator WILEY. Well, America's barrel right now is sufficiently cut down so that our problem, as I said on the floor today, is immediately to get into a tax program that will provide results—sufficient revenue—and get into a military program that will provide results and get into a position so that we do not further devaluate our dollar. We dare not ruin our own domestic economy.

Mr. EID. Well, Senator, is that the way you would define, say, reexamination?

REEXAMINATION

Senator WILEY. Reexamination I would define this way by using an example. I remember when the question came up last year about ECA aid, I voted for the authorization. But when I did that I said that it was not a definite commitment for the appropriation because when the time for the appropriation came up, the circumstances might have changed, and they did change. England today is getting more dollars out of trade; in fact, it is said that England may be in a position even to make a payment on her debt. All those circumstances that come up, that evolve out of world trade and world problems, have to be taken into consideration at the time you are actually seeking the solution of the problem.

RELATIONS WITH COMMUNISM

Mr. EID. Well, Senator, there is another statement in that State Department booklet called Our Foreign Policy. It goes this way: "Our present world conflict is not between communism and capitalism. Most Americans, while they dislike Communist ideas and methods, concede the right of any nation to live under a Communist system if a majority of its people freely choose that system." Do you agree with that?

Senator WILEY. No; I don't agree with that, for the simple reason you can't simply use terms that way. The fight is between ourselves and the leaders of Russia, who represent present-day communism. As we interpret communism today under Marx, it means in substance that there is alleged to be no God; that the state is all-powerful; that the subjects have no rights; that there is no such thing as freedom of speech and freedom of press, and all those things; whereas our people here enjoy the American way which some call capitalism. I prefer to say that capitalism is a part of the American way. It holds the opposite position that the state is the servant; that there is a God who works in the hearts of men and in nations and that a man's right to work is his, and the right to accumulate property is his, and the right to will it, etc. Those two concepts are entirely separate. Now, in my belief they are two ideas which are in conflict for the conquest of the world, and I care not whether you call it capitalism or the American way, or whether you say it is communism. To me the Russian way is the present-day interpretation of communism, and that is the greatest danger to the liberty-loving people of earth.

SO-CALLED ISOLATIONISM

Mr. EID. The State Department also says that isolationism has practically disappeared in this country. Do you agree with that, Senator WILEY?

Senator WILEY. Well, an ancient philosopher said you have got to define your terms. I don't think in one sense that we ever had the limited definition of isolationism. We gladly traded with the world, for example. We felt, however, it was good policy not to stick our nose into everyone else's—other people's—business.

Now, how this world conflict turns out will determine whether or not there is a resurgence in one direction or another. If the people of the earth—the free peoples—are smart enough, have guidance enough from Almighty God, so that we can contain the movement of the Russian Government, and the Russian people can become free, then we can say definitely that there will be impetus toward unity among the nations of the earth. If, however, on the other hand, a third world war brings us no more than World Wars I and II have—well, you will see a resurgence in other direction.

CONCLUSION

Thank you, Senator. Ladies and gentlemen, Pro and Con has just presented Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, Wisconsin, in a transcribed interview on our foreign policy. Senator WILEY is at present the ranking Republican on the highly important meetings of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. This interview came to you from the Radio Gallery of the United States Senate, and now this is Leif Eid in Washington. Pro and Con will be heard again next week at this same time.

Song for Al Jolson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a wonderful eulogy of Al Jolson, by Walter Winchell, which appeared in the Wednesday, October 25, 1950, issue of the Washington Post.

There being no objection, the eulogy was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SONG FOR AL JOLSON

(By Walter Winchell)

They are eulogizing Al Jolson as a great entertainer. As a titan of show business he stood alone, but he was gifted with more than superb singing artistry—he was a great man. To say that Rembrandt was a fine artist and Beethoven a fine composer merely describes the superficial qualities of their technical brilliance. Their genius stemmed from the ability to capture deep emotions and convey them to others. Expressing universal feelings which find a home in the hearts of millions is the source of their immortality. For similar reasons, Jolson is no less immortal.

Al has gone the way of all mortals, but the joy he poured into the world is a living thing.

The truth is the Jolson story does not end with his fabulous success as an entertainer. It begins there. For the Jolson saga epitomizes the American story in the grand tradition. Out of such biographies is woven the fabric of the American legend, and out of such legends is derived the inspiration for generations yet unborn.

Al reached these blessed shores as a young immigrant of penniless parents. He received much from this Nation and contributed more. Yet Jolson believed he was in debt to America and never ceased paying. His gratitude for the opportunity a free Nation presented was as boundless as his love for the country that made liberty a reality. Always acting like a fine American was Jolson's finest performance.

Throughout his career he refused to spare himself. He made his life as much a tribute to this country as the tribute this country is now paying him.

He was the first to entertain troops in World War II, contracted malaria and lost a lung. Then in his upper sixties—he was again the first to offer his singing gifts for bringing solace to the wounded and weary in Korea.

Today we know the exertion of his journey to Korea took a greater toll of his strength than perhaps even he realized. But he considered it his duty as an American to be there, and that was all that mattered to him.

Jolson passed away in a San Francisco hotel. Yet he was as much a battle casualty as any American soldier who has fallen on the rocky slopes of Korea. A star for more than 40 years, he earned his most glorious star rating at the end—a gold star.

It is the measure of Jolson as an American that having his name in lights on the main streets of America was not as thrilling to him as igniting a spark in the hearts of American soldiers battling in some far corner of the globe.

The essential tenderness of the American spirit frequently results in deeper devotion to a great minstrel than a great statesman. For we know a nation is not only judged by the record of its political leaders but also by its songs. Perhaps that is because our entertainers represent as much of a national ideal as the Bill of Rights—namely, the pursuit of happiness.

Americans are aware that statesmen and entertainers are both lighting a candle in the darkness of a tragic civilization. Which explains why the passing of a man who could translate the joyous national spirit into lovely melodies has drawn people into a mourning desolation cushioned with the inner satisfaction of knowing that one man's life has been so nobly fulfilled.

The nobility of Jolson's intentions and his achievements as a public figure and private citizen provide a source of comfort for decent men everywhere. There can be no finer memorial.

He phoned me from Korea to say the reason he was rushing home was to find out if he paid our glorious country enough taxes.

The grief is profound because it is personal. Each of us feels we have lost a friend—and Al's friend was any person acquainted with his stirring voice. Wherever Jolson is right now, we're certain he is enjoying the worldwide salutes. Al was too much of a realist to be impressed by maudlin words, but as an honest showman he was always thrilled by mass affection. He truly loved the public that loved him. Their applause was the bread of his life, and he could play upon the heartstrings of an audience like a Stradivarius.

Jolson's career was not all sunshine and blue skies. After tasting the fragrance of acclaim—he was temporarily numbed by the cold hand of oblivion. That he was able to rise to greater heights after toppling was as much a tribute to his talents as to his fighting heart. Al was a champion in the finest sense of the word. A man could scale the heights with natural gifts, but it takes the most potent moral stamina to rise again after stumbling.

His remarkable comeback was the test of Jolson as a man, and he came through with flying technicolors.

It staggers the imagination to conceive that Jolson is dead. He was a man of vitality. His enthusiasm bubbled and gushed and flowed like a torrent. Until his final days Al's exuberance with almost childlike in its intensity. The way he walked, the way he talked, and the way he sang reflected his throbbing spirit. He loved to live and laugh and love.

In the final analysis, and especially in the case of Jolson, death is only a physical thing. Thanks to the miracle of modern electronics, generations will thrill to the haunting Anniversary Song, the peppery Toot, Toot, Tootsie, the rousing California, Here I Come, the tender April Showers, and the unforgettable Mammy.

Jolson's most essential living quality was his glorious voice—and it will never be stilled. His heritage is not monetary. He left bright love songs for youth, flowing memories to older folks, and a record of Americanism that will never lose its gleam.

Yes, they are singing Jolson's praises, but no praise is as beautiful as his singing. Another star is in the heavens. Strike up the band! Gabriel, blow your horn! Play the celestial harp! Jolson sings again, and how the angels must be applauding—for this magical troubadour is now performing on another stage.

Angels, you ain't heard nuttin' yet.

Mrs. Al Jolson, just on the long-distance phone, requested that flowers be omitted and the money intended for them be turned over to your local American Heart Association.

Britain Becomes a Creditor Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am offering for inclusion in the RECORD an article which appeared in the November 23, 1950, Paris edition of the London Daily Mail entitled "Britain Becomes a Creditor Power." Its author is Richard Denman, who writes for the Economist, a publication widely credited as authoritative on matters of British economics.

In summary, Mr. Denman's article shows an improvement during the past 2 years in the British balance of trade, and in their foreign capital investments. It also points out that, while some of the favorable trade balance is reflected in accounts due other parties within the sterling bloc, there is, nevertheless, substantial improvement. In essence, it seems that Mr. Denman's writings support the validity of reexamination of our foreign lending programs, and support the fact that legislators can and should take an objective look at our foreign-aid policies.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITAIN BECOMES A CREDITOR POWER

(By Richard Denman)

As a world creditor power Britain has been sliding back sadly over the past three decades. Two world wars fought within a single generation (and fought for considerable periods on a strict cash basis in respect of purchase from allies) have encroached heavily on the overseas investments that had been accumulated by thrifty generations of forebears. A growing and, within reason, desirable concern for social security and economic stability at home have raised standards of consumption and left smaller surpluses available for investment overseas.

Heavy taxation, the concomitant of war and of the welfare state, has gone far to demolish the capacity to save and to stem the flow of private investment from which British capital exports have in the past been fed.

At the end of the war the disordered state of the British balance of payments suggested that Britain's days as an exporter of capital were over. In fact, Britain had perforce to become a large importer of capital—in 1946 to the tune of £348,000,000, in 1947 of £558,000,000.

The position has, however, been changing significantly in the last few months. Even in 1946 and 1947 it should be noted that within the context of an over-all deficit in the balance of payments, and while therefore under compulsion to borrow, Britain could and did make certain investments abroad. It was borrowing with one hand and lending with the other.

BACK IN THE LEAD

A position has now been reached in which Britain is again running overseas surpluses that have brought it back to the forefront of capital exporting nations. In the first half of 1950 the surplus achieved on current balance of payments amounted to £52,000,000 and this, allowing for the grants received by the United Kingdom from the United States and the amount put to reserve, allowed the investments to increase by the modest figure of £16,000,000.

The position in subsequent months has improved by leaps and bounds. We have recently had the October overseas trade figures which make it possible to project balance of payments estimates over the first 4 months of the second half of 1950. In this period imports amounted to £857,000,000 and total exports to £777,000,000, giving a visible deficit of £80,000,000.

As they appear in the trade returns these figures are misleading because exports are valued at the moment at which they are put on board ship in this country, while imports include the cost of insurance and freight costs which are mainly paid to British companies and which should not therefore be regarded as a debit item in the balance of payments. It is normal to make an allowance of about 11 percent for this item of freight and insurance. Deducting this from the import total the visible trade account no longer shows a deficit but a surplus of £14,000,000.

INVISIBLE EARNINGS

This still leaves completely out of account the invisible earnings such as investment interest, profits of banking and insurance companies abroad and last, but by no means least, the profits on overseas trading operations of British oil companies which, in the first half of 1950, brought in a net surplus of £160,000,000.

Assuming that the surplus on these items has been no greater—and there is strong reason to believe that it has grown with the rise in commodity prices—it would appear that in the 4 months July to October 1950 the balance of payments of the United Kingdom showed a surplus of around £150,000,000, or at a rate of £360,000,000 a year.

Allowing for the continued improvement in invisible items it would be reasonable to say that the balance of payments is now running at a quite remarkable figure of £400,000,000 a year surplus. This is almost up to the standard Britain used to maintain in the heyday of its role as an exporter of capital—allowing that is, for changes in the value of money.

In the light of the figures which have recently been published showing the United Kingdom surplus with other members of the European Payments Union, these estimates of the over-all balance of payments do not strike any incongruous note. In October alone Britain's surplus with the European Payments Union amounted to £80,000,000. This was met as to £5,000,000 by the use of existing sterling resources by other member nations, but even so this left the net surplus at the very striking figure of £75,000,000.

WORLD'S BANKER STILL

In the July-September quarter the comparable surplus accumulated by Britain amounted to £28,500,000, so that a cumulative credit of £103,500,000 had in fact been built up by Britain over the 4 months period with the countries of western Europe alone.

Much of this surplus is attributable to the exports of the rest of the sterling area to the countries in question. But it should be noted that it is Britain which takes the burden of the surplus. Australia, for example, is duly paid in sterling for the wool she exports to France or Germany and while, on the one hand, Britain is accumulating a credit with EPU as a result of these operations, it may also see the sterling balances held in London on Australian account increasing by a corresponding amount.

This is a typical instance of the way in which London still acts as banker to the world. The surpluses which Britain has built up with the European countries have now more than absorbed the initial debit, equivalent to $150,000,000, with which the United Kingdom was saddled at the outset of its membership of EPU, and in addition has allowed Britain to build up a credit position equivalent to $140,600,000 with EPU.

One reservation has already been made about this good showing, namely, the extent to which the rest of the sterling area has contributed to it. Another concerns the tendency for hot money to come to Britain from Europe.

NEED FOR CAUTION

It is probable that all payments for sterling imports into Europe have recently been made "on the nail," whereas many payments due from the sterling area to Europe have been postponed in anticipation of an up-valuation of sterling. However false this premise may be, the operations based on it contributed an element of impermanence and artificiality to the surplus which the sterling area has been able to build with Europe in this period.

There is, therefore, some need to tread cautiously in allowing this improvement to lead to a considerable relaxation of import controls or to a generous expansion in overseas investments. What should be done is to use a substantial part of the surplus as an accumulation to reserves. That is in fact what is being done.

An immense field of development lies open for British capital. There are great plans of development in Africa and in south and southeast Asia. Much of this will have to be undertaken on official account and it is to be hoped, in this context, that the expensive lesson learnt in the east African agricultural development schemes will have been taken to heart.

Mining development in South Africa is still waiting for more British capital. The oil companies have in hand an immense development program, most of which will involve overseas expenditure. There is plenty of work to do for any surplus in its balance of payments which Britain can accumulate for investment abroad.

The danger is not that there will be too little to do but that we may attempt too much and by overinvestment give a further push to that vicious circle of inflation which has the economy of the whole world well and truly in its grip.

The Need for Decision in the War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, an article setting forth the necessity for a decision in the war in Korea, which appeared in the Washington Evening Star of November 29, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENTLEMEN MAY CRY, PEACE, PEACE

One hundred and seventy-five years have rolled by since Patrick Henry made his famous address to the Richmond Assembly—since he chided the gentlemen who were crying peace when there was no peace; since he warned against the inclination of man to indulge in the illusions of hope; since he asked whether we shall gather strength by irresolution and inaction. Throughout those years millions of men have given up their lives for the freedoms and liberties which Patrick Henry so ably championed. And yet, despite all of the sacrifices, despite all of mankind's material advances since 1775, the remaining citadels of freedom and liberty in the world are threatened as they have never been threatened before.

Patrick Henry was trying to arouse his fellow men, to prod them into throwing off the shackles of the mind so they would be able to see and understand the real nature of the crisis which had already begun to engulf them. We need something of the same thing today. We need to take another look at the assumptions and the hopes upon which our course of action has been based. We need to ask ourselves whether we have lapsed into a state of mind where the longing for peace and the dread of war have combined to blind us to the fact that in the larger sense there is no peace. We need to face up to the fact that we will drift into certain disaster unless we are willing to make decisions, perhaps painful decisions, and then act intelligently upon them.

What is one to think of the fantastic spectacle in the United Nations where the Chinese Communists, with blood on their hands, stand in the role of accuser and Russia's Mr. Malik puts the United States in the defendant's box? Not until yesterday, and then at the last possible moment, did our delegate, Mr. Austin, revise his prepared speech to bring a complaint of aggression against the Chinese. What is the rationale of this topsy-turvy business? It was the United Nations which decreed the use of armed force against the North Korean aggressors. Does anyone believe that the UN can serve the interests of peace, or of security, by seeking a place to hide from this new and uglier fact of Chinese aggression?

In his earlier remarks to the General Assembly's political committee, Mr. Dulles, representing this country, devoted most of his effort to a review of the occasions upon which the United States has demonstrated its good will toward China. He spoke of the bond which this record has forged between the people of China and the people of the United States—a bond "that the Soviet Government is now trying, and I am convinced fruitlessly, to break." At the moment that Mr. Dulles was speaking a Chinese Communist army of 200,000 men was smashing through the front of the UN forces in Korea—an assault which General MacArthur describes as an "entirely new war." Is it possible to square Mr. Dulles' hopeful words with the fact of what the Chinese are doing? Can we have peace with the Chinese people by closing our diplomatic eyes when their leaders wage open war against us?

If there is one clear fact which emerges from all this busines, it is the fact that we are at war, now. It is not a final, all-out war, but it is war nevertheless. And it is a war which has taught certain lessons and which raises still other questions.

We should be asking ourselves whether our policy of containment has not been tried, and found wanting. That policy was based on the assumption that the Communists, and the Russian Communists, in particular, would continue to expand unless checked by a show of force, but that they would not expand at the risk of war. The thought was that the Russians could be held in check, or contained, by interposing against them our own military forces, or the forces of allies that had become economically and militarily strong. To say the least, that assumption has become an exceedingly dubious one, if for no other reason than that the containing military forces simply do not exist.

But if the policy of containment has failed, what alternatives are left?

One possibility is a political settlement in Asia which would enable us to break off the war. This, no doubt, is being carefully explored. But we should not build false hopes. It is unlikely that a settlement can be made which will not leave the Communists as masters of Asia, and if we voluntarily accept such a settlement we must expect to pay the price in loss of prestige and potential allies throughout the world. If we reject such a settlement we might be forced to get out of Asia as best we can. If that should happen the minimum penalty would be the loss of everything we have been fighting for there.

Another possibility is that we may accept what comes in Korea, and go on from there. But where will we go and how will we get there?

If the decision should be to fight and not to retreat, we must face the question of whom we are to fight, and where and how.

Such a decision as this could be expected to result only in total war. We would be at war with Russia, and with all of the satellites that Russia could bring into the battle. Considering the enormous superiority in manpower that the enemy would have—and manpower of excellent fighting qualities if one may judge from our experience in Korea—could we hope to fight on the ground anywhere in Asia or Europe? Would a war of land armies spell disaster for us?

Could we fight and in any sense win such a war with air power? The atom bomb and the long-range bomber are certainly the most effective and perhaps the only useful weapons we would have at our disposal in a full-scale war if it should come in the near future. What is the state of our thinking with respect to these weapons and their possible use?

A commission of eminent men, headed by Bishop Angus Dun, of Washington, has taken the position, in a report to the Federal Council of Churches, that we would be justified in using the atom bomb or any comparable weapon only after it has been used by an enemy.

This position, of course, was taken on moral grounds. But we should also consider its military implications. Suppose that this kind of thinking should prevail and that we should find ourselves at war with Russia. Where and how would we fight? Would we send an American army across 3,000 miles of ocean and attempt to fight the Russians and their satellites in Europe? If so, what is one to think of the hundreds of thousands, probably millions, of American soldiers who would be sent to their deaths in that operation? And how would we get at the real centers of Russian military power deep in the Soviet heartland? Have we forgotten the fate which overtook the German army that Hitler sent marching into Russia? Is there really any valid reason, moral or otherwise, why we must wait until the Russians have blasted our industrial centers before we blast theirs? Has anyone a moral right to insist that our hands remain tied until untold numbers of American civilians have been killed and maimed by the enemy?

Certainly all of these are questions that the American people should be thinking about, and thinking very seriously about, today. It is much easier, of course, to ask questions than it is to know what the answers should be. No layman has the competency to make the decisions that are pressing in upon us. Still, the decisions will have to be made; we cannot escape them. And that force which we speak of as public opinion will play its part.

This being so, there is compelling need for a public opinion which rests on facts as the people are best able to ascertain the facts. We have moved too close to the edge of disaster to accept decisions that are shaped by the cry for peace when there is no peace. We should admit to ourselves that any decisions will be hard decisions. There is nothing left to us except a choice among evils. If this seems to be a repelling outlook, let us remember that it is true, and true in a very literal sense, that we have come to the point where our survival depends upon our ability and our willingness to make decisions that are hard to make, and to act upon them with determination once they have been made. If we let ourselves be borne along irresolutely by the current of events, we shall certainly be carried to total disaster.

The Folly of Our Bipartisan Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR V. WATKINS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, recently a 21-year-old student of the University of Arizona, Charles J. Farrington, Jr., of Tucson, Ariz., who is studying for the ministry of the Episcopal Church, prepared a paper for an English theme entitled "The Folly of Our Bipartisan Foreign Policy." The paper was well prepared and contains much food for thought. It also indicates a growing interest among the young people of the country in our foreign affairs.

I ask unanimous consent that the paper be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE FOLLY OF OUR BIPARTISAN FOREIGN POLICY

The Republican Party has a job to do. That job is to chart a course for American foreign policy that will synchronize with the fundamental economic and political necessities of this Nation. The primary obligation of government, in all instances, is to safeguard the rights of its citizens. The greatest contribution which the United States can make to the peace and freedom of the world is the development of its own material and spiritual resources to a height of efficiency that no enemy can possibly overcome. A vigilant and stable American Republic can do more to inspire the liberties of the world than any other source of confidence. It is on this premise that the Republican Party must fulfill its responsibility to the American people.

The present Democratic administration has shown little inclination toward such an objective. Instead, it has consistently sacrificed the interests of the United States in order to perpetuate international esteem for itself. It has made appeasement its watchword and meddlesome world saving its principal industry. And its policies have been dictated, for the most part, by neither the wishes and hopes of the American people nor the practical wisdom of their elected representatives, but, rather, by a disreputable assortment of starry-eyed visionaries in the State Department who are more concerned with promoting the cultural assimilation of heathen tribes at the far corners of the earth than with the preservation of the rights and dignities of free men. It is this present Democratic administration which was repudiated by the voters in the election last November, thus making way for the capable, sincere, and courageous leadership which the Republican Party has the sufficiency to provide.

In assuming this obligation, however, the GOP must rectify certain erroneous assumptions in its own philosophy. It must, of course, equip itself with a foreign policy program that is both dynamic and practical; it cannot succeed merely because of the tragic failures of the Democrats. Neither, though, should the Republican Party regard all of its own views as right and those of the Democrats as all wrong. A party in control of a Government for 18 years has opportunities to do many good things as well as many bad things, though it is the established tendency of administrations too long in power to become corrupt and frayed in their thinking and to do the bad things too often. For such a reason men are dying in Korea today. The Republican Party will be more adequate to its task if it avoids rigidity of opinion and extremism of any sort.

Probably the greatest aid to future constructive government by Republicans will be found in a release from the shackles of so-called bipartisanship. This is a lofty propaganda term which describes the idea of government by coalition or government without challenge. It was conceived during the 1944 election campaign through the combined wishes of the two presidential candidates and, ostensibly, the Department of State. It implies equal party representation in the formation of administrative and legislative policies, in the present instance those having to do with foreign affairs. For purposes of presenting a unified front to the rest of the world it is an attractive ideal, though such a shallow display is not the true end of our Government. In another sense, bipartisanship contradicts the basic intention of the two-party system, which is that the government of the majority party shall be strengthened by a system of checks and balances emanating from the opposition and challenge of the minority. The whole history of this Nation, in matters both foreign and domestic, reflects the merit of government sustained by argument, persuasion, and compromise. The fact that it negates such a democratic procedure renders bipartisanship wholly inadvisable. Furthermore, it does not work.

Even though it was apparently more of a hindrance than a help to them during the 1944 presidential campaign, Republicans continued to pursue bipartisanship in foreign policies in the desperate hope that, after all, such mutual effort would afford a surer way to peace in the world. The full extent of their miscalculation is not yet understood, but there is a rumbling of awareness in Republican ranks which cannot fail soon to comprehend the enormity of the bipartisan hoax. The light of reality is penetrating a fateful illusion. The whole effect of bipartisanship in foreign affairs has been to give the Republican Party a share of the blame for Democratic mistakes, and thus to weaken the prestige of the GOP in all phases of legislative and administrative planning. While such prominent Republicans as Governor Dewey, Senator Vandenberg, Harold Stassen, John Foster Dulles, and Representative Charles A. Eaton have actively advocated bipartisan foreign policy, their influence on this Government's decisions has been largely nominal, and actual Republican participation, in most cases, has been limited to public sponsorship or endorsement of the administration's proposals by these and other of the party's leaders. Bipartisanship is "me-too-ism" of the worst kind, and it has, on the whole, produced a rather shameful display of gullibility on the part of otherwise reliable statesmen. It is devoutly to be hoped that Republicans will soon realize that the kind of bipartisanship the Democratic administration practices can eventually frustrate all efforts for a just and honorable foreign policy, and will surely reduce the Republican Party in both its stature and its purpose.

In spite of claims by both parties, there was no bipartisanship in the election campaign of 1944. At the time plans were under way for the proposed United Nations organization, and the Dumbarton Oaks Conference was in progress. President Roosevelt had every reason to welcome the request of his Republican opponent, Thomas E. Dewey, for information and consultation regarding the problems of world peace, since the effect of such cooperation was to be the elimination of foreign policy as an issue in the campaign. This was, in fact, a stroke of salvation for the third-term Roosevelt administration inasmuch as the bipartisan symbol suggested blanket Republican approval of Democratic foreign policies, past and present. Governor Dewey, scrupulously careful not to criticize the administration for its failures and errors, was vigorous in his support of the proposed world peace organization. There is considerable justification for the claim that if he had not so well respected the terms of this pseudo-alliance, and, instead, had exposed the shocking facts of existing foreign relations to the voters, he might have been elected President in spite of the classic bipartisan plea of the Democrats that we should not change horses in the middle of the stream. That the Republican candidate did not risk such an exposé certainly demonstrates his high-principled patriotism during time of war, but subsequent events in the international field give no indication that bipartisan attitudes have actually deterred the course of catastrophe.

There was no bipartisanship at the Yalta Conference in 1945, where a physically sick and mentally deteriorated President made disastrous commitments regarding Asiatic policy, the consequences of which are not even now fully apparent. Nor was it a bipartisan spirit which refused to turn its back on a convicted Communist spy, formerly of high rank in the Government service. No bipartisan policy complacently witnessed the conquest of Nationalist China by Communist terrorism, defining it as only "the rise of simple peasants" in an agrarian reform. And it was not the voice of bipartisanship which advised that we let Korea fall, but not let it look like we pushed it. It was not a bipartisan team which whitewashed a congressional investigation of subversives in the State Department; it was a former Democratic United States Senator, seeking desperately to protect his party from the humiliation of its own unethical adventures and associations. Neither were they bipartisan candidates who were elected to Congress last November by an electorate outraged over the conduct of foreign affairs; they were Republican candidates who spoke out in defense of America and her people, and against the appeasement and pampering of Communists. Yet the present Democratic administration seeks to brand as immoral or isolationist anyone cautious enough and practical enough to be moved by this disgraceful record of too many years of too many blunders in United States foreign policy.

The folly of our bipartisan foreign policy has been demonstrated time and time again. Bipartisanship is a myth, a convenient device for those who cannot bear alone the consequences of their own failures. It is contrary to every precept of this Republic. And it does not work.

Once the Republican Party divests itself of its tendency to acquiesce or politely assent to the theories of the majority party, it can move forward freely and confidently toward the goals of the American heritage. Such objectives have been gradually and deliberately abandoned during the past 18 years of government by fashion and fancy. They must be restored to the consciousness of free men everywhere. The Republican Party must begin now to apply the principles of firmness, consistency, and justice to all policies affecting the lives and happiness of the citizens of the United States. It must build for America a foreign policy that will promote liberty and peace in the world without reducing the standards and opportunities of this Nation. It must have faith in its own ability to rescue America from the verge of economic, political, social, and spiritual disaster. The Republican Party must not, indeed it dare not, fail the Republic.

Tough Turkey—Middle-East Watchdog

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, this is not the first time I have had occasion to make some verbal references to our ally, Turkey. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article entitled "Tough Turkey—Middle-East Watchdog," written by L. Edgar Prina, and published in today's Washington Evening Star. I shall read but one sentence, however, because we have so few occasions in these days on which we take considerable comfort and pleasure in the expenditure of some of our relief money abroad. I read the concluding paragraph of the article:

> When the American taxpayer contemplates the aid-money spent since World War II, he probably will come up with the verdict of most of our military experts: Where have the dollars been spent more wisely or to better advantage than in Turkey, guardian of the Middle East.

I simply want to add that I think we may take a great deal of comfort from the stanch support which Turkey has given to us in this present difficulty.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

TOUGH TURKEY—MIDDLE EAST WATCHDOG

(By L. Edgar Prina)

The heroic demonstration of fighting prowess by the 5,000-man Turkish brigade in Korea has afforded the peoples of the free world this comforting thought: There are 375,000 more like them in the army at home.

And should the Soviet Union make an aggressive move toward the Dardanelles, the Suez, or the Near East, the Turks probably could put nearly 2,000,000 trained men in uniform, thanks to universal military training.

That the tough, hard-bitten Turkish soldier is a first-class fighting man may come as a pleasant surprise to many Americans, but not so to the Turks. An official of the Turkish Embassy here, commenting on reports describing the exploits of his countrymen in Korea, said:

"Give us a piece of territory to defend, and—depend on it—we'll defend it to the end. We Turks haven't had a chance to show what we can do as soldiers since we drove out the invading Greek and Allied armies in the early twenties."

The hand-picked Turkish brigade in Korea is a self-supporting, reinforced unit—a sort of souped-up regimental combat team. It has its own artillery and communications. It carries a replacement pool, medical organization, postal, and mess staffs.

Even men of the housekeeping units have got into the fight. The Embassy spokesman said that many of the cooks demanded to be allowed to go up front, contending they were soldiers first and cooks second. They got permission.

These fighting cooks were with other elements of the brigade cut off by the Chinese Reds last week. Low on ammunition, the Turks fixed bayonets and charged. When the action was completed 200 Reds lay dead and 200 others had been taken prisoner.

An American unit fought its way up to the Turks, providing an escape route. But the Turkish commander, Brigadier General Yazicki, declined to flee the trap. "We are killing too many Chinese," he said.

The Turks finally broke out, carrying their wounded on their backs, after fighting a courageous rear-guard action to aid retreating Eighth Army troops. About 500 of them were killed.

The Turkish armed forces, which have been unified for 15 years, are commanded by Gen. Nuri Yamut. He has more power, relatively, than General Bradley, Chairman of our Joint Chiefs of Staff. General Yamut has the final say. Serving under him are Gen. Kurtdjebe Noyan, Army chief; Admiral Sadik Altindjan of the Navy, and Gen. Muzasser Goksenim of the Air Force.

Universal military training has been in effect in Turkey for many years. Men between the ages of 21 and 28 are required to serve for 18 months. Those who have had high school education or less are put in the noncommissioned ranks. College graduates are given officer training, but normally they can advance only to company grade rank.

The professional officer corps, up to the rank of general, are trained at the military college. Generals and admirals attend the staff college. Turkey keeps the officer corps large enough, even in peacetime, to meet the needs of full mobilization.

Before our joint military mission for aid to Turkey began functioning under the Truman doctrine in 1947, Turkey never had a cadre of noncommissioned officers—the backbone of our armed services. Now, however, careers have been opened up for such men in the Turkish forces.

That isn't the only way the Turks have benefited from American aid. More than $1,800,000,000 has gone to Turkey and Greece in the last 3 years in the form of Truman doctrine, ECA, and mutual defense assistance program grants. With this money, modern equipment and training have been provided. Standardization of weapons is under way, and a network of military roads is being constructed. The 650-member military mission is training Turks to train Turks.

Acting on the recommendation of American experts, the Turks actually have cut down the size of their standing army from the 500,000-man force it maintained in 1947. Today they have a compact, hard-hitting machine of 22–25 divisions of about 15,000 men each.

In September, the Turkish armed forces held what has been officially described as extremely successful large-scale military maneuvers. Tanks, planes, and ships participated.

The Turks say that theirs is not purely a defensive force, and point out that they could, in the event of a Russian attack in Western Europe, smash at the Soviet flank.

Turkey has been negotiating a mutual defense pact with Greece which, when consummated, may later include Italy and Yugoslavia. Such a line-up would put a very sizable force on Russia's flank.

Turkey's chief strength lies not alone in its 2,000,000 bayonets, but in the unity of its 20,500,000 citizens. Since it broke with the past in 1923, under Ataturk, it has embraced western ideals and democratic principles. Its firmness in the face of heavy Soviet pressure has earned it a high place in the ranks of the free nations.

When the American taxpayer contemplates the aid money spent since World War II, he probably will come up with the verdict of most of our military experts: Nowhere have the dollars been spent more wisely or to better advantage than in Turkey, guardian of the Middle East.

An Appraisal of Our Position Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DWIGHT L. ROGERS
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein an address delivered by John S. Knight, editor and publisher of the Miami Herald and other leading daily papers. I particularly mention the Miami Herald for the reason this is one of the outstanding papers of the State of Florida. This address was made before the Chicago Better Business Bureau at Chicago, Ill.

I think the address is most timely for it is a true appraisal of our position today in the world.

Mr. Knight, who is one of the outstanding thinkers of our Nation, has placed his hand on the pulse of the times and I commend this address to the people of our Nation in these trying, serious, and critical times.

I was fortunate in hearing this address over the radio and was so impressed with it that I thought it should be placed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the readers thereof to get the benefit of this excellent address. The address follows:

AN APPRAISAL OF OUR POSITION TODAY

It is indeed a very great privilege to address the Chicago Better Business Bureau, which, like the 90 other better business bureaus in the United States and Canada, is dedicated to the principle of responsibility and self-regulation.

Your general purpose, as I understand it, is "to promote integrity and create confidence in advertising, selling, and all other phases of business."

This is all important because the American mass producing, mass selling and mass distribution economy rests upon consumer faith.

Your slogan: Public confidence counts most, exemplifies what might be called the public service of private business.

Your example of self-discipline in business illustrates what can be done in normal times without the doubtful benefit of Government edicts or bureaucratic rulings.

I commend you for your initiative, vision, and sense of social responsibility.

These are characteristics of which the American businessman has every right to feel justly proud.

They give vitality to a system of free competition and add strength to an economic structure which, despite its imperfections, has not only supported the world but still stands firm and erect under the mounting burdens which it is called upon to carry.

I address you as an ordinary citizen who is gravely concerned, as all of us must be, over today's discouraging news from Korea and the present position of the United States in world and domestic affairs.

We, if I may presume to speak for those of similar persuasion, are not thinking as the blind followers of any political party, as burning internationalists or smug isolationists, or as the disciples of any social or economic group.

We are interested, primarily, in a rededication to the principles and moral attributes which carved this Nation out of a wilderness and built it progressively into a position of world leadership, judged by any standard you may care to select.

But it is not my purpose to declaim upon the blessings which we possess nor to dwell upon the virtues of other generations which are always magnified with the passage of time.

It is rather to make an appraisal of the present day world factors which are determining, not only the direction in which this country is headed, but also the fate of civilization.

In any analysis, whether it be of your business or the gargantuan task of assessing the ills of the universe, it is essential that we take account of the factors and decisions of the past.

Although some deny it, it is my belief that our present international difficulties were born out of Franklin D. Roosevelt's firm conviction that he could handle the Russians.

The validity of Roosevelt's assumption is debatable since he died at a most crucial stage of the war.

The record, however, shows that concessions he and Churchill made to the Russians at Tehran and Yalta are responsible in no small degree for the plight of the world today.

The Balkans, excepting Greece, were entrusted to the tender mercies of Premier Stalin. The deal which brought Russia into the war against Japan 6 days before the Emperor's capitulation may have been thought militarily expedient at the time but it proved to be a tragic blunder.

The decision to let the Russians take Berlin led to the impossible arrangement which gave the Russian military commander absolute authority in that area, save for the isolated zones occupied by the Americans, British, and French.

Russia later used this authority to impose a blockade which was eventually broken by the Berlin airlift after months of effort and at a staggering cost.

Had Roosevelt lived, perhaps a better relationship would have been developed with the Russians but because of his faith in them and Stalin's realization at Potsdam that he was dealing with less able men than Roosevelt and Churchill, our efforts for world peace have been blocked at every turn.

In my humble judgment, we have failed also to use the normal procedures of diplomacy to find possible areas of agreement between ourselves and the Kremlin.

When Stalin in February of 1949 indicated that he was ready to open peace discussions with President Truman, that overture was curtly dismissed by Secretary of State Dean Acheson as Russian propaganda.

Russian demands on the United Nations are countered by American threats; vituperation is met with acrimony.

Now, when the President very properly gives assurances that we want no conflict with the Moscow-dominated Chinese Reds, his expression of good faith is ignored by the Chinese Communist leaders and their masters in the Kremlin.

Can it be that our boasting of long-range bombers which can demolish industrial Russia, the angry threats of our diplomats, and loose talk of a preventive war have made us the prisoners of our own propaganda?

Last spring and early summer I revisited England and France and made a short though profitable and enlightening visit to Berlin and Western Germany.

I had not been in England since 1944, the year of the V-bomb and the Normandy invasion. The change was striking. The people had lost that drawn, tired look and seemed to be in excellent spirits despite the many things about which they might justly complain.

Outwardly, things looked good. The surface impression was that come what may, these rugged, stout-hearted Britishers would, through sheer determination, face up to any problem that might lie ahead.

On the economic side, the British have taken full advantage of Marshall-plan assistance.

In England the Marshall plan is well understood. It has been adequately publicized and every factory wall holds posters which explain to the British worker exactly what the Marshall plan is, how it works, and what it means to them individually.

Moreover, the British production-for-export drive have been a conspicuous success because of the patient willingness of the British people to deprive themselves of consumer goods in order to stabilize and improve their economy.

As a result the so-called dollar gap is virtually closed and it is the considered opinion of many British businessmen and economists that no further help of the kind represented by the Marshall plan is now required.

On the debit side of the ledger stands the British Socialist Government.

Through the over-accentuation of welfare and cradle-to-the-grave security schemes, plus the punitive taxation needed to pay for them, it has destroyed incentive and virtually dried up risk capital.

At the present time, nearly 40 percent of the British budget goes to health and welfare, a larger percentage than is used to pay for past wars and military defense.

While the Government's health program is enjoying considerable popularity, the cost of state medicine is far exceeding the original estimates.

By and large, the nationalization of industry and confiscatory taxation have been the prime factors in retarding competitive enterprise, although traditionally the British lean to cartels and the allocation of markets and production.

On the political front, the Socialist government holds a narrow margin over the Conservatives in Parliament but the Laborites have managed to win all decisive issues, including the recent decision to proceed with nationalization of the highly efficient steel industry.

For the Conservatives, Winston Churchill is still the tireless, dogged, persistent, and brilliant leader of the opposition with Anthony Eden as his chief deputy. The younger Conservatives complain that Churchill stands in the way of their advancement, but actually none of them is more than a pale imitation of the old warrior himself.

The Socialists, led by the scholarly Clem Attlee, are a heterogeneous lot who quarrel furiously within their inner councils but manage a sort of unity on party measures.

"Nye" Beven, most radical of the cabinet ministers, has a consuming ambition to become prime minister. It is no exaggeration to say that he is by far the most dangerous man in England, and his influence within the Labor Party is steadily growing.

Naive Americans who sometimes look upon Britain's socialism as "toothless" should remember that of the major industries; the coal mines, the railways, long-distance trucking, gas, electricity, communications, airways, and the Bank of England are already state owned.

They should learn from Labor's victory on the steel issue that while the Socialists sometimes hesitate, they never quit, even in days of great national peril.

There is some evidence, however, to indicate that the people of Great Britain are not as enamored of state socialism as they were in the beginning.

Recent by-elections have given Labor candidates narrower margins and the workingman is finding that government ownership has not solved all of his difficulties.

At this time, it is not too rash to predict that the Conservatives have an outside chance in the next election. However, the hour is so late that even a Conservative victory would mean that the measures which have been enacted under the pressure of war and a Labor government would largely remain as a permanent part of British life.

Two nations could not be more dissimilar in their way of life, general outlook, and basic integrity than Great Britain and France.

No matter what views one may hold of Britain's Socialist Government, the fact remains that the British by pursuing a definite plan of action, have made tremendous strides toward getting their financial house in order.

The French, on the other hand, with their wonderful agriculture, industrial facilities, and natural resources are living in a fantastic state of unreality.

The people do not talk of war. The government in power which today attempted to resign when the National Assembly demanded the trial of the Defense Minister for alleged misconduct is fashioned from an uneasy coalition of political leaders who seem less concerned with the national welfare than with their own prestige and position.

Evasion of taxes in France has developed through the years into a fine art and it is estimated that at least $1 out of every $4 assessed escapes the tax gatherer.

France's budget has been out of balance for so many years that it is no longer a leading subject of discussion.

Politically, France has six major groups and any number of fringe movements which are constantly shifting in their alinements and loyalties.

Of these six, the Communists have the largest representation in the National Assembly with approximately 175 votes out of 618.

Agricultural and industrial production in France exceeds prewar levels but pay is kept low in order to protect the least efficient producers.

The French have had a dollar problem similar to that of the British but they have not done nearly so well in the export field.

One of France's financial problems stems from the cost of maintaining five divisions of troops in Indochina. This charge about equals what France is now receiving from the United States in Marshall plan aid.

France is suffering from a lack of strong and intelligent leadership.

Labor unions are honeycombed with communism.

Business and industrial leaders lack the sense of social responsibility which we have come to expect of them in this country.

Men prominent in the political life of France are, with rare exceptions, vacillating and self-serving.

They waste critical hours, days, and months debating the subject of rearming Western Germany when time is of the essence in setting up proper defense for Western Europe.

The Schuman plan for the integration of the British, French, and German coal and steel industries is the only demonstration of leadership shown by France since the end of World War II.

The French people are not nearly as aware of Marshall plan aid as the British, the Belgians, or the Dutch because they have never been adequately informed.

It is the frequently expressed view that the Marshall plan has stopped the spread of communism in France. I would agree that the pumping of ECA billions into the blood stream of the French economy has retarded the force of the Communist movement but the hard core of communism still remains.

French factories and business enterprises are doing well under the stimulation of American dollars, but the average workman in a French automobile plant makes about 27 cents an hour.

You can't kill communism that way.

The big question mark in the minds of United States and British military planners is whether the French will fight in case of war with Russia.

As I said previously, individual Frenchmen do not care to talk of war. One influential Paris newspaper even advocates France remaining as a neutral zone in the event of hostilities.

There is a strong feeling in France, springing from the tragic experience of three invasions within 70 years, that occupation is better than destruction.

Will the French fight? If you believe what people say, the answer must be a qualified "No."

However, it is my impression that if and when the Atlantic Pact nations place an integrated force of 40 to 60 divisions into Western Europe, the French attitude may undergo a change. But no one can predict how the French will react to tonight's war headlines.

Before leaving the United States, I had planned to be on hand when the Communist-led East German youth organization held its rally in Berlin on May 28.

As you are well aware, there is no guaranteed access to Berlin by road or train. The trusting Americans failed to obtain written commitments from the Russians when the European Advisory Commission was negotiating the plan of occupancy.

So Berlin is today a tiny island in a Russian sea, with east Berlin held by the Communists and west Berlin by the Americans, British, and French.

The first vivid impression of Berlin is the appalling destruction wrought by bombing and artillery fire. As a basis of comparison, I should say that Berlin suffered 100 times the damage that was visited upon London.

While industrial recovery in Western Germany has been rapid, west Berlin is definitely a depression area. There are 300,000 unemployed who manage to eke out an existence picking up rubble. This project is financed with ECA funds.

The Communist-sponsored youth rally, in which about 500,000 youngsters between the ages of 9 and 25 participated, was a convincing demonstration of Russian ability to organize and influence impressionable minds.

As the paraders marched by, with their bands, anticapitalistic banners, pictures of Communist leaders throughout the world, and shouting "Americans go home, Americans go home," one could only conclude that here is the Hitler emotional appeal all over again, with a new set of slogans and blue shirts in place of brown.

The citizens of West Berlin have never wavered in the face of these Communistic demonstrations. As Gen. Maxwell Taylor, our military commandant in Berlin, says, "They have met every test."

We have a very special responsibility in Berlin because we are trustees for a couple of million people who are standing firm against the Russians.

From American High Commissioner John McCloy in Frankfurt, I learned how difficult it is to stimulate interest in a workable democracy; also that even then the problem of rearming Germany was a paramount issue.

Still, it seemed obvious that fate would decree that Germany be rearmed despite the denials of Secretary of State Acheson that our policy against rearmament would be changed.

My final impression of Western Germany was that people are working and making very real progress under a different and trying set of conditions.

But like the French, they are not yet in any mood to fight the Russians.

Thus far, I have talked exclusively about Europe, first, because I have been there recently and, secondly, because in the long range scheme of things, the economic stability and military potential of Western Europe will determine whether we are to continue to live peacefully as free Americans, or forced to expend our blood and resources in global conflict.

A superficial appraisal of Western Europe could lead to some tragically erroneous conclusions. This has been a banner year in agriculture; industrial production in some instances exceeds prewar levels; tourist business is excellent.

But nowhere, except in Great Britain, did I find much evidence that in the event of all out war with Russia we would have many stout-heated allies by our side.

The disappointing response to the United Nations call for help in Korea correctly reflects the attitude of our allies in the North Atlantic Pact.

To be sure, they have suffered much, their economic problems are difficult, their leadership, wavering and often incompetent.

But I was appalled by their unrealistic and almost fatalistic outlook.

Both in France and Italy, the monied class—and there is a great deal of wealth in both countries—lack social consciousness.

Workers are underpaid with resultant low productivity per man. Business and industry fail to supply inspired leadership. It's every man for himself and the only united front I discovered was the phalanx of opposition to the tax collector.

Under these conditions, no amount of Marshall plan money will ever succeed permanently in eradicating communism. French businessmen have said to me that many of the people who vote Communist are not really Communists at all but actually only protesters against the government in power.

I received this information with considerable skepticism since I recalled the day when General Stilwell told me on Okinawa in 1945 that the Chinese opposing the Nationalist government were not really Communists but only agrarian reformers.

There is no sound reason, however, why the French could not be a strong and prosperous nation. But years of moral decay aided by a venal press, political expediency, and the failure to produce able, conscientious and enlightened leadership have consigned her to the role of a fifth-rate power.

On the military side, I saw nothing in Europe which could prevent a Russian blitz from reaching the Atlantic coast within a matter of weeks.

That realization is the crux of the discussions which continue between the foreign ministers. Sixty or more trained divisions must ultimately be put into the European theater if Europe, and the United States, are to have any semblance of security from the Russian threat.

It is also my studied opinion, after a series of conferences with military leaders, that our major effort must be concentrated in Europe.

Yet, the plan for an integrated European army, including troops from Western Germany, has suffered one delay after another.

There has been disagreement on standards for weapons; Europe wants the United States to send her more troops to prove that we mean business; we want Europe to show the will to defend herself by making the sacrifices that are needed for more arms and bigger armies.

There have been months of stalling by the French on the question of rearming Germany, months in which I suspect France has capitalized upon her traditional fear of the Germans to get the additional aid she wants from the United States.

But the time is here to move ahead with a skillfully designed plan of action. Neither we, nor Europe, can continue to drag our feet, nor to underestimate Russian military and scientific development.

There is a calculated risk in this rearmament. One, that we might provoke an attack, and, two, that our economy may be wrecked in the process.

But, in the light of the challenge which confronts us, it is a risk that must be taken.

In Korea, we made the initial mistake of underestimating the enemy's strength. It was thought that air and naval units plus two American divisions engaged in so-called police action could do the job.

But the Koreans turned out to be surprisingly well-armed and well trained. Rather than being simple North Korean peasants, they were highly specialized, well disciplined elite forces. Their job was to overrun Korea quickly and be available for deployment elsewhere in Asia when needed.

While I believe that we have no choice other than to rebuild our military establishment for all possible eventualities, that does not mean that we must resign ourselves to the inevitability of war.

President Truman is to be commended for his address to the United Nations, the most statesmanlike of his career, in which he challenged the world, and Russia in particular, to drop the cant and sophistry of mere peace talk for a specific plan of universal disarmament.

We should also avoid the temptation to threaten a preventive war.

Talk of this kind is grist for the Soviet propaganda mill. It gives Russia the chance to point out that United States talks about peace but really wants war.

It also ignores the fact that, at this time, we have neither the arms nor the men to make good such ill-considered threats.

Finally, it bows to the idea that a full-blown war is inevitable; that we had better finish it while we can.

I submit there are better ways to work for the peace of the world than by launching an attack to stop war.

May I warn the unthinking optimists in this country that a budget of $62,000,000,000 and the rebuilding of our military strength to more than 3,000,000 men will strain the American economic system as it has never been tested before.

I make this observation, because unlike World War II, there is no foreseeable end to the period in which we must tool up for war, endure shortages because of inadequate stockpiling and maintain a going half-peace, half-war economy at the same time.

The days ahead will impose special responsibilities on all of us; responsibilities and obligations that we cannot blithely assign to the men in uniform and the heads of our Government.

I have tremendous faith in the common sense of the American public. Contrary to the view of Secretary of State Dean Acheson in opposition to reexamination of our policies, our citizens clearly indicated at the recent election that they are deeply concerned over the course we are taking.

In effect, they demand a reaudit of the Government's domestic and foreign policies. It was a victory, not for the Republican high command, but for balance and moderation.

So let us all be reexaminists, or at least proceed to examine and determine whether or not the United States can—

Rebuild its military strength to wartime size;

Rearm and equip the military forces that will be needed in Europe;

Extend the Marshall plan;

Adopt the Gray report and the point-4 program for sharing our wealth with the rest of the world;

Continue to assume primary responsibility for what is sometimes ludicrously called United Nations action in Korea and, at the same time, keep our national debt from reaching stratospheric proportions;

Hold the line against runaway inflation;

Stave off creeping socialism and remain solvent.

Circumstances dictate the strengthening of our national defenses.

The menacing Russian threat also compels us to push ahead with the creation of formidable military strength in Europe.

But this is no time to undertake to save China from the Communists; to make military commitments in Indochina and other parts of the world which are impossible of fulfillment; to embrace the socialistic schemes which are costing Great Britain 40 percent of her national budget; to spend billions in a futile attempt to stamp out world poverty; to finance the underdeveloped areas of the earth; to bankrupt the United States and lose the struggle to Moscow without a single Russian soldier having been sent into battle.

No, this is the point at which the reexamination of our resources and potentials dictates that first things must come first—and the highest priorities must go to national defense and national solvency.

Even with the billions that have gone to Europe in the way of gift loans and Marshall plan assistance, the French have the third largest Communist Party of any nation; 15 percent of the French Army is Communist; the British are weaseling on a firm settlement in Korea; Europe is reported jolted by the United States elections; United Nations fighting representation, apart from that furnished by the United States, is negligible; Italy has 4,000,000 unemployed, a "paper" army and a larger Communist Party than France.

These facts are anything but encouraging but they should warn us against the folly of placing too much dependence upon Allies to whom capitulation to the enemy may appear to be a lesser evil than making Europe a battleground for world war III.

This is the hour when the United States, as never before, needs unselfish and patriotic leadership from Government, industry, business, and labor.

We need a war-profits tax that will help pay the bill but not a politically concocted monstrosity that unjustly penalizes young and growing industries.

Still the witch hunters are already howling about war profiteers and "money hogs."

The businessman has long been the "whipping boy" of the unscrupulous politician, the Communist, the long-haired Socialist and the reckless labor czar.

Yet who can say with any semblance of truth that as a class, the industrialist or businessman is any less patriotic than politicians, labor leaders, professional people or even newspaper editors?

However, in this fateful crisis, you businessmen stand challenged with the rest of us to demonstrate that as the grim realities unfold, your one overriding consideration must be that no personal sacrifice is too great to insure the preservation of the great land in which we live.

General MacArthur said a few days ago that the Korean war was in its final phase.

But, even as he gave assurances that we would begin to withdraw troops before Christmas, the Chinese Communists launched a full-scale attack and dealt crushing reverses to the American and South Korean forces.

As the representatives of Red China appear before the United Nations to charge the United States with aggression in Formosa, we are perilously near world war III.

While we sit here tonight in comfort and security, let it never be forgotten that 30,000 of our men in uniform have shed their blood in stinking, freezing, vermin-infested Korea.

Each of us, therefore, in our limited way, must strive to lift his patriotism to the same high level of devotion to God and country.

Artificial Cloud Nucleation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS H. WERDEL
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, may I call the attention of the House to House Joint Resolution 550, which I introduced on December 6, 1950, "To create a joint congressional committee to study and investigate cloud nucleation," which resolution has been referred to the House Committee on Rules for consideration.

The proposed joint committee, which would be composed of Members of both the House and Senate, would function on the same national basis as the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. The purpose of this resolution, which is national in scope, has been the result of a thorough study on this subject by recognized scientific and meteorological authorities throughout the country.

Much time and study has been consumed on this subject by several of our outstanding universities and laboratories of the General Electric Co. at Schenectady, N. Y. I, myself, have spent considerable time and study on the subject as chairman of a subcommittee of the California congressional delegation, which subcommittee was created to thoroughly review the possibilities and control of cloud nucleation.

Mr. Speaker, scientific study of this subject has proven that there is no longer any room to doubt that artificial nucleation, under proper atmosphere conditions, can be used to increase precipitation in the form of either rain or snowpack. There is also reason to believe that such artificial nucleation can cause the opposite effect—that is, if improperly done, it can cause a lessening of precipitation.

In connection with this subject, it should be remembered a storm generated by artificial nucleation will spread and continue until dissipated under natural conditions. Under such circumstances, such storms intended for one watershed where flood control facilities are available, or no flood threat exists, may spread to other watersheds, where damage is not only possible, but probable. This condition is a very serious matter for California, where unlicensed and improperly trained people are reputed to be experimenting with and selling their services to artificially nucleate clouds.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose and intent of this resolution is to obtain the greatest benefit for the most people, particularly in those areas where it is deemed necessary and can be controlled successfully, without the intervention of amateurs or others who might attempt this operation for their individual needs or gain, regardless of the rights of others who might otherwise suffer property loss or damage through these uncontrolled efforts.

Even if competent scientists are agreed that under the proper weather conditions, artificial nucleation can provide benefits to dry areas, they are also agreed that improper or ill-advised nucleation can do damage.

Mr. Speaker, I am firmly convinced that a study by the proposed joint committee would demonstrate that a Government agency of qualified meteorologists is now necessary to determine when and in what areas artificial cloud nucleation should be done, and what the qualifications should be of persons performing this work. The present floods in California demonstrate the dangers that exist in early snowfalls and warm rains, and what damage could result from a fast spring run-off where an artificially heavy snowpack existed without flood control facilities. Such studies may well demonstrate that we have a large increase in hydroelectric power capacity from existing plants without any increase in capital investment, and they will undoubtedly demonstrate that future investments in flood control and reclamation facilities should be decided upon after advice from competent meteorologists in connection with artificial nucleation.

Mr. Speaker, I am also convinced cloud nucleation is important to many Government agencies, such as the Forest Service, Army Engineers, Weather Bureau, Reclamation Bureau, and the Army, Navy, and Air Corps. Such services would require men of different training than in any other agency that now exists.

I would like to call to the attention of the Members of the House the present installations in the Tenth District of California—the Naval Ordnance Test Station at Inyokern, China Lake, and the Edwards Air Force Base at Muroc Dry Lake, which have been developed in the belief that the watersheds emptying into such dry lakes historically have little water in them. Meteorologists might well decide that artificial nucleation in the Southern Sierras could easily generate storms that would continue for the short distance from the crest of the Sierras to the watersheds of China Lake and Muroc Lake.

The recent California floods have demonstrated that present conditions require the earliest possible completion of flood-control facilities on the Kings, Kern, Kaweah, and Tule Rivers, and I will make that request at the earliest possible time after the Eighty-second Congress convenes. The development of homes on small ranches in those areas threatened with flood by the streams mentioned above demands completion of these flood-control projects in the public interest. To successfully operate cloud nucleation, it is essential that we have the proper flood-control facilities to adequately handle the precipitation which would necessarily follow.

I would like to remind Members of the House that the great Central Valley project of California is now pumping an estimated 2,000,000 acre-feet of water from the underground beyond that which is presently being replaced by nature, and that my studies on this subject convince me that competent scientists believe that more water is available by artificial nucleation in the Sierra Nevada Mountains than the deficiency I have mentioned. This, of course, is a benefit that should be developed for the public welfare in California. It is a benefit that is believed to be available to other watersheds, such as the Colorado River, where the amount of water is deficient.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, may I further remind you and the Members of the House that this subject presents an opportunity to do something of great public benefit in arid regions of our country, and may possibly benefit areas regularly plagued with hail and lightning storms. Inasmuch as cloud nucleation is presently being carried on by private individuals, the threat of private and public damage presently exists. The threat of damage in the Tenth District of California, where people with limited means are developing their new homes on river low lands, in reliance upon authorized flood-control projects, is very real and must be given immediate attention, even in these days when we are all working day and night in an effort to solve and finance our national defense problems.

Acheson Must Go and Our House Cleaned

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, since the Russian Revolution in 1917 many writers have warned us that the Soviet Union was set on a course of world conquest. Now all of us have become aware that we are locked in a death struggle with the Communists. It is a fight for survival. It is not a conflict of ideologies—Russian imperialism is on the march, communism is but a cloak for her aggression. The conflict will resolve the issue of whether men will live free or slave. It will decide whether mankind must submit to the Communist dictatorship of the Kremlin.

The idea of Eurasian conquest has flashed on the screen of time for centuries and centuries. Periodically, hordes swept over Eastern Europe to loot, rape, and subjugate the peoples of the then civilized world. It was so with Genghis Khan whose armies came from the east in a move of world conquest.

These forces conquered and held much of the area which is now Russia. In fact, they moved through the area where Stalin was born. It has been said that Stalin feels himself to be the reincarnated Genghis Khan. Be this or not, it is worth while to compare the efforts of these two.

Genghis Khan first started his campaign in northern Asia, conquering Manchuria, northern China, and then the plains of western Asia. He then moved through southern Asia, conquering the Turks and thence into what is now Russia. The pressing of his invasion was disturbed by revolt in China against his rule. It took nearly 10 years to quell the uprisings in China, but once controlled he devoted himself to the subjugation of the area which today is under Russian domination. Thus Russia was linked to Asia politically, as today Asia is in large measure linked to the Soviet Union.

Turning now to the present situation, it is obvious that Stalin and his henchmen are bent on world conquest. This fact should have been clear for years by the writings of the Communist leaders just as Mein Kampf made clear the aims of Adolph Hitler. However, our eyes are now open. What we seek to stop is aggression, communism is a secondary factor. It is an aggression which has as its aim world domination with the seat of world government in the Kremlin.

The "fifth column" is a subtle technique which has found modern use in the conduct of wars. It was used by Hitler, and brought to a fine temper by the Soviets. There is an additional factor to be considered in the Soviet approach. It has been called various things. It has been said to be the war for the minds of men. Others see it as a propaganda approach which makes things seem to be what they are not; such as calling the militant force of the Chinese Reds an agrarian reform group. These and many other refinements are to be seen in the present methods of the Soviet Union.

One factor has operated in favor of Stalin and his Soviet cohorts which never worked in the somewhat cruder days of Genghis Khan. Stalin won at Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam with mere talk large areas of the world's surface. These easy acquisitions of territory were the result of diplomatic bungling by those who state with high purpose to represent the interest of all the free peoples of the world. We can point to the influence of the Soviet Union in the Balkans, Manchuria, East Germany, North Korea, and the Kurile Islands.

After the organization of the Red Chinese Army of agrarians the Soviets maneuvered these puppets against Chiang and his forces. The thrust was well conceived and executed, and was assisted notably by our own Government. In October of 1946 the policy of this country was stated to be as follows when the question of turning over to China some of our surplus merchant vessels was under consideration:

> It is the desire of the United States Government that these commercial-type vessels be destined for a united and democratic China under a coalition government. It is, therefore, understood by the Chinese Government that, if it appears to be in the best interests of the United States, the latter may discontinue the transfer of these vessels.

In the early days the Greeks attempted by alliance to solidify the Western World against the onslaught of pagan masses just as we today have attempted to stem the tide of communism by the North Atlantic Treaty. We have said for over 3 years that our mission was to stop the spread of communism in the world but actually we have aided the spread of communism in the Orient.

The only place where we are actively carrying out counter measures against communism in Asia is in Korea and this came about only after we had said to the world that we would not defend Korea. The only remaining threat to communism in the Orient are the forces of Chiang. Up until the movement of the Seventh Fleet into the waters around Formosa, a considerable part of the Chinese Red army was occupied on the continent adjacent to Formosa. By our action we shut off any affirmative move by Chiang, and we freed this force of Chinese Reds to take up arms elsewhere. The Communist forces thus relieved may be found on Korean battlefields today. It has been said that about 300,000 troops were moved from the Foochow-Canton area, given winter equipment and specially trained by Russian officers for the Korean war.

During much of the postwar period, Dean Acheson has been a part in the formulation of policies which now are shown to be wrong. No one questions his loyalty, high purpose, and scholarly intellect, but he is not a realist—and the time has come for us to be realistic. His policy of the "strategy of freedom" bears scrutiny. Obviously, this plan did not contemplate freedom for Korea, for by his words before we were committed to Korea he stated that we would not interfere. It certainly was not contemplated to help Chiang.

Therefore, we might say that the "strategy of freedom" concept contemplated the abandonment of Asia to communism. What were we to get in return for such an abandonment? A temporary peace in Europe? Such a trade might be acceptable to Britain and France. The socialistic trends of these countries are completely evident. Socialism is the Red twin of communism. Thus, such a trade might be acceptable to our allies, but for us and our avowed purpose of carrying forward the strategy of freedom it would seem that we come out of such a transaction with a spavined nag.

Obviously, any such policy which is influenced by allies who are not dedicated to the same brand of freedom which we espouse is no policy at all. If we are to continue this crusade for world freedom, we must assume leadership, and not be deterred or distracted by weak would-be appeaser nations. We must set a straight course and follow it.

To assume leadership requires strength, and we are a strong nation. Despite our obvious and latent strength, we often present a picture of confusion to the leaders of our would-be allies. This has been made more confusing by the actions of our State Department, which has been guilty of serious inconsistencies and unity-sapping actions. Our strength is to be found in our people; it is evident from our resources and industrial capacity; it is shown in our ability to transcend party lines and join in unified action against the common enemy.

Now is the time for regrouping, preparation, and long-term planning. It is the time for preparation for the all-out counter offensive against the forces of aggression and slavery. We must have a fresh start. We must have men who will not compromise with principle. Dean Acheson must go, and we must have a reconstituted State Department, just as we must have men to bear arms to fight the cause of right. We must not allow the helpers and advisers to remain on the job in the State Department who have permitted the "boss" to allow us to be swindled.

Let us unify all our forces. Let us make known to the men on the battlefields that every effort here is directed against the same foe with whom they are tirelessly fighting. With strong trust in the Almighty, in the same earnest conviction that freedom was ordained by God for all men and nations, we must prepare ourselves for the sacrifices necessary to pay for a world of truly united nations—nations united by a genuine devotion to the cause of God-given freedom.

Trading With Enemy Countries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. L. MILLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the President and the Secretary of State should make an immediate decision on the policy we will pursue relative to trade with the countries we have been helping through ECA and who in turn are trading with Russia and her satellite countries. On page 818 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 24, 1950, will be found a list of 95 trade treaties which have been made by the 16 ECA nations with Russia and other iron curtain countries.

Mr. Speaker, this very day eight ships are on the high seas headed for Hong Kong, and other ports of China. These ships, according to their cargo logs, are carrying huge amounts of medicine, oil, and other strategic war materials. Most of this is being traded through British channels. These ships should not be permitted to unload at Chinese ports.

The President should order the Seventh Fleet to stop these merchant ships and either send them to a neutral port or return to the United States where their cargoes of strategic war materials can be unloaded and kept from Communist China.

Mr. Speaker, this is the ninth anniversary of Pearl Harbor. This country followed the foolish idea of shipping oil and scrap iron to Japan right up to the day of its attack on Pearl Harbor. Just how foolish can the leaders of this administration be? Have they forgotten Pearl Harbor? Is history repeating itself? The scrap iron and oil sent to Japan helped to kill many American boys. The battleship Arizona, with its several hundred American boys, would never be resting at the bottom of the ocean near Hawaii, if this country had refused to trade with Japan.

Great Britain has shipped more than $100,000,000 worth of materials into the Soviet Union. They include ball bearings, steel, drill presses, locomotives, and other materials that could be turned into implements of war. Other nations have been doing the same thing only in lesser degree. Many other materials shipped to the iron curtain countries have been helpful in building up their economy and war potential.

Before the recess I complained, on numerous occasions, about imports from Communist China and about exports to it. Large amounts of eggs, fish, and other products have been received from there. Papers recently reported and showed pictures of huge amounts of tires, still usable in the war effort, being sent to Red China. Copper and sheet metals have gone there in large amounts. While the Department of Commerce, on December 4, announced that no more licenses for such materials would be issued, one wonders why this action was not taken long ago. There seems to be little doubt that some unscrupulous traders will find ways of carrying on active trade with Communist countries unless the Departments of State, Commerce, and the whole administration exercises the utmost diligence.

The United States, at the end of World War II, was the strongest Nation in the world. We have gradually and progressively grown weaker because we have bled ourselves to assist other nations. These ECA nations in turn have made themselves and Russia stronger through trade of materials we sent our supposed friends under ECA agreements, in spite of the understanding we had that they would not ship strategic war materials into Russia and her satellites. Because of this understanding Congress turned down an amendment that would have explicitly prohibited such trade.

If this country is to fight communism it should not be done with half-way measures. Certainly, trading with the Communist countries and keeping them fat is not the way to destroy communism. Since the end of World War II we have continued to build it up abroad through our aid to many nations. Now we are prepared to fight it with the atomic bomb. It is time the Truman administration takes a positive stand on trade with communistic nations. The American people are entitled to know the facts. It has not been frank in telling the Congress or the people about trade agreements between ECA nations and the countries behind the iron curtain.

Rent Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill, now under consideration in the House, would continue existing rent-control legislation for a period of 3 months after December 31, 1950, the date upon which it is due to expire.

I am of the opinion that at this time there should be an extension, either for the 3 months provided for in the House bill, or 2 months at least, as provided for in the Senate bill. There are two reasons that primarily incline me to this opinion. First, we are now confronted with an extremely serious situation growing out of the Korean incident. It may or may not expand to include a far wider area of conflict. If the latter should result, and I certainly hope it does not, it would in all probability make necessary a full mobilization of all national resources. This might make necessary additional controls in many segments of our economy. Therefore, it seems to me it would be wise to keep the present rent-control legislation in existence for the time suggested until future developments make more certain the conditions that will prevail. In the second place it seems to me particularly proper that in view of the fact that a new Congress is to come into being on January 3 next, that the subject should be left in a position that will enable it to take up consideration of the subject in the light of possible future developments. To continue the present law for another 2 or 3 months would not do any appreciable harm to the interests that are demanding complete abolition of rent controls. To do so will make it possible for a full examination of the whole matter in the light of rapidly moving world events, and by a body which represents the latest expression of the will of the people as reflected by the results of the last election.

With further reference to the views I have expressed, I include as part of my remarks, an editorial appearing in the Courier-Post newspaper, of Camden, N. J., issue of Wednesday, December 6, 1950, reading as follows:

MOST COUNTY MUNICIPALITIES TO CONTINUE RENT CONTROL

Twenty-two Camden County municipalities have acted to extend Federal rent controls until June 30, 1951, while 15 have not, according to a survey made by Emil J. McCall, local rent expediter.

Unless renewed by the current lame-duck session of Congress, Federal rent controls will expire December 31 except for those municipalities whose governing bodies approve the 6-month extension.

Where no such action is taken landlords will not be under legal restriction as to the size of rents they can charge after that date.

Camden and Gloucester cities are two of the county's municipalities that have already enacted resolutions continuing rent controls.

On the other hand, some of the other larger municipalities in the county have taken no action, including Pennsauken, Delaware, and Haddon Townships, Audubon, Haddonfield, and Mount Ephraim.

The complete list of municipalities which have voted rent control continuation is as follows:

Camden, Barrington, Bellmawr, Berlin Township, Chesilhurst, Collingswood, Gibbsboro, Gloucester City, Haddon Heights, Hi-Nella, Laurel Springs, Lawnside, Lindenwold, Magnolia, Oaklyn, Pine Hill, Runnemede, Somerdale, Stratford, Voorhees Township, Winslow Township, and Woodlynne.

The municipalities which have taken no action, in addition to the six listed above, are:

Audubon Park, Berlin Borough, Brooklawn, Clementon, Gloucester Township, Merchantville, Pine Valley, Tavistock, and Waterford.

According to McCall, some of the municipalities which have not yet voted to extend controls may do so before the December 31 deadline.

Throughout the Nation the pattern of action for or against continued controls is mixed, just as it is in Camden County. In a general way the larger cities and municipalities are more likely to be found on the side of rent control and the smaller ones against it, but there are many exceptions to the rule on both sides.

Here in Camden County the stand of the various municipalities may to some extent reflect the percentage of home ownership as compared with the number of rented homes, with localities where homes are largely owner-occupied seeing no need for controls. But, as a glance at the list of municipalities in the two categories shows, this rule also has exceptions.

It may be that the present session of Congress will render the whole question of municipal action on rent controls academic for the time being.

Washington reports indicate a strong possibility that Congress may enact a temporary extension throughout the country of 2 months or thereabouts. This would leave it up to the incoming Eighty-second Congress, after it convenes early in January, to take up the issue afresh and decide whether, in view of the war crisis, to enact an entirely new national rent-control law.

A Balance of Power for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following, A Balance of Power for Peace, remarks of F. Eberstadt at a meeting jointly sponsored by the World Affairs Council of Seattle and the University of Washington on October 16, 1950:

At the outset I want to thank President Allen for the privilege of being here and also to thank all of you for honoring me with your presence.

I accepted President Allen's invitation with the greatest pleasure—for several reasons. In the first place, I wanted to remove the serious handicap under which I have labored all my life in never having visited this wonderful place. I was curious as to whether Seattle really was as beautiful, and its inhabitants as agreeable, as Dr. Allen and many others claimed.

Furthermore, I welcomed the opportunity to pay a return visit to President Allen. He attended every meeting, with possibly one exception, of our Hoover Commission Task Force on National Security. This required about 26 transcontinental flights in 5 months, a distance equal to about three times around the globe at the Equator. Committee organizers, take notice. You'll never find a more conscientious committee member than Dr. Allen. It seemed a pretty good business proposition for me to be able to repay 3,000-mile visits on the basis of 1 for 26.

The most compelling reason for my acceptance, however, was the opportunity to talk frankly with you, as one citizen with another, about some of the problems bothering all of us—west and east alike; to take stock, as it were, of where we are and how we got there, and, against this background, to consider whether we still have a chance to achieve a decent, self-respecting, and reasonably durable peace.

Twice in something more than a score of years we have won great military victories at tremendous cost in life and property, only to have the goals for which we fought—and which victory actually brought within our grasp—elude us as we listened "with credulity to the whispers of fancy and pursued with eagerness the phantom of hope."

We are confused and concerned.

Our confusion is all the greater because no people ever faced up to the tragedies of war or shouldered its crushing burdens more unselfishly. We coveted no territory but our own. We sought dominion over no people but ourselves. We desired no material advantage from friend or foe. Our only objectives were to put a stop to brutality and aggression; to assure peace and tranquillity in the world so that people might live in security and contentment under governments of their own selection. For the accomplishment of these worthy aims we gave without stint—of life, of work, of property.

We won the war. Yet none of these goals has been attained. There is no peace in the world. There is no tranquillity. There is no security. Far from assuring greater blessings to others, we are in grave danger of ourselves losing some of those that we have long cherished.

No wonder that we are confused and concerned.

What then has gone so wrong? How is it that a deeply peace-loving people should have so brilliantly mastered the art of winning wars and have failed so disastrously in the art of making peace? This question indicates its own answer. It is not our soldiers who have failed but our statesmen.

It is easy to blame the whole tragic business on Russia. Without doubt the men in the Kremlin are largely responsible for our predicament. But Russia's intransigeance is only part of the story. We ourselves, I believe, bear a very real share of the responsibility for the present situation because, though inspired by the noblest ideals, we have failed to come to grips with the practical realities of power and more specifically, to use an old phrase, with the realities of the balance of power. We ignored, or disregarded, one of the hard facts of international life, namely that, in the absence of overwhelming predominance of one nation (as existed under the Roman Empire, and as presently exists in the Western Hemisphere), or of a world organization capable of laying down the rules and of determining and enforcing justice and law and order among nations, a reasonable balance of power amongst the nations is, has been and always will be, essential to the maintenance of peace. To have destroyed that balance before an adequate substitute had been created was to invite aggression and possibly war. That is exactly what we did, and, in my opinion, that is the main reason why we are where we are.

Heartsick from the terrible tragedies and destruction of two World Wars, "determined," as the United Nations Charter puts it, "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war," we nobly resolved that it should never happen again. We were disgusted at the past; we longed for something new—something better—for the future. Associating the balance of power with the past, we wanted no part of it. We regarded it as synonymous with "power politics" and we wanted to be rid of that also, and so we approached the postwar problems on a level of high but rather vague idealism, guided by our hopes for the world as it ought to be. The Russians approached them on a less elevated but more hard-boiled and practical level, guided by their knowledge of the world as it is.

It may not be irrelevant to point out that in both World Wars the captains of our ship of state were men probably more concerned with making history than with following its lessons.

The phrase "balance of power" is an old one and to many an unpleasant one. It connotes the kind of "power politics" which we have been brought up to think of as wholly evil. Yet it is impossible to have such power as this country now possesses without deploying it in one way or another. Furthermore, it is impossible to create huge vacuums in the world by the destruction of great nations without having other forces—often worse ones—rush in to fill them. In and of itself, the maintenance of an adequate balance of power may not be the noblest of goals, but it is a means which statesmen have used, and used effectively, over the years in the cause of peace, and on the record it has proved itself a better instrument to that end than most of the eight-hundred-odd peace plans which have been proposed and tried since the Achaean League.

Maintenance of a balance of power between nations, so as to prevent any one of them from threatening or dominating the rest, was a principle familiar to the ancients, both as theorists and practical statesmen. It was practiced in medieval and in modern Europe. It received recognition in the early formulation of international law. It was the justifications for the coalitions against Louis XIV and Napoleon. National upheavals, changing the map of Europe, obscured its application during part of the nineteenth century, but toward the end of the century it emerged again in a series of alliances and counteralliances whose object was to preserve peace. The disrespect in which the phrase "balance of power" is held in this country has sometimes been ascribed to an interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine whereby the United States exercised a special influence in the Western Hemisphere. The Latin-American countries may have a different understanding of the balance of power than we have and warmer feeling toward it.

For this device perfection has never been claimed; nor do I claim it now. It does not guarantee that absolute assurance against war that is desired by utopians. It recognizes the human race for what it is and takes note of the potentialities and limitations of mankind. It assumes that in the unfolding of time there will arise ambitious and unscrupulous rulers who, opportunity being offered, will embark on aggression and conquest. It was to restrain such men that a balance of power was deemed necessary. As to the relative merits of this mechanism versus a really effective world organization, I offer no argument. I do affirm, however, that since no such effective international authority existed the balance of power should not have been destroyed.

II

At any rate, my thesis tonight is that it is in the interest of this country, and of all other peace- and freedom-loving countries, to restore the balance among nations that was so improvidently destroyed. In support of this thesis, permit me to propose a simple question. Suppose that as the war drew to a close, we had offered Mr. Stalin whatever he wanted. What would he have been likely to request?

I submit that his answer would have been about as follows:

1. Destruction of Germany, so that they might communize that state and achieve their objectives in Western Europe and in the Balkans where for years the Germans and British had blocked them.

2. Destruction of Japan, so that they might achieve their aims in the Far East, which for years the Japanese had blocked.

3. Demobilization of our own powerful Military Establishment lest we raise effective objections to the course which they intended to pursue in very practical terms which they understand and respect.

4. Disclosure of the secret of the atom bomb in circumstances where they could build up a stockpile of bombs while we were foreclosed from doing so.

I hope you will not regard my outline of Stalin's presumable requests as evidence of a close personal intimacy between us, and that my Americanism will not be subject to sinister imputations by the admission on my part that my views as to what Stalin might have wanted are based in part on reading some of his writings.

Well, with childish faith and quite unmindful of the consequences, we granted Mr. Stalin three out of four of these requests. We destroyed Germany and thus opened up that country and its former sphere of influence to Russian infiltration in Western Europe and in the Balkans. We destroyed Japan and thus opened up that part of the world to Russia's aggressive designs. We demobilized our powerful military establishment. One request, however, we have not granted. To the lasting credit of that great and patriotic American, Bernard M. Baruch, we did not hand the Russians the atom bomb on a silver platter.

In a word, by destroying states essential to it, we destroyed the balance of power upon two continents, actions which were highly favorable to the imperialistic intention of Russian communism. To the cool-headed and skillful manipulations of our calculating former ally, we innocently responded in exactly the way they wanted us to. Thus, we have been euchered into a position from which only clear thinking, wise judgment, and prompt and forceful action can extricate us, short of a third and catastrophic war.

We were right, of course, in defeating Germany and Japan and in destroying Hitler and his Nazis and the Japanese war lords. Under vicious and unscrupulous leadership, they had embarked on ruthless conquest, threatening our own national security. Our mistake is not in defeating Germany and Japan, but in reducing them to a condition of complete impotence. These two nations, in the west and in the east, respectively, had for years constituted effective barriers to the imperialistic advances of Russia. When their restraining influences on Russian ambitions were removed, we were faced with the alternatives either of sitting idly by and accepting Russian exploitation of these areas, or of offsetting by our own economic and military resources the Russian pressure to fill the vacuum created by the destruction of Germany and Japan.

Why and how we abandoned all ideas of negotiating peace and embarked on the course of total destruction of Germany and Japan will some day prove a fascinating chapter in history that I can only touch upon here. The fateful decision seems to have been made rather casually at the 1943 Casablanca Conference where the doctrine of "unconditional surrender" was first announced. Whatever the merits of that doctrine as a military slogan, it had far-reaching consequences on the peace. To Germany we administer this dangerous prescription in full strength. Japan received a diluted dose.

In retrospect, it is amazing that the British should ever have agreed to it no matter how great the American pressure was. For, over the centuries Britain had lived by the balance of power and had waged wars to maintain it. Moreover, Britain—Mr. Churchill's advocacy of attacking the "soft underbelly of Europe" showed—must have been aware of the Russian danger long before the war was over.

In the Far East our resolve to destroy Japan—and to invite Russia in at the kill after we ourselves had the situation well in hand—was even more amazing and just as disastrous.

We were, no doubt, influenced to a considerable degree by our hopes and faith in the United Nations as a restraining force on future aggression. We failed to realize that the United Nations could be effective only on the historically doubtful assumption that all of its veto-equipped members would sincerely cooperate in, and carry out, the noble purposes set forth in the Charter, or if there were a balance of power among the major member nations sufficient to discourage adventures of aggression or conquest irrespective of any exercise of the veto.

The most momentous fact of the political world of today is that the Russian Empire now possesses such power and position that it cannot as matters now stand be adversely affected by any possible coalition of European or Asiatic nations. This power and position are not wholly of Russia's own creation. Furthermore, they are relative, not absolute. They came to Russia largely as a result of the destruction of her formerly powerful neighbors. They will remain with her as long as those states remain prostrate and will be shorn from her when those states are restored to strength.

I submit to you that in the destruction of Germany and Japan and in the headlong demobilization of our Military Establishment, we upset the balance of power to such an extent that unless it can be restored promptly and effectively, war with Russia is likely. However, I also take the liberty of suggesting that, in my opinion, it can be restored if we act promptly and effectively. And, that if and when it is, war with Russia is unlikely. To restore a balance of power in time to forestall war with Russia will, however, require vigorous and courageous action, action going to the heart and core of the problem.

III

How, then, restore the balance of power? What can we do to raise our presently depressed side of the scale?

Well, we can continue trying to do so through our own resources, supplemented by those of the British Commonwealth and the nations of Western Europe, while keeping Germany and Japan in an enfeebled condition. That is a pretty big contract in any circumstances. To accomplish it from another continent thousands of miles away vastly multiplies the difficulties. It involves the hazard that the Germans and Japs, despairing of regaining national dignity, might come to view us as oppressors and turn into the Russian orbit. In any case, successful or unsucessful, such a course would impose upon us a long and staggering economic and military burden. While the views of the British Commonwealth and of the nations of Western Europe appear to be in harmony with our own, their practical and material contributions toward halting Russian aggression have necessarily been moderate.

Assisted by large loans and grants from this country, there has been considerable economic recovery in Western Europe. Whether this recovery has reached the point where these nations can immediately devote substantial sums to rearmament is open to question. Furthermore, while their inclination to resist Russian aggression seems quite clear, it is equally clear that the firmness of their resolve to do so will depend to a considerable extent on their conviction as to their chances of success. We must not forget that the prospect looks a bit different when viewed down the muzzle of a Russian gun than it does from 3,000 miles away. Thus, any policy which deprives us and the other nations determined to resist Russian aggression of the support of the Germans and Japanese, or which would turn them toward Russia, would seem to lay upon us an unwise and unnecessarily heavy burden.

A better approach to the problem seems to me to lie in a simple reversal of what, certainly in the light of hindsight, look like rather serious mistakes. This would involve (1) restoring our own military power to a point which we can, as, indeed, we will have to, carry for a long term of years without crushing our economy; (2) aiding in the restoration of the military power of our allies, and (3) bringing Germany and Japan back into the family of nations as counterweights in the balance against Russian aggression. This, it seems to me, is a more possible and more hopeful course.

We should plan the restoration of military power not on the supposition that, in the pattern of medieval chivalry, Russia will offer us the choice of weapons, but on the very opposite theory, that she will fight us where and in the manner that we are least prepared for. Our Korean experience has been instructive along these lines. Faith in successful push-button war is no longer so strong as it was in some quarters.

In step with our own rearmament should be the rearmament of the other North Atlantic Pact nations, and of those nations whose security in the Far East is also in jeopardy.

Prompt rearmament is essential not only against the contingency of open and all-out war with Russia, but as a measure of precaution—an insurance policy, so to speak—against obstructive measures that Russia might take or stimulate during the highly critical period pending the restoration of Germany and Japan to positions where they can protect their own national security and their legitimate interests, burdens which at the present time, as occupying forces, we are obligated to carry.

Doubts have been expressed as to the willingness of our people to continue to bear for long the high cost of a large military establishment. Such doubts are justified if our rearmament is to be based on scareheads and emergencies, alternating with assurances that peace is near at hand. But such doubts are not justified if our people become convinced that such rearmament is a fundamental element in a clear, sound, and strong foreign policy that has a reasonable chance of succeeding.

It is encouraging to note that at last we seem to be recognizing the facts of international life and to have started on a course aimed at restoring a balance of power. If our course remains steadfast, it will be confidence-inspiring. We have begun to rebuild our own military establishment. We are, perhaps the right word to use is "exhorting," the North Atlantic Pact Nations to shoulder their necessary and appropriate military burdens, aided by substantial contributions from us. We seem even to be drifting toward peace with Germany and Japan. An abortive start toward a peace treaty with Japan was made 3 years ago. It floundered on the reefs of procedural difficulties and apparently remained stuck fast there ever since. On September 15 President Truman stated publicly that he had "authorized the Department of State to initiate informal discussions as to future procedure." This subject was also mentioned in the President's report on his meeting General MacArthur. In the same statement, President Truman said that "we have pressed the U. S. S. R. for an Austrian treaty and we are exploring the possibilities of ending the state of war with Germany." A few days later, the Big Three foreign ministers, after conference amongst themselves and with the representatives of the 12 North Atlantic Pact Nations announced certain concessions to Western Germany.

All that is a start in the right direction. But it is only a start. Germany and Japan in my judgment should not simply be granted concessions, that smacks of trading against the Russians. They should be made into going concerns. If we have in fact adopted the policy of making peace with Germany and Japan, we should make that fact clear to our people and to the world, and we should focus on it—not drift but drive toward it—without wasting too much precious time exploring possibilities or fussing with procedure difficulties. The urgency is great and the time is short. If we are to make peace with Germany and Japan, let's do so promptly and magnanimously, with a view to making these former enemies our friends.

I would like to distinguish clearly between a program which looks toward rearming Germany and Japan on the basis of opportunism and expediency, and the program which I suggest—which is to restore these two nations to positions of responsibility and respectability in the family of nations. The former is a makeshift on the purely military level. The latter is a long-term political program for peace.

Consider the effects of so doing—not soon, not in the distant future, but now, tomorrow. The Russians, who have thus far called the tune on the international stage, would immediately be thrown completely on the defensive. By a single play, we would have trumped the false propaganda which Russia so assiduously has been putting out in Europe and Asia. But more: The Russian bear would discover that the primary forces which contained him in the past were again in being, both in the west and in the east. If then he continued to disturb the peace, he would be faced with the possibility of a two-front war—the age-old nightmare of every Russian statesman and marshal.

The way to make peace is to get busy and make peace—a real peace, not a pussy-footing, weasel word, technical peace under which Germany and Japan are to maintain feeble military establisments disguised as so-called police forces which we falsely hope will do our bidding and fight our battles for us. That would be taking a leaf from Russia's book and attempting to reduce them to the status of satellites. It would fool no one but ourselves. Everybody knows that cops armed with tanks instead of nightsticks are intended for other purposes than maintaining internal order. We cannot expect to treat the manhood of Germany and Japan as pools for the recruitment of great foreign legions in the service of our own political objectives.

Does anyone imagine that either the Germans or the Japanese, under such an arrangement, would be dependable or effective soldiers? Does anyone seriously believe that under any arrangement the Germans and Japanese will fight our battles for us? Certainly not. But they will fight to defend their own homelands and their own national security and their own interests. To the extent that these are in harmony with our objectives in restraining Russia, they constitute an effective counterweight to the present serious imbalance.

Is it likely that the Korean incident would have occurred if Japan had been restored to a strong and independent condition? How long would the Russian sword hanging over the head of western Europe continue to dangle if Germany were on her feet? These potent and industrious people could, if restored to full nationhood, take off our shoulders a large measure of the political, economic, and military burdens that we are carrying and, as things now stand, will have to continue to carry indefinitely.

The peace that I suggest with Germany and Japan is a real and true peace; a peace which will restore these nations, under decent and enlightened leadership, to positions of equality in the family of nations; a peace under which these strong and productive peoples—70,000,000 Germans and 80,000,000 Japanese—can regain their own self-respect and the respect of the peace-loving nations of the world; a peace under which they will be promptly admitted to full membership in the United Nations and given seats on the Security Council. In my opinion, once Germany and Japan have been so restored, the Russians will recognize the futility and danger to them of their present tactics. Then, and then only, will we be able to make a tolerable and enduring peace.

IV

Finally, let us consider certain specifications of the peace which I propose. First of all, we should see that Germany is firmly tied into the other nations of western Europe and becomes a full partner in the North Atlantic Pact. The importance of this point cannot be overemphasized. We must not permit Germany again to get into a position where she can play the west and east against each other as a preliminary to attacking one after the other. The Schuman plan offers real assurance in this direction. The most effective way to prevent Germany from making another attack against western Europe is to consolidate her heavy industry in the Ruhr with that of Belgium, France, and Luxemburg under an autonomous authority controlled by the nations of western Europe.

In the peace treaties with Germany and Japan we can embody appropriate protective provisions to which they must adhere. For example, we can put limitations on the size and nature of their armed forces. We can call for periodic reports and can reserve the right of inspection to ourselves or to the United Nations. If, then, we and the other members of the United Nations continue to see that these provisions are lived up to, we can greatly minimize such risks as are involved.

During the transition period, while Germany and Japan are recovering to the point where they can protect themselves and their own interests, we should and in fact will have to maintain strong forces in those two countries—ironically enough, not essentially to punish or control a former enemy, but to restrain a former ally. However, just as soon as Germany and Japan are able to protect their own security and to take care of their own affairs, we should withdraw our troops, retaining only such military forces and establishments as in the interest of mutual security are freely and voluntarily accorded us.

I fully appreciate that there are risks—and great risks—in a restoration of Germany and Japan. A restored Germany, particularly in the enfeebled condition of the present European nations, might obtain that ascendancy which the Kaiser and Hitler sought in vain. In the disturbed conditions of the Far East, a restored Japan might again embark on a career of conquest. We can thoroughly understand the fears of the western European and the far eastern nations along these lines. However, we are not at the moment sitting pretty with an opportunity to make a simple choice between a risky course on the one hand and one that involves no risk on the other. We have to choose among courses all of which are risky. "When constabulary duty's to be done, the policeman's lot is not a happy one." The alternatives may be tough and dangerous, but at our peril, we must make the right choice. It is a question of balancing risks, or, to use a phrase recently current "calculating" them.

Yet, it is important to note that the new balance of power here proposed differs radically from anything in the past because the United States, now being ready to shoulder its obligations in the matter of maintaining world peace, would openly and actively be part of it. That will make a great difference. It has often been pointed out that had Germany in 1914 known that both Britain and the United States would actively enter the war against her, she would not have embarked on her adventure. It cannot be doubted that our own isolationism of the twenties and thirties, including both our disarmament and our ill-fated neutrality legislation, powerfully affected the calculations of both Hitler and Japan. The fact that the United States is now irrevocably committed in world affairs will, in my judgment, have a profound deterrent effect on both Germany and Japan in the future. Remaining strong ourselves, we can afford to have strong allies.

If we restore Germany and Japan, we must do so with our eyes open to the risks involved, but firmly determined that we will not again, as we did before, permit them to build up their military power for aggression and be prepared, if need arises, to tip the scales against them.

With a fairly even balance of power in the world, maintenance of peace will require neither unduly onerous economic nor military burdens on our part. We might only need to learn and practice the international art of winning friends and influencing people, a field in which our activities to date have not been conspicuously successful.

V

I recognize that in order to make such a peace with Germany and Japan the wish is not the deed. The process is fraught with difficulties and complications. Even if I knew all the solutions, which I don't, time would prevent their recital. I do not, however, consider these problems either as so difficult or so vital as to deter us from pressing ahead vigorously. We should bear in mind that however formidable these "procedural difficulties" may loom at the moment, if war with Russia were to break out, they would instantly become entirely academic.

The question naturally arises as to what effect such a program as I have suggested would have on the United Nations and on our relations with that organization. We were its main sponsor and have been its main supporter. In spite of many disillusionments it remains a principal depository of our hopes for world peace. Thus we most certainly should not lightly adopt a course which would be injurious to the United Nations or would prejudice its present usefulness and future prospects. The course that I have suggested would not have that effect, in my opinion—quite the opposite. I have not proposed and do not propose that we commit ourselves to restoring a balance of power amongst the nations as a substitute for the United Nations. On the contrary, I believe that we should continue to support the United Nations in every possible way. In line with that policy the restoration of a reasonable balance of power in the world, including the admission of Germany and Japan as full partners in the United Nations with seats on the Security Council, would constitute the greatest practical step forward that could be taken toward strengthening the United Nations and making it a powerful and effective instrument for the maintenance of peace.

The United Nations, like the League of Nations before it, is an expression of the longing of mankind for a new and better and more effective means for maintaining world peace. I yield to no one in the depth and sincerity of my hopes and longing that it may succeed. But I submit to you that practical progress toward its noble objectives is more likely to be achieved by supporting these high purposes with the proved experience of the past. And so, as we hopefully continue the long and difficult struggle to transform the world from what it is to what we think it ought to be, our efforts will be more real, more practical, more effective, if we ground them on the firm foundations of past experience.

In making these suggestions, I am not forgetful of the tremendous debt that we owe to hundreds of thousands of our boys who made the supreme sacrifice to defeat Germany and Japan; nor of the many other millions who died or suffered tortures even worse than death at the brutal hands of the Nazis and Japanese. But I doubt that it would be their wish that we follow policies of revenge and vindictiveness which would sentence to death other millions of young people and end in the destruction of all that they regarded as sacred. They who were the greatest victims of intolerance would, I think, if they could speak, be the strongest advocates of tolerance.

Many I know will object to the course that I have suggested, but none more vigorously than the Russians. The timid among us will assert that such action would force Russia's hand and might provoke her to open war. I doubt it. Russia's response wherever we have taken strong measures and most notably in Korea, does not support this conclusion. The scared will say "Let us attack them first" in what has been called a defensive war. I doubt that we will ever do that. We cannot base our course vis-à-vis Russia on timidity or on fright. Nor can we solve our problems by appeasement, or by threats or by oratory or by exchanges of letters or in present circumstances, by personal conferences with "good old Joe." What we need is clear, forceful, and consistent policy and action based on a sound estimate of the situation. President Truman's firm and realistic decisions in the early stages of the Korean aggression were pitched in the right way.

Above all we cannot achieve lasting peace by continuing to live in a kind of rosy or should I say "Reddish" idealistic haze. We must come to grips with the stern realities of power, harnessing it firmly to the cause of justice and world peace.

I do not claim that if we take the steps that I have suggested we will immediately transform the world into a place where, free from care, we can live happily ever afterward. I do claim, however, that by taking the course proposed, we can create world conditions where, with eternal, intelligent, and courageous vigilance, we can, as a practical matter, win and preserve a just and lasting peace, a peace which will bring in its wake those material and intangible blessings which alone make life worth living.

I have attempted to state my views clearly, and I assure you, they have been stated modestly, for I know very well that, in these matters, there is room for wide differences of opinion among patriotic and well-informed people. Nobody knows all the answers. Even though many of you may not agree with me, I am grateful for the courteous attention that all of you have given to my remarks, and thank you for it.

Further Political Activities of the Doctors of the Second Congressional District of Nebraska, Part III

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, some time after I received the barrage of letters from the doctors as indicated in yesterday's insertion, growing out of my mailing 5,000 pamphlets explaining President Truman's health plan to doctors and other interested parties in my district, I began to receive resolutions from civic and other groups, all of which followed a definite pattern and showed by comparison that they originated from the same source. These resolutions followed this pattern:

Whereas the American family has received the finest quality of medical care available in any country in the world, developed under our system of free enterprise; and

Whereas compulsory health insurance, wherever tried, has caused a decline in national health and deterioration of medical standards and facilities, to the detriment of family welfare; and

Whereas compulsory health insurance, wherever tried, has taken away the family's right to choosing its own family physicians; and

Whereas invasion of family privacy and violation of the sanctity of the patient-physician relationship have proved to be one of the most objectionable features of compulsory health insurance, wherever tried; and

Whereas compulsory health insurance would result immediately in a tax of 3 percent on the income of the American workingman, rising within a few years to 6 percent and higher, creating a new tax burden which would reduce household budgets and bring down family standards of living; and

Whereas Government control of medical services, by gradually undermining free enterprise and establishing heavy new tax burdens and unprecedented national deficits, would threaten national bankruptcy and encourage the spread of socialism, which would endanger the rights of our children to the individual freedoms which have been the American heritage: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we hereby go on record against any form of compulsory health insurance or any system of political medicine designed for national bureaucratic control.

I made the following answers to these resolutions:

Your resolution was received by me and I wish to advise you that I have always been of the thought that socialized medicine should never find a place in our Government setup. But socialized medicine and national health insurance are two different things, as the slightest investigation will disclose.

It seems to me that the medical profession has been grossly deceived by some interests or some sources and have refused to investigate or learn the difference between socialized medicine and national health insurance.

There are at least three national health insurance bills pending in the Congress now which are compulsory in nature. Having had some disastrous life-insurance experience personally, as far as loading up on insurance was concerned, I can see the danger of compulsory health insurance to many well-meaning persons.

I think that we need some sort of national health insurance if private insurance companies cannot do the job, but any such insurance should be voluntary, and by that I mean that the individual should be accorded the right to say whether he wants the insurance or not and to choose his doctor and the doctor should have the right to accept or reject the patient.

There are many people who would not want national health insurance such as persons who already have adequate insurance of their own choosing with private insurance concerns, persons who work for railroads and other large business institutions, as well as certain public and quasi-public businesses and of course all veterans have a hospital, medical, and dental plan already and it would be of no use to compel these veterans who are employed to take out national health insurance. In other words, I do not believe in loading up people who do not need it with health or accident insurance whether it be Government insurance or private insurance.

Insofar as the foregoing is in agreement with your resolution you can rely upon what I said in this letter and that I shall conduct myself accordingly, notwithstanding.

I came back to Omaha, Nebr., in December 1949, and found the reactionary Republican-Democratic doctors fairly fraunching with rage. I offered to go before the local medical society and explain my stand and talk with them, but they refused to hear me. I talked to the bellwether medical doctors on the streets and over the telephone but to no avail. Finally, Dr. Joseph F. Cross, a fledgling doctor, suggested to certain doctors to let me talk to them and have everybody loaded up with questions, and confuse and confound me, but one of the old Republican wiseacres said, "Oh, don't do that. That O'SULLIVAN is too smart—too experienced. He will answer all your questions and put you to shame. Don't let him appear at all. Keep him away," and I was kept away.

Finally the Omaha dentists, through a friend of mine, consented to let me speak before them and I did so. They had a court reporter take down all I said. I wish I could read that speech to you. Dr. Dailey erroneously introduced me by saying that I would speak for 30 minutes to the dot in favor of socialized medicine, even though I had told him and everyone else I was against socialized medicine. When I arose to address the gathering I roundly repudiated the subject which Dr. Dailey had foisted upon me. I told them I was against and not for socialized medicine and compulsory health insurance; that I favored voluntary health insurance. I answered every one of their questions. They listened to me gravely and in great dignity; they retired to deliberate upon a nonexistent issue.

The mental mountain labored far into the night and brought forth the following intellectual mouse:

OMAHA DISTRICT DENTAL SOCIETY,
Omaha, Nebr., December 7, 1949.

The Omaha District Society had the Honorable EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN, Second Nebraska District Congressman, as the speaker for their regular monthly meeting held at the Fontenelle Hotel, Tuesday, December 6, 1949.

The announced topic of Mr. O'SULLIVAN was Why I Am Still as I Always Was, Against Socialized Medicine and for President Truman's National Health Program.

After the address the society decided that the speaker had failed to prove that President Truman's health program was anything except socialized medicine under a different name and adopted the following resolution unanimously:

"Resolution

"Whereas the American and medical profession have established the world's highest standards of dental and medical care resulting in the healthiest major Nation on earth; and

"Whereas the private practice system has been the great factor in establishing that record; and

"Whereas the proposed bill S. 1679, H. R. 4312, and H. R. 4313 which is President Truman's national health program is socialized dentistry and medicine under a different name; be it

"Resolved, That the Omaha District Dental Society, a component of the Nebraska State Dental Association and the American Dental Association, hereby request the Congress of the United States not to enact any legislation containing the principle of compulsory health insurance.

"EDMUND J. DAILEY, D. D. S.,
"President.
"ARLO M. DUNN, D. D. S.,
"Secretary."

In a last desperate effort to bring order out of chaos and truth out of falsehood to those who have eyes and see not, who have ears and hear not, who have brains and think not, and whose voices akin to those who brought the sentence of death on the Nazarene, I sent this letter:

OMAHA, NEBR., December 13, 1949.
OMAHA DISTRICT DENTAL SOCIETY,
Omaha, Nebr.
(Attention: Edmund J. Dailey, D. D. S., president.)

DEAR DR. DAILEY: I am very sorry that your organization erroneously persists in assuming that President Truman's national health program is socialized medicine under a different name, when it is not any such thing, but who am I to criticize you, if you want to join the reactionary Republican doctors and in good old Mother Goose fashion, thrust your fists against the the posts and still insist you see the ghosts.

The President's program, you must remember, embraces much more than health insurance which your group, like the medical men, have overlooked in the grand assault to appropriate the whole health-insurance field for Blue Cross and Blue Shield, which puts the medical men and the profession in a sort of a medical business for sure, to the financial detriment of private insurance companies and those who believe that medicine is a profession and not a business.

I, as you know, am not against these organizations even though they go far afield in a real socializing endeavor, and in order to protect all proper health-insurance companies, believe that any national health insurance should be on a voluntary basis, i. e., the practitioner should have the right to select his patient, the patient to select the practitioner, and the insured to take or refuse the insurance.

In conclusion, I say that it takes all kinds of people to make a world and we must take the bitter with the sweet and the unreasonable with the reasonable and the selfish with the unselfish, I guess.

With kindest regards, I remain,
EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN.

As an aside, I say man may protect himself adequately against every malefactor in the world except one, and that is a liar, because he does not know what a liar is going to say or do.

I will conclude by saying again, Do not let these insurance-guided reactionary doctors fool you and remember I was always against socialism, socialized medicine, and compulsory health insurance and was always for voluntary health insurance and think, talk, and act in accordance with the American way which is the best way.

You know the rest, I am sure. For months now the insurance-guided, reactionary Republican-Democratic bellwethers of medicine have been cruising about the Second Congressional District much like a bad accident looking for some place to happen and repeating the falsehood, O'SULLIVAN is for socialism, socialized medicine, and compulsory health insurance and they know full well that that is false.

Will you people please correct the wrong impressions about me which these M. D.'s and others are making? Will you help me to refute these lies?

Good-by and thanks for listening, ladies and gentlemen.

Labor Editor Says Election Revolt Against Union Brass

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER NORBLAD
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article from the Portland Oregonian of Friday, November 17, 1950:

"Senator ROBERT TAFT'S record victory in Ohio and the defeat of labor candidates elsewhere was a revolt of the rank and file against its leadership—a leadership suffering from self-hypnosis," S. Eugene Allen, editor of Oregon Labor Press, said in a two-column analysis of this month's election returns in the current issue of his paper.

Allen charged the "high brass" of the labor unions with fatal mistakes in reading election returns and in strategy which, instead of making votes, turned labor against the program of the high command.

He charged that leadership abandoned the traditional nonpartisan position of labor and went hook, line, and sinker into the Democratic Party and the results were a smashing victory for Taft and utter rout for labor.

Declaring the American trade-unionist is not in anyone's pocket, Allen asserted the high command made the mistake of assuming working people would follow the political leadership of the A. F. of L. and CIO and the independent unions just because they believe in union organization and collective bargaining.

He said, "Working people belong to labor unions for economic reasons, not for political reasons. They pay business agents and other officers to represent them in collective bargaining, not to give out political advice."

1948 CALLED FARM VOTE

"Chief of the fatal mistakes made by the high command of labor were," he said:

"1. The assumption that Truman's 1948 victory was a labor victory." Allen said it was a farm-vote victory.

2. The assumption that the Truman victory gave labor a mandate for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Law. He pointed out labor refused against the advice of such real statesmen as WAYNE MORSE and PAUL DOUGLAS to agree to amendments to the law which would ameliorate some of the drastic provisions of the act.

3. The assumption that working people would follow political leadership of the high brass of the unions.

4. The assumption that there is "class consciousness" among working people. He said working people are now the American middle class.

LABOR'S WORST BEATING

He pointed out that never in history has labor made a greater fight than in Ohio, "nor have they been so badly beaten" and labor was humiliated.

"It is simply impossible in Ohio—or in any other industrial State—for a majority such as Senator TAFT received to be gained without votes of labor unionists," he said.

Labor's campaign was not based primarily on the issues (of which there were a great plenty) but was one of shameless name calling and flinging of dead cats. The members of labor unions resented it. They voted for TAFT.

"Hereafter," said Allen, "labor should learn some lessons." He recommended:

"Read the election returns properly. Don't think a farm vote represents a labor victory. Don't assume a single issue is a winner in a complex national election. Don't back a candidate of little merit merely to oppose some one. Remember that labor's vote isn't in anyone's pocket and that valid issues and not dead cats win votes. Avoid like the plague entangling alliances with any political party. Clean our own house so we have nothing for apology. Grow up."

Let Us Have Right Kind and Number of Ships

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mr. Hugh Gallagher, president of the Propeller Club of the United States, which appeared in the November issue of the Propeller Club News:

LET US HAVE RIGHT KIND AND NUMBER OF SHIPS

(By Hugh Gallagher, president, Propeller Club of the United States)

Practically my whole life has been directed toward the building of a strong American merchant marine and, as president of the National Propeller Club, it is my intention to direct the energies of this fine organization toward that goal. I hope every member will consider himself a minute man who is always on guard and willing to act on matters which will accomplish desired results.

We have been resting on our oars since the end of World War II, complacently regarding our huge laid-up fleet as money in the bank to be used in an emergency. And what has happened? In the Korean situation we found only a few of these ships were of the type that could get into service quickly enough to save us from disaster. We had insufficient troop ships and fast cargo ships to do the job. We had even to charter some foreign ships. Had we been opposed by enemy submarines and atomic bombs, our small forces could not have held out as gallantly as they did and the Inchon landing could not have been accomplished.

We must remedy this, without delay. Fortunately, there are some in Washington who are trying to get a fast-cargo-ship program started. Vice Adm. Edward L. Cochrane, Chairman of the Federal Maritime Board, has taken the lead in pushing this program. Every member of the Propeller Club should back him up to the hilt. Let us not worry too much about whether such a ship will be adaptable to all peacetime trade uses. It is more important that it be fast enough to get there, capable of carrying a good load, and able to outrun submarines. We also need troop ships which can transport our men to any spot on the globe—fast. Little is gained by troop carriers advancing at 30 knots if they are not followed closely by cargo ships with supplies, ammunition, and fuel.

The industry associations have been working on legislation which will help to overcome some of these deficiencies, because it will afford private enterprise an opportunity to build ships that are both useful for trade and which can be used in an emergency. But why hasn't this legislation been passed? Must we go through a Dunkerque before we are shocked into doing what is so obviously sensible? Every member must become active in urging his congressional representatives to give close attention to the vital role our merchant marine plays in the defense of freedom.

We must be alert and active against those who urge that foreign shipping should carry more of our commerce because it will improve their dollar position. This is a fallacious position and is not a truly American viewpoint. We must regard such advocates as enemies of a strong American merchant marine. Our export tonnage has, in a large measure, been in Government-financed cargoes, and it is only right that 50 percent of them be transported in United States ships. If American ships are not entitled to a fair share of that tonnage, then the American farmer, manufacturer, worker, and all involved should forego participation. There is no reason why American shipping should be singled out to close the dollar gap.

All members must take this problem to heart. Don't write off the alleged do-gooders in high places, who subtly argue against the American merchant marine. They are active and many. They don't seem to understand that, if we should need ships to save our lives and our freedom, we could not depend on foreign ships to do the job for us. The last war proved, on the contrary, that foreign nations had to turn to the United States to get shipping needed to win the war.

We can only be sure of American ships. Let us have the right kind and the right number ready for the job that may be ahead.

Trends in Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN L. McCLELLAN
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, long before the war began in Korea, and at a time when the administration and our people were primarily concerned with a domestic legislative program, in anticipation that a lasting and enduring peace could be achieved, I expressed grave concern on the floor of the Senate and in other public addresses regarding certain trends in our Government, and apprehensions regarding the legislative program sponsored by the administration.

I undertook to evaluate that program primarily on the basis of our ability to support it if it should be enacted into law, and also the risk it would involve to sound fiscal policies and the solvency of our Government.

The last time, Mr. President, that I discussed these problems at a public forum was at the Arkansas Bar Association in Hot Springs, Ark., on May 13, 1950. Subsequently I received a letter from a young jurist and distinguished citizen of my State, Judge Thomas F. Butt, of Fayetteville, Ark., commenting upon the address I delivered at the bar association meeting, in which he expressed views and made comments that should in my opinion engage the serious thought of every citizen of our country, and particularly of the youth among our citizenship, upon whom will rest grave responsibilities as they come into maturity and assume the obligations that citizenship in our democracy entail.

For the information of my colleagues, and in the hope that Judge Butt's letter may be read by many others, I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

I further ask, Mr. President, that immediately following the letter of Judge Butt, to which I have referred, the address I delivered at the bar association in Arkansas, May 13, 1950, also be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter from Judge Butt and the address by Senator MCCLELLAN were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAYETTEVILLE, ARK., October 31, 1950.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Not being from your section of the State, and having met you but a few times, and then only casually, it is probable that you would have no reason to identify or remember me. For purposes of recognition, I believe that you do know my father, F. O. Butt, of Eureka Springs, and knew my late brother, John K. Butt.

I have had the pleasure of hearing you speak on several occasions in the past, but the purpose of this letter is to congratulate you on your splendid speech given to the Arkansas Bar Association last May. That convention was the first I have missed, and only recently did I read your address in the Arkansas Law Review.

Of course, one likes or dislikes a given talk in direct proportion to the degree the talk happens to gibe with one's own opinions; but without becoming prolix, let me say that I agree wholeheartedly with what you had to say. Frankly, I am gravely concerned about the democratic future of this country, and I am not speaking politically. I honestly, and regretfully believe that your and my generation, and our children, will never again experience and enjoy the full fruition of traditional American freedom of the individual that you experienced as a younger man, and that I caught glimpses of as I was growing to maturity. I am gravely concerned that the American people, by their own default, are letting their individual liberties slip away, and that they have become so accustomed to holding their hands out to Washington, that they now demand the paternal care of the central government as a right, and not as a matter of temporary emergency relief. The increasing costs of Government can, or course, be laid in part to the tremendous financial burdens of World War II, and I was struck by your assertion that of the projected $9,000,000,000 increase in fiscal 1950, only about two billion was for defense and related items, the balance being for purely domestic items bearing on the national economy, and the Federal Government's growing suzerainty over the individual citizen's private affairs.

Let me tell you of a striking, and in my opinion, terrible thing that I witnessed about a year ago. Here in Fayetteville, the annual C of C dinner attracted some 700 people. During the course of the speaker's remarks, he asked: "In 1775, what was the watchword of the young American people" The answer came from all over the banquet hall: "Liberty-freedom." Then the speaker asked: 'What is today's watchword?" and again came the answer: "Security, security."

The terrible thing about it, as I see it, is that we as a people, and as individuals, are, by our demand for security, surrendering, I fear, forever, the basic freedoms and liberties without which, inevitably, there can never be real security. And I think this is so, primarily, because our Federal Government has embarked upon, and is assiduously pursuing, a course of governmental philosophy, implemented by legislation, that is leading, and must lead, straight to socialism, and worse. I read, the other day, of a wonderful thing. Perhaps you saw it, too. A man in California had sent his check for $652 to the Oklahoma Welfare Department, explaining that it was to repay the amount spent by Oklahoma for the care of the man's mother, at a time when he was sick and unable to do so. Having regained his physical welfare and earning power, he was repaying that welfare agency. This, to me, is the true American spirit; the notion that each of us, primarily, is responsible for himself and his people, and that such is not a charge of government. Of course, as a great Man said: "The poor we have always with us," and, of course, they must be cared for, by private means if possible, if not, then by public institutions. But this is not to say, in my opinion, that the average citizen, able to earn a living, should in any event look to government for his ultimate care and support. To my mind, the growing burden of taxes, made necessary to effectuate programs of public welfare on a grand and national scale, will inevitably lead to a diminution of the individual's incentive to work and earn a living. On this premise, if correct, it is only a matter of time until the American genius of production and creation of wealth will have been drastically reduced, which will in turn require a greater percentage of total earnings to be allocated to taxes to maintain government services.

It seems to me to be imperative that we try to operate our Government somewhere near a cash basis, and stop this pyramiding of agencies and expenses which create new and expanded agencies and expenses. The Brannan farm plan is but one of many programs that are completely illusory, in that the price paid across the grocery counter may be apparently less, but when you and I add to that price the tax-financed parity support, we are not getting a bargain, and neither is the farmer. In the field of industrial earnings, a vicious spiral is and has been in effect. No one wants to deny labor, little or big, organized or not, a fair wage for his work. But a raise in dollar wages does not necessarily mean a rise in real wages. As cost of Government and Government services increases, taxes must go up, commodity prices rise, and there is another round of wage increases, followed by another round of price rises generally, and so on and on.

What must be done, small though it may be, is to put a stop to nonessential Government spending and Government services. The phantom of something-for-nothing involved in Federal grants and allocations, all of which must be supported by taxes, is an ultimately ruinous thing. I highly commend your insistence that all programs of legislation proposed by the administration be carefully scrutinized to determine not only its probable cost, but its necessity and propriety in itself. I wish you good fortune in your legislative efforts to this end, and hope you will have the doughty assistance of other like-minded legislators.

Sincerely,

THOMAS F. BUTT.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR JOHN L. MCCLELLAN

Thank you, President Warner, distinguished guests, members of the Arkansas Bar Association, and ladies and gentlemen. I was very much honored and pleased when I received your invitation to give this address, and happy when I knew it would be possible for me to accept and have the pleasure of again attending a bar association meeting of my home State. The opportunity to break away for a day from my arduous official responsibilities and from the administrative and legislative battlefields in our National Capital was most welcome indeed.

As I flew down to Arkansas yesterday, in contemplation of this visit with you, my thoughts turned back to earlier days of my professional life when I was privileged to be present at more of the meetings of your association than I have had the opportunity to attend since I entered upon a public career. I have missed these associations and have regretted my inability to be with you and to actively participate in your deliberations and enjoy the fellowship of my friends among the legal profession.

On my way here, I was given to reminiscing and mediating upon some of the momentous events that have ocurred and changes that have taken place since I first had the honor of representing this, the Sixth Congressional District, in the National Congress. I tried to evaluate and make some appraisal of their significance and the impact they have had upon our country, our form of government, our liberties, and how they are influencing our destiny as a nation and as a people.

When I entered Congress 16 years ago, we were in the midst of the greatest economic depression our Nation ever experienced. That was followed or overtaken by a Second World War—the most horrible and devastating military conflict the world has ever known. Along with our Allies we emerged victorious, but the victory has not yet brought to us and to the world the peace, economic stability, and security that we desired and must ultimately achieve if our freedom and way of life are to be preserved. The full fruits of victory have not materialized.

Our efforts toward an enduring peace, economic security, and stability throughout the world have been met up to now, and are meeting, with effective opposition and resistance from the same character of evil forces, of aggression and militarism that plunged this world into World War II. Those events and world conditions have placed upon this Nation of ours and upon our people a tremendous responsibility not only of leadership but of economic power and strength to try to combat and repel the march of these aggressors and try to hold the line against the spread of an evil ideology that, if it conquers, will mean the loss to us of our way of life, of all we have cherished and lived for throughout the years of our existence as a Nation. We cannot shirk that responsibility. America must meet it. I am concerned, however, about how we shall meet it. I am not immediately apprehensive of war. I do not think Russia intends to start a war immediately. I am fully cognizant, however, of the tense situation that exists and do know that some unforeseen and unexpected event could again plunge us into a war much more quickly than now expected.

My humble opinion is—my judgment could be in error—that Russia has a program of pressure, of threats, of intimidation and coercion to keep us in a state of confusion and to cause us, if we will, to weaken our democracy and to wreck our economic system so that we will not be equipped, fortified, or have the strength left to meet the final test if and when a third world war comes.

This challenge must be met, and the major responsibility for leadership, power, and strength to fight and repel this world danger has, by force of circumstances, been thrust upon our own people and our own Government by reason of the preeminent position we occupy in world affairs. We shall not, we must not, shirk this responsibility, but we must recognize that there are limitations to our economic strength and our industrial might and power, and if we are to be equal to the task that confronts us in the present "cold war" or in another shooting war, if one should come, it is imperative that we do not dissipate our strength and power by weakening our democracy and wrecking our economy before the final test shall come. For that reason I believe—and I insist—that it is vitally necessary that we proceed with future governmental, domestic programs, and services in the light of world conditions and the tremendous responsibilities and economic obligations that they have imposed upon us.

My great concern is that, confronted with these world obligations and this condition, our Government is being placed under a terrific economic strain because of obligations that have already been imposed upon us, and by reason of the necessity of our trying to maintain and help rehabilitate other nations and other peoples who do believe in and want to retain their freedom. So I have become concerned about our domestic policies here at home.

Many things in our domestic program are desirable; many things we may hope for and anticipate and work for that we would like to have. But I believe we have got to gear, so to speak, the fiscal policies of this Government and our legislative program and domestic enterprise to world conditions and not let our present desires dominate us in these policies.

So I want to talk to you about trends in government. You will not agree possibly with all I have to say. I am going to give you some facts that are indisputable, facts that are in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that have not been challenged. Then, I shall give you my conclusions. As I say, you do not have to agree with me, but, feeling as I do, convinced as I am about these trends in government, I would be failing in my duty as a public servant; I would not be worthy of the position I hold if I did not, in view of the position I occupy, talk to you about them frankly and honestly.

I agree that as a Nation we are strong and powerful, but I do not indulge the assumption that our Government has unlimited resources and that its economy or productive capacity are sufficient to permit and sustain domestic programs or fiscal policies that require or compel heavy deficit spending from year to year and that will continuously plunge our Nation deeper and deeper into debt.

Therefore, I believe we need to stop, take a look at, and weigh carefully the growth of our Government and trends in government that jeopardize our national solvency.

BIG GOVERNMENT

In terms of power, programs, and functions, we have witnessed a phenomenal growth in the Federal Government during the past two decades. The Government is now by far bigger, and is spending much more, than ever before in the peacetime history of our Republic. The enormous expansions that have taken place in that brief period of time are astounding and difficult of description.

Big Government, which in the past has been ardently advocated and sought by some, and equally opposed and feared by many others, is no longer a mere scare word of fantasy or figment of political speech. It has become a firmly-established and well-entrenched reality.

PROOF OF GROWTH

For proof, we have only to make comparisons and cite the record.

Today there are in departments, boards, commissions, bureaus, corporations, and other establishments, some 1,800 components of the Federal Government, whereas, in 1930 there were less than 450—an increase of 400 percent. Twenty years ago we had less than 600,000 Federal employees. Today the number is two million.

In 1930 our national debt was $16,000,000,000, or about $130 per capita. Now, 20 years later, the Federal debt is $256,000,000,000, or about $1,700 per capita, and it is presently increasing at a rate in excess of $5,000,000,000 annually. That is shown by anticipated deficits for the present fiscal year of 1950 and for the next, 1951.

Federal taxes (revenue receipts) are now nine and one-quarter times greater than they were in 1930, while expenditures—the operating cost of the Federal Government in 1950—will be thirteen times greater than it was in 1930. And Federal expenditures are not now declining, as we had hoped they would be. They are still rising.

In fiscal 1948, our Government spent in round numbers $34,000,000,000. This year, 1950, Federal expenditures will exceed $43,000,000,000—an increase during the past 2 years of more than $9,000,000,000. But little, if any, of this increase is attributable to foreign spending, and only two and one-half billion out of the nine billion represents additional cost of national defense. About $6,000,000,000 of that increase is for various domestic programs and services that are wholly unrelated to foreign aid and national defense.

One striking example of rapid growth, which is common among many agencies of government, is found in the Department of Agriculture. In 1932 it cost only $220,000,000 to operate this Department. At that time it had only 27,000 employees. Now the Department has 86,000 employees and it is currently costing $2,500,000,000 per year to operate it. Similar growth and increase in costs are present in the Departments of Justice, Interior, and Commerce.

We must add to these a multiplicity of new agencies that have been created and functions that have been established, all of which are requiring the expenditure of many millions of dollars for their support and maintenance.

These significant facts indicate not only that the cost of government is rapidly mounting, but, more, they indicate that rising costs have already attained a momentum that will be most difficult to check or control.

Whether this state of affairs has been thrust upon us wholly by circumstances beyond our control, or if this development has occurred partly as the result of our own carelessness and indifference, it is evident that big government is now upon us, for better or for worse—and I regret that I am compelled to say, in my judgment, it is here to stay. I see no escape from it.

I should like to feel, and should like to be able to give to you and to the American people some assurance that the Federal Government is now full grown—that it has matured—and that we might reasonably expect future annual budgets to be reduced or, at least, held somewhere near present levels. But present trends manifestly are not at all in the direction of curtailment of expenditures nor toward the decentralization of concentrated power in the executive branch of the Government.

HOW GOVERNMENT GROWS

Yes, I know we hear a lot of talk about balancing the budget, about retrenching, and cutting down Federal expenditures. But talk and more talk simply in the mood of wishful thinking without taking practicable and affirmative action will not get the job done.

There is much more involved in checking or preventing rising cost of Government than a mere meat-ax operation in cutting appropriations. Appropriations are based upon and follow legislative authorizations. Authorization statutes in most instances create both moral and legal obligations that later have to be honored and paid by the Government.

New laws and more laws expanding existing governmental services and programs, or establishing new ones, correspondingly increase and multiply the budgetary obligations that the Congress and the Federal Government are called upon to appropriate for each succeeding year. So, what's happening—and this is too often lost sight of not only by the public and the average citizen, but by the Congress as well—is that each year when we have the appropriation bills under consideration we find that at preceding sessions we have passed laws raising salaries, creating new boards, agencies, or commissions with new services to be rendered, or providing for the expansion of existing services and functions. Thus we face pay day on the moral and legal obligations that attached when the authorization laws were passed.

And that is how government grows. Those are some of the reasons why cost of operations is increasing, why deficits continue and become larger, and why demands for higher taxes persist.

PRESIDENT'S LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Under our system the President not only submits to the Congress an appropriation or expenditure budget, but he also submits a legislative program. Bills that are now pending to carry out legislative recommendations contained in the President's annual message and other messages to the Congress, present a disturbing prospect of the continued rapid expansion and growth of Federal power with correspondingly increasing cost of operations.

I cannot enumerate and comment upon all those measures, but I shall refer to some of them. At my direction the staff of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which I am chairman, in consultation with other Government authorities, recently made an analysis of the estimated cost of some 15 measures now pending in the Congress to carry out the President's legislative program. It was ascertained by this analysis that if these 15 measures should be enacted into law, they will increase the annual cost of the Federal Government by $25,000,000,000 when they get into full operation.

Among the more prominent and important of these measures is one to establish a compulsory national health insurance program at an estimated cost of $7,000,000,000 a year. Another bill is for the expansion of social security, both in coverage and in amounts of benefits to be paid. This fully extended social-security program as recommended will cost $6,000,000,000 a year. A third measure is popularly known as the Brannan farm plan and it will cost another $6,000,000,000 annually. Universal military training will cost at least $3,000,000,000. And another bill for housing and public works will cost $1,400,000,000 annually. These five measures alone, if enacted into law, will add more than twenty-three billion dollars each year to the Federal Governments expenditures, and the other 10 of the 15 measures are by no means all of the present legislative program. But in terms of cost the fifteen represent the major part of it.

These estimates of cost do not represent my own personal opinion. They were not taken out of thin air, nor were they arbitrarily arrived at. They were determined after a careful review of statistics submitted, and opinions expressed, by competent witnesses of both the proponents and opponents who have testified on these bills before congressional committees to which they were referred. These figures represent neither the highest nor the lowest of approximate cost testified to, but are generally conservative and range closer to the lowest than they do to the highest estimate submitted to the committees.

When addressing the Senate on February 22, this year, I had inserted as a part of my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the table prepared by the staff of the Expenditures Committee showing these estimates of cost of each of these measures if enacted into law, and they totaled more than twenty-five billion dollars. Three months have now elapsed and the accuracy of these estimates of costs, so far as I know, has not yet been challenged from any source, and certainly by no one holding any responsible position in our Government. The truth is that instead of the twenty-five billion being an exaggeration it is definitely an understatement.

To illustrate, if we compare the cost of the socialized-medicine program with that of Great Britain, based on the population of the two countries and a comparative wage scale and standard of living, the compulsory national health program that is proposed, instead of costing $7,000,000,000, will cost between twelve and fourteen billion dollars annually. If I should say that the cost of all these programs would amount to $35,000,000,000 annually when they are in full operation, that still would not be an exaggeration.

Now let's see what this program will mean. Of course, we are not going to pay for it. It just means more deficit spending. But if we are going to pay for it and support it on a pay-as-we-go basis, let's look at it. I don't think we can go on indefinitely spending $5,000,000,000 a year more than we take in without having disastrous inflation. I am not afraid of a depression unless we have inflation. I don't think we will have a depression unless it is preceded by inflation, and increased deficit spending is a long step toward inflation in time of peace. I am not saying the budget can definitely be balanced this year, but I am saying if it is ever to be balanced again in your lifetime and mine, we must quit passing more and more laws that have to be financed and serviced out of the earnings of the American people.

COST—IN TERMS OF TAXES

Twenty-five billion dollars additional annual expenditures by the Federal Government, if we are to support these new and expanded programs on a pay-as-we-go basis, will require additional taxes of $166 per year for every man, woman, and child in America. The $25,000,000,000 added to our present $43,000,000,000 budget will raise the Federal expenditures to above $65,000,000,000. This huge total of Government cost would impose a tax burden of $433 per capita on the American people to support the Federal Government on a pay-as-we-go basis.

So far as I know and can ascertain, only one other nation today among the free peoples of the world has a tax obligation in comparison, and that is Great Britain. And it is well known that under their system and that kind of a tax burden the people of England have sunk to an austerity standard of living, and in that unhappy circumstance they can only support and keep afloat their present government and economy by gratuities of a billion dollars a year or more from the American taxpayers.

Do you want this program enacted into law? If we collect the taxes to pay for it as we go along, together with our State, county, and municipal taxes, and on the basis of the present national income, it means 40 cents out of every dollar of the wages, of the salaries, and of the incomes of the people of America—2 days out of each 5-day week. There is the fellow, of course, who says, "I don't pay that tax. You are going to get that out of the rich man." That is one of the biggest jobs we have today, to get over to the laboring man and farmer the unfortunate but indisputable truth that he is the man who pays taxes. Make no mistake about it. Taxes come from profits—and profits have to come from goods and services. It is the consumer who pays not only the cost of goods and the cost of services but he pays over and above that cost an amount sufficient to pay these taxes and provide a profit to the man who operates a business or who is selling services. Too often the fact is overlooked that it is the consumer who pays.

Now, I have no quarrel with all of this proposed legislation. I think some of it may be good. It may be making a substantial and proper approach even to some worth-while goal. I am not complaining about that. I am against some of it. I am going to oppose it and fight it, but I am not against all of the programs or all social gains we might be able to make if and when we can afford them. But I want to point this out: That the common prudence exercised by you and me in our private affairs and in our business affairs, with respect to living within our incomes, does not now prevail in Washington and is not now being practiced in the fiscal policies of this Nation. How often have you and I had desires, maybe needs, actual needs, for some things we could not immediately afford? What you and I do in our private affairs and in business life is simply exercise that common-sense restraint and defer the acquisition of those things until such time as our incomes will permit or we can afford them and know we will be able to pay for them. Looking back through history, any other government that has not operated that way has ultimately failed. Can we defy history? Can we defy the laws of economics and get away with it? To do so is a dangerous gamble.

COMPULSORY HEALTH BILL

I do not quarrel with the purpose and general objectives of all of the 15 measures to which I have referred. Some of them may well have merit and offer an approach to worth-while goals whenever our fiscal status improves to where we will be justified in taking on the additional responsibilities and financial obligations they will incur. But to three of the bills I am unalterably opposed. They are the proposed compulsory national health insurance bill, the Brannan farm plan, and the fair employment practices bill. These measures would, I believe, concentrate unprecedented powers—social, economic, and political—in the Central Government in Washington.

The compulsory national health insurance and the fair employment practices proposals are destructive of our traditional American freedom and constitute a flagrant encroachment upon those personal liberties that are vouchsafed to all citizens by the Federal Constitution—the fundamental law of our land. The right to life, to liberty, and to the pursuit of happiness will be, to a material degree, regimented into a bureaucratic straitjacket if these measures should be enacted into law.

In my opinion the proposed "compulsory" national health program means "political medicine" dispensed by a medical profession that will be circumscribed, dominated, and controlled by administrative orders, edicts, and decrees out of Washington. Such a program will provide no panacea for the health of the American people.

The title "health insurance" is an attractive and persuasive "window dressing." This label gives it a flattering appeal to many, but it is equally deceptive. The plan is a snare and a delusion, and the very essence of the whole scheme involves power politics, trafficking in human misery and suffering. I do not believe that governmental red tape and the doctor's professional adhesive tape will mix successfully. The red tape will soon rise to the top just like oil does on water. It will dominate and that will mean a regimented medical profession and a deterioration in the quality of medical services.

I am unwilling to discard our present American system where both doctors and patients have enjoyed freedom of choice and action. This system has given to the American people a quality of service and standard of health that are unexcelled anywhere in the world. Let's keep it and not exchange it for a system that will deny freedom of choice in the exercise of the inherent right of a human being to act independently and of his own free will in the all-important matter and duty of the preservation of the life of himself and that of his family.

BRANNAN FARM PLAN

The Brannan farm plan is designed to have the Federal Government assume and pay annually out of general taxation a multiple-billion-dollar subsidy on the food bill of the American people, under a dubious claim that it will materially reduce the cost of living. While it may have the immediate effect of reducing the retail cost of food commodities, the tax obligation to pay the difference out of the Federal Treasury, plus the tremendous cost of administration, along with the other losses that will be sustained as a result of its destruction of a competitive market for farm products, will greatly exceed any benefits or savings that will be passed on to consumers.

If this law passes, there will be no responsibility on the farmer to try to get the highest price in the market when he sells his wheat, corn, potatoes, and other produce, nor for the market to compete for his product. This law will obligate the Government to pay out of the Federal Treasury the difference between the established parity price and what the farmer gets for his products in the prevailing market price.

FEPC

The Fair Employment Practices Commission bill, which is now the pending business in the Senate, and which is being debated at considerable length, is vicious in the extreme; and basically this proposal is objectionable, if not reprehensible, from any standpoint. However, without regard to the issue of race, religion, color, or creed, it violates and would destroy one of the most basic liberties that we enjoy—the right to own, possess, and control property. He who by his labor, thrift, ingenuity, and investment of his capital creates a business, owns that business under the fundamental law of our land. If that business so established makes available jobs for others, the Federal Government or some bureaucrat in Washington certainly does not own or have a right to control or dispose of that job any more than the Government or some bureaucrat in Washington owns or has the right to control and dispose of the business out of which the job arises.

This bill, aside from the other contemptible aspects of it, which I shall not take time to discuss, is tantamount to the taking of private property—not for public use but for private use and enjoyment—without paying just compensation therefor. The bill should be defeated, and in my opinion—at least it is my hope—in this present battle we of the opposition will again emerge victorious and thus postpone the evil day when such iniquitous legislation shall, if ever, be enacted into law.

FULL EMPLOYMENT

Indications of other trends and efforts to centralize power can be found in other bills now pending. In passing, I should like to refer to the Employment Act of 1946, which established the Council of Economic Advisers to the President. As originally introduced in the United States Senate and as reported to the Senate by the committee, this bill contained a provision that in effect guaranteed to everyone able to work "useful remunerative, regular, and full time employment." In other words, this provision, which had considerable support in the Congress at that time, undertook to have the Federal Government guarantee everyone a job. A majority of the Senate, however, opposed the provision, and that part of the bill did not become law.

PLANNED ECONOMY

There is another bill now pending in the Congress, H. R. 2756, known as the Spence bill, that will give you a further idea of what the economic planners in Washington would do to this country if the Congress did not vigilantly guard over the liberties of the American people and our free enterprise system. This bill is known as the Economic Stability Act of 1949. I shall not attempt to give you a complete analysis of it, but only a brief summary of the tremendous power it attempts to create and vest in the economic planners and rulers in the national Capital. This bill might more appropriately be named "The Planned Economy Act." For all practical purposes it would constitute the President of the United States the "supreme planner" for the whole national economy.

This bill would give the President of the United States the power to decide how much of any essential commodity, such as steel, coal, lumber, grains, or most any other product, is to be produced, and power to make up a national production budget accordingly. Under this bill the President can then decide whether this production should be done by private enterprise, and, if so, to then compel consultation between management, labor, farmers, and the Government to carry out such production programs as the President may establish. If the President decides that private industry cannot or will not expand its capacity to meet the President's production goals, he may construct Government plants and factories in any given industry or production field and then contract with private persons to operate these facilities or he may create Government-owned corporations to do so. This bill would give the President the authority, which he recently demanded, to permit the Government to go into the steel business. It would also give him the authority to put the Government in the coal business, in the mining business, or into most any other industrial, productive enterprise.

It would give him the further authority to establish voluntary priority for materials after consultation with industry. If the voluntary procedure did not work, he would then have the authority to set up compulsory priorities and allocation of materials. That would mean that the private manufacturer would first have to get permission from the President before he could secure raw materials, with the President having the right to decide in what order and in what quantities the manufacturer would get the materials. This would vest in the President of the United States, or in some bureau head under his direction, the very power of life and death over every industrial free-enterprise business in the land. It would give him the further power to regulate imports and exports, as was done during the war. It would give him the power to establish maximum prices on materials or facilities if he thinks them necessary. Once that power was exercised, no private business concern could raise its prices without giving to the President 60 days' notice and then the President could refuse it permission to do so.

True, this bill has not yet passed. I hope it never shall. But make no mistake about it, it is the dream and hope of a group of economic planners now in Washington that this bill may become law, so that they can really bask in the power of a planned economy.

We cherish the relationship between the individual citizen and the state under our system of government, wherein the Government is the servant and not the master. We must keep it that way. The power and final authority must ever be reposed in the people themselves. Our past faith in those righteous principles has been abundantly rewarded. It has been crowned with a success and preeminence that is now an envied heritage which it is our obligation and responsibility to perpetuate for the glory of civilization and the benefit of all mankind.

Our national tree, now nearly 2 centuries old, has grown to be a mighty oak in the forest of nations. It towers above all others with its great branches of advantage and superiority, climbing and reaching toward the heavens. All other trees in the forest suffer by comparison. Ours is rooted in the soil of liberty and human freedom. If we sever the roots from the tree, the branches will wither away, the trunk will decay, and the tree itself will surely die.

Government, as we know, has become wasteful. Our staggering national debt appears to be perpetual. We are already taxed in our meat and drink, in our necessities, and in our comforts, in our labors, and in our amusements. The Congress is now asked to increase taxes, to take more of the earnings of the American people away from them under the pretense of caring for them. Higher taxes and more spending will bring neither prosperity nor security. They will impose burdens a free people cannot carry, and the result will be subservience and servitued of the individual to the rulers of the state.

Let us never forget that a Government-planned economy means a Government-controlled economy, and a Government-controlled economy means nationalization of industry, the death of free enterprise.

TRENDS IN GOVERNMENT

(a) Trends in government today are definitely toward bigger but not better government.

(b) Trends are in the direction of more and more spending, with an annual budget of from 65 to 70 billion dollars within the next 5 to 10 years.

(c) Present trends indicate continuous and larger deficits that will pyramid the national debt to $300,000,000,000 or more by 1960.

(d) Trends of the present, unless checked or reversed, will compel higher and higher taxes until we, like England, will be taking 40 cents for Federal taxes out of every dollar earned by the American people.

(e) The trend in Washington too frequently now is to base vital policy decisions on political considerations. The test too often seems to be, Will it win or help win an election? and not whether it is wise, sound in principle, and good for the country.

(f) Trends are in the direction of a super central government in Washington, D. C., toward a master government that will assume the full authority and responsibility for both the planning and controlling of the whole national economy, and for the direction and supervision of many of the daily, social, political, and economic activities of all the people.

WHAT FORM OF GOVERNMENT

You ask, What form of government will that be; communism, fascism, nazism, socialism, or liberalism? You may name it. Your label is as good as mine. Whatever the name, the traditional American liberty and freedom of our sacred heritage will be changed and will not be the same as that bequeathed to us by the blood, wisdom, and sacrifices of our founding fathers.

Can Congress stop these trends? you ask. Yes; the Congress can and should. I cannot promise you that it will. In my opinion, it will only do so if the American people become awakened to the real dangers of a super state where the government becomes the master and the people its servants.

If we in America turn to the left and forsake the righteous principles of personal liberty and freedom and substitute therefor the iniquitous philosophy of state paternalism, we shall not escape just retribution.

The American people, I am sure, do not want to give up their liberty. They will not do so knowingly, but by complacency, indifference, and lack of vigilance in meeting their responsibility as citizens of this great Nation they can lose their freedom. It is not a job alone for the Congress to do. The responsibilities of citizenship that rest upon each individual must be enlisted and mobilized to meet this challenge, and this challenge is of such gravity and magnitude that it demands the most and best in every patriotic American citizen.

If we are to repel this insidious assault against the cornerstone of our Republic, the right to life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness, both we who are Members of Congress and the John Does and the Richard Roes—who are the average citizens of this Nation—must place principle above politics, and patriotism above party, and fight with all our might and strength to save and preserve the America we love.

There is nothing Russia would rather see than the weakening of our economy so that when the final test comes, the system of our Government would be changed and she might not ever have to fire a gun.

Let's wait. Let's hesitate and meditate before we plunge this Nation deeper and deeper into debt. We have no moral right to do it. We have the right, of course, to spend in times of emergency but I am going to close with this thought. Let me quote some sound advice: "If a nation is living within its income, its credit is good. If in some crisis it lives beyond its income for a year or two, it can usually borrow temporarily on reasonable terms but if, like the spendthrift, it throws discretion to the wind, extends its taxing up to the limit of the people's power to pay and continues to pile up deficits, it is on the road to bankruptcy." Who said that? Franklin Delano Roosevelt. What are we doing today? We have to stand firm. We have no right to set up a standard of living here in this country of governmental services, however desirable they may be, that we cannot support and pass on the obligation to our children and grandchildren. It is our obligation to live—as President Roosevelt said—to live within our income, to practice thrift, to make some sacrifices in this hour of stress and strain, when everything is uncertain, when we do not know what threat or danger will be thrust upon us tomorrow. Thank you.

Throughout History No Nation Has Ever Tried To Be Strong in More Than One Medium and Succeeded—Our Survival as a Nation Demands That We Concentrate on Air Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I have before me an editorial from the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star on "The Role of Strategic Air." Besides its general excellence, this thoughtful editorial has the merit of commenting on an indication of an American tendency to confuse an issue. The editorial begins:

As a result of complaints growing out of the Korean war, there has been some danger that second things might be put first in our thinking about the purpose and the use of air power.

In the face of the threat of a general war, we dare not lose sight of the fact that tactical support of the ground forces in Korea has been a second thing for our air power, and that the first thing—that must be kept first—is the air defense of the United States.

The editorial goes on to quote the unusually well informed and astute Secretary of the Air Force, Mr. Thomas K. Finletter, on the combat functions of the Air Force, and the importance of strategic air, which is both a deterrent to aggressors and a retaliatory force in the event of attack. As Mr. Finletter puts it:

The strategic air arm is indispensable to our safety and to the safety of our friends and allies.

The editorial ends:

Ideally, a defense force should be a perfectly balanced force. But the fact that the demands of all branches of services cannot be fully satisfied does not mean that the weapon which offers the best hope for peace, and, failing that, for success in war, should be made to suffer. To do that would be the height of folly.

A more extended development of this thought occurs in a second piece I would call to the attention of this House. It is an article from the November 17 edition of the Christian Science Monitor by its distinguished Paris correspondent, Mr. Volney D. Hurd. The real question of the current international situation, said Mr. Hurd, narrows down to whether Washington has considered that Russia might put enough force behind the Communist action in Korea to push the United Nations army into the sea. If Russia does that, Mr. Hurd asked, have steps been taken for meeting the threat to our security?

These steps—

Wrote Mr. Hurd—

are commonly regarded as nothing less than a strong long-range strategic air force of such size that it would notify Russia of American ability not merely to drop a few atom bombs on Russia, but to keep up a sustained bombing attack on that nation for 5 years if necessary.

Throughout history, no nation has ever tried to be strong in more than one medium and succeeded. England, strong at sea, put its money and manpower into navies instead of huge armies. Germany built huge armies as did France, but both had to keep their navies down in order to do so.

Today, with the addition of air power, a modern nation is confronted with having to sustain two forces.

Mr. Speaker, if America is to win a major war, we will have to do it principally as a result of our superior achievements in the air. We have heard a great deal about the lessons of the Korean war proving that we need huge ground and naval forces. I think the events of the past few days have proved that we can accomplish very little against the masses of manpower that could be thrown against our own boys on the ground.

We must go back and face again the fact that we can depend only on our technical and scientific superiority, and this technical and scientific superiority is most effective in the air.

This is the point of the editorial I submit, as well as of the article. But the article with its analysis of what might happen in Korea, is particularly illuminating because it was written before our recent set-backs in Korea proved the point of the article, and Mr. Hurd's qualification as a military prophet.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the editorial and the article which I commend to my colleagues.

The matters are as follows:

[From the Washington Star of October 28, 1950]

THE ROLE OF STRATEGIC AIR

As a result of complaints growing out of the Korean war, there has been some danger that second things might be put first in our thinking about the purpose and the uses of air power.

The principal complaint has been that the ground forces had neither the right kind nor enough tactical air support. It is undoubtedly true that the pinch of budget limitations during the past few years has been felt more painfully by tactical air than by the strategic arm. If we are going to have to fight ground actions, as in Korea, this will have to be remedied, for tactical air, designed to give close support to ground troops, is indispensable in modern ground warfare. This should never be done, however, at the expense of strategic air—the long-range bombers capable of striking at the heart of any potential or actual enemy.

In his recent talk at the Herald Tribune Forum, the Secretary of the Air Force, Thomas K. Finletter, dealt at some length with this question.

The Air Force, he said, has three first priority combat functions. The first of these is the air defense of the United States—to do what can be done to prevent enemy bombers from reaching their targets in this country. Mr. Finletter did not elaborate on this point, but no one believes that defense can be wholly successful. Some of the bombers, perhaps most of them, would get through.

The second function is that of tactical air support, which, Mr. Finletter said, is an extremely important phase of the Air Force job. His greatest emphasis was laid on the point, however, that, while it is necessary to put more effort and more money into defense and tactical air, this "must never be at the expense of strategic air."

Behind this lies the fundamental thought that our basic objective must be to prevent a major war. Manifestly, nothing should be neglected that would insure our success if, in spite of everything, we are forced into war. But no rational person would deny that it is infinitely preferable to prevent war if that can be done.

It is here that strategic air offers the greatest hope. Deploring what he called the misunderstanding of the high importance of the long-range bomber, the Air Force Secretary declared: "As long as the nations stay heavily armed the strategic air attack—our ability to strike with great atomic power at the very centers of an aggressor nation—will be the greatest force for peace in the whole Western World. If we hadn't had this force we might well be in a world war by now. The strategic air arm is indispensable to our safety and to the safety of our friends and allies."

It is hard to see how there can be any valid disagreement with that point of view. Ideally, a defense force should be a perfectly balanced force. But the fact that the demands of all branches of all services cannot be fully satisfied does not mean that the weapon which offers the best hope for peace, and, failing that, for success in war, should be made to suffer. To do that would be the height of folly.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Boston, Mass., of November 17, 1950]

"ABRASIVE" ROLE OF CHINA COMMUNISTS EYED IN KREMLIN PLANNING

(By Volney D. Hurd)

PARIS.—Russia and its satellites today constitute a vast grindstone. Can the west afford to waste its bar of steel in a futile push against this mass of abrasive? Or is the answer, rather, to smash the bearing on which it turns?

This is the hard decision confronting the United Nations as the Chinese Communist delegation comes to Lake Success to discuss Formosa and to block UN efforts to discuss Korea.

The great question is whether Moscow, despite its championing of Communist China's case before the UN, really wants it to become a member.

In the UN, Communist China would have to play a more discreet role and would be open to contamination by western influences, from which Mao Tze-tung and his crowd have been isolated. Kept out of the UN, Communist China would have to turn to Moscow as its sponsor, protector, and idea source.

TACTLESSNESS SEEN

This would keep huge China under Moscow's thumb, a very practical point in Moscow's perpetuation of its power, and permit the Kremlin to use the vast mass of China to wear down the west.

Communist China's conduct so far, from the maltreatment of American consuls and cool treatment of British recognition to the invasion of Tibet at just this moment, is widely regarded as indicating either stupidity or tactlessness, which is contrary to the Chinese character, or direction by Moscow.

In fact, the very conduct of the Chinese Communist troops in Korea would suggest them as serving as barometers of an internal struggle between pro-Chinese and pro-Russian elements.

Their sudden appearance, quick successes, and then equally sudden vanishing into thin air without pressing home their advantage, make no sense militarily.

PULL AND HAUL

The reappearance of large numbers now building up indicates that they may go into action again. That this might represent the pull and haul between a Mao seeking to hold his pro-Chinese position and dissident elements conditioned and inserted into his organization by Moscow, must be considered as a possibility.

The long Chinese tradition of war lords, of powerful generals building up their own armies and then acting virtually independent of the government, would provide perfect opportunities for the Russians. They could find generals whom they counted on for their own, build the main Communist armies around them, and then encourage these armies to act as though on their own, although really following Moscow's orders.

Mao would be confronted with an accomplished fact, and would have to disown these armies or play along with the policy they forced as a means of saving face. If the best trained and equipped Chinese Communist armies had been made possible only by Russian aid and with Russian picked generals, Mao would be the prisoner of his own revolt and forced to play the puppet.

UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA LIBRARIES

FURTHER INVASION?

These factors are important because they bring the Korean situation down to the possibility that Communist armies may well continue to invade North Korea even without this being the will of Mao, who should know better.

In that case, if Communist China is kept out of the UN, Mao's lone chance of contact with the west is cut, and he must continue in his present role.

With all the talk of more "periphery wars," the fact is that Korea itself as the point of contact between the west's bar of steel and the Communist grindstone, might do a pretty good job without further conflicts.

The cost to the west, particularly the United States, in matériél, men, and money has been huge for such a small side-issue campaign, and the fact is that it has been an utterly unrealistic one, so far as meeting with a genuine modern force is concerned.

LACK OF AIR POWER

The reason is that the Koreans have never had any air power to speak of, and still have not. The UN's military success has been made possible by this fact. And even with this huge advantage, it was touch and go until the extremely hazardous Inchon operation resolved that phase of the conflict.

But suppose that Russia had placed part of its present large air force at the disposal of the North Koreans? The patched-up efforts to get American planes into action, their impossible practical operation from Japan, which was saved only by carrier-based planes at first, plus other short-range planes when some airdromes had been retaken, shows how poorly disposed were UN forces.

A first-class Russian air attack would have produced a very different situation, as Americans can remember from the Pacific battles when the Japanese still had a lot of planes. Until the Japanese air force was cut down, little could be done.

SUPPLY LINES OPEN

It is questionable if carrier commanders could have assumed the responsibility of pushing their craft so close to the shore if a strong Soviet air force had been operating. As to the UN supply lines which remained in unmolested operations, it would have been a different story if Russian planes and submarines had made concentrated attacks on them.

Moscow, by resorting to its often-used expedient of twisting words and terms, could put into action a large part of the Soviet air force, along with Chinese Communist land armies, with no danger of involving Russia itself.

Military equipment and planes could be "lent" as the United States did to its allies in the last war, and as Russia and Germany did with the Spanish elements during that civil war. The pilots could be "volunteers." And, in this case, the Russians could even point to American volunteer fighter pilots of the Flying Tigers, who served China against the Japanese before Pearl Harbor.

WHAT OF LOSSES?

Thus, thousands of Soviet planes and pilots could operate with Communist Chinese land armies without Moscow's being involved, except through the losses caused. But, considering the Soviet Union's present mass production of planes and pilots, it would not need to mind as long as the effort paid off in victories.

The same holds true of volunteer Communist Chinese armies. Out of a nation of 450,000,000 people, 1,000,000 volunteers would not be excessive in present terms of reference.

The picture which then comes up is of Russia acting as the operator of the grindstone, always keeping just enough abrasive material coming along to insure a maximum consumption of the steel bar, without quite pushing it away or ever letting it really gain any headway.

On the long-range basis of Russian thinking, such time-controlled warfare would be logical. The fact is that, at such a distance from America, the chance of offsetting combined Communist land and air might must be rated almost nil for the United States.

THE REAL QUESTION

The question, then, is whether the west is ready to take the real decision, which is to strike at the bearings of that grindstone, Moscow, and so bring the unhappy process to an end.

And the west might have to face that decision without any choice, if the master operator in the Kremlin finally decided to put a lot of abrasive into Korea and push the UN Army into the sea.

The real question narrows down to whether this basic potential expectancy has been considered by Washington and whether steps have been taken for meeting it.

These steps are commonly regarded as nothing less than a strong long-range strategic air force of such size that it would notify Russia of American ability not merely to drop a few atom bombs on Russia, but to keep up a sustained bombing attack on that nation for 5 years if necessary.

Throughout history, no nation has ever tried to be strong in more than one medium and succeeded. England, strong at sea, put its money and manpower into navies instead of huge armies. Germany built huge armies as did France, but both had to keep their navies down in order to do so.

Today, with the addition of air power, a modern nation is confronted with having to sustain two forces.

This is a huge problem. If a power tries to be strong in three, then all history and common sense indicate it is in for disaster either at home, in what it does to the national economy, or abroad, or both.

WHAT OF AIR POWER?

The key point of the Lenin theory is that America must be made to go broke, and then world domination comes to the Kremlin. One of the best ways to hasten this, according to many authorities, would be a huge three-way military effort.

Further, as soon as one starts drafting men to build up the necessary armies, the manpower to produce and operate the complicated technical machines of a long-range strategical air force would begin to disappear.

It is asserted today that, if the United States were pushed out of Asia by Russo-Chinese communism and forced to try to attack the bearing of the grindstone, it frankly has not the air power to do it. The United States could not count on bases near the Asiatic continent and would have to operate from American bases with B–36's.

But the United States is said to have nowhere near enough of these ships, nor their counterparts, which would have to be designed in order to constitute a modern air task force, with different ships playing different roles as the art now dictates.

DELIVERY OF A-BOMBS

And the atom bomb is no better than the ability to deliver it and to sustain such deliveries until such time as the enemy is weak enough to be ready to surrender, as was Japan.

The United States is considered to be far from prepared to do that today.

That the land armies in Europe now in building could ever hope to hold out alone against Russia, unless the latter was threatened by some such superior air power, must also be written off, as it is by the military experts. It is a force which has been planned as a holding auxiliary, for use only until real power can move in.

Alexander de Seversky in his new book, Survival by Air Power, has amplified the issue of such a striking force and its needs. This is a thought-provoking book which may help the general public realize the new military problems, just as his earlier work, Victory Through Air Power, alerted Americans to the importance of air power in the last war.

An Honest Count Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, an editorial published shortly after election day, November 7, 1950, in the Allegan Gazette, by Leo W. Hoffman, at Allegan, Mich., makes interesting reading. It is printed herewith.

ELECTION SHOWS NEED FOR CHANGE

The morning after the election in 1948 metropolitan papers in Michigan reported that Dewey had beat Truman in this State by a small majority. Shortly thereafter it was discovered that more than 30 Wayne County Democrat strongholds had failed to report their straight ballots and a recheck of these ballots gave the election to Truman. An investigation was made by Federal agents but no report was ever published and nothing was done.

On November 8, the day after the 1950 election, papers reported that Kelly was elected governor of Michigan by more than 6,000 votes. But wait, again it appeared that 25 Detroit Democrat precincts had (by mistake, of course) failed to report and count their straight ballots, and a check of these ballots gave Williams a lead of 1,100.

Just how 25 different election boards could all fail to count and report their straight ballots taxes our credulity to the breaking point. Just how this mistake could occur in the 1948 election and then be repeated in the 1950 election forces us to conclude that some group in Detroit is responsible for deliberately withholding the straight ballots for a specific purpose. Any election board, if dishonest, could stuff a ballot box with straight tickets, could substitute ballots, and thus win a close election. It is quite in line with what is happening throughout this Nation. It could be done by the CIO, by Democratic city machines, or a gambling syndicate, or by a combination of all three.

For many years past crooked big city political machines have worked with gamblers. For many years, CIO goons have, under the protection of Democrats, flouted the law.

Individuals responsible for the destruction of property, for beating up individual workers, for conducting the numbers racket, are quite capable of rigging an election.

The Republican Party has asked for a recount and it has a wonderful opportunity for performing a public service for the people of the State of Michigan. No one party or organization should control any election board anywhere. Laws should be passed and enforced to protect the ballot box.

In our opinion, votes in the ballot box are a lot more important than money in the bank. If the results of an election can be changed by theft, forgery, or stupid blunders then there is not much sense in holding an election.

Not too long ago, ballot boxes in a congressional election in Missouri were stolen after recount had been demanded. Truman killed the subsequent investigation. The new type of Democrat who has controlled the party hasn't shown much interest in preserving the integrity of the individual to vote according to his own desire.

Not too long ago, the new Democrat used the baseball bat as one means of persuasion within its own party ranks. The new Democrat has bribed the voter with the taxpayer's money. The new Democrat has unlawfully assessed the union worker for contributions. It appears that the new Democrat is quite capable of stealing an election.

Regardless of the outcome, we hope and trust that the Republican Party will not only conduct a thorough and honest recount but will follow through so the people of this State in the future will have confidence in the ballot box.

Seedbeds of Socialism: No. 3

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN J. WILLIAMS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a most thought-provoking article entitled "Seedbeds of Socialism," which appeared in the December issue of the Nation's Business, and which was written by Mr. Junius B. Wood. Mr. Wood most effectively points out in this article the danger of the administration's program to socialize American agriculture.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

SEEDBEDS OF SOCIALISM: NO. 3—DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

(By Junius B. Wood)

THROUGH A STEADY FLOW OF RULES AND REGULATIONS, THE FARMER IS BEING DRIVEN DOWN THE ROAD TO A FORM OF SOCIALIZED AGRICULTURE REMINISCENT OF THE SOVIET—HERE'S HOW IT IS BEING DONE

Ambitious dictators and rulers through the ages have learned that their power never will be secure until the farmers—they call them peasants—are controlled.

In rich and highly industrialized United States, a socialized state, with each individual regimented and Washington dictating and controlling his livelihood, never will be perfected until the farmer is brought into line. That is the condition toward which the Department of Agriculture has been headed for 17 years. Its officials may deny such ambitions, but the facts give the answer.

Figures do not show the farmer's dominant role in the Nation's economic, social, and political stability. The farm population is less than one-fifth of our total and produces only 8 percent of the net national income. But, like the human heart, it is the most vital part of the body politic. Unless heart and agriculture function smoothly, all else stops.

The farmer produces the food, the first essential for life. Without it, the individual dies and a nation wastes away. The farmer by nature and environment is a self-reliant individualist. He adjusts his crops to local climate and soil and depends on his own judgment to meet nature's changes or to determine his methods or hours of work. Convincing him that he should accept push-button control from Washington is a tough job, but agriculture is progressing in that direction.

Many were still hailing the Russian revolution as an altruistic achievement for the common man when the Agriculture Department, in 1933, started conditioning the farmer for the controls that had developed in the Soviet Union. The revolution which the Communist Party, or Bolsheviki, later took over and labeled with their name, had been started by the peasants. While their sons were away at war and authorities otherwise occupied, peasants booted out their landlords and divided the acres. Without the peasants, czardom collapsed and what was called the "workers, peasants, and soldiers republic" followed. Today the soldiers rule the country while the workers and peasants obey—a natural evolution that may be a warning for us.

After the appointment of Henry A. Wallace as Secretary of Agriculture in 1933, the Department, which in the 44 years since its creation under President Grover Cleveland in 1889 had accomplished marvels in improving agriculture through advice and assistance to the farmer, experiments, and new crops, started telling the farmer what he must do. Names and faces have changed since then and the Soviet Union has lost its roseate popularity, but the Department, with programs modified to suit the times, has continued steadily toward a socialized agriculture under Government control.

The Department's substantial services to the farmer have continued. If Washington actually becomes the big boss farmer of the Nation, the farms will be good ones. That is more than the Soviet Union can show after its years of regimentation.

In the early years of the Wallace tenure, the councils of Harold Ware were heeded in the Department until his death in 1935. Ware was an outstanding farmer, also a charter member of the American Communist Party. His mother, Ella Reeve Bloor, a dynamic little woman known as "Mother Bloor," was famous as a labor agitator. Ware was invited to Russia by Lenin and spent 10 years introducing mechanized farming and establishing immense collective farms. He returned, to be idolized by his clique as a past master of farming fact and theory.

Lee Pressman, who recently informed a congressional committee that he was a Communist at that time, and Alger Hiss, even better known, were assistant general counsels of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, now known as the production and Marketing Administration. Pressman stated that Nathan Witt, John J. Abt, and Charles Kramer, known to some as Charles Krevitsky, were Communist comrades in the Department.

C. B. (Beanie) Baldwin was a power in the Farm Resettlement Administration, which later became the Farm Security Administration and now is the Farmers Home Administration. He rose to Assistant Secretary and, after leaving the Department, was an assistant chairman of the CIO's Political Action Committee. He managed the Wallace Presidential campaign in 1948 and continued as national secretary of the Progressive Citizens of America when Wallace ditched his party after the Red invasion of Korea.

Charles F. Brannan, Secretary since June 2, 1948, got his first taste of farming in 1935, when Secretary Wallace appointed him an assistant solicitor in the Denver FSA office. Before that he had practiced law for 6 years. He and Arthur M. Hyde, Secretary under President Herbert Hoover, are the only ones without practical farm experience among 14 who have held the office. Secretary Brannan also is the conspicuous survivor among the up-and-coming young men of the Wallace days.

Also active in a department which proclaims itself the loving friend and helper of the farmer was John Franklin Carter, later well known as a columnist and commentator under the name "Jay Franklin." He was director of information for Rexford Guy Tugwell who, as Under Secretary, was second only to Wallace. Carter qualified as an agriculturist, of sorts, through a book, What We Are About To Receive, which he wrote in 1932, 2 years before he joined the Department.

"The farmer has arrogated to himself all virtue and all knowledge," Carter wrote. "He has planted prohibition in our vitals, he has voted against progress, against civilization, against the city, against science, against art. He has made and unmade Presidents in the image of Main Street. He has exhausted our soil as he will exhaust our Treasury if given half a chance. He is the great obstacle to human progress, the great threat to political stability. Sooner or later we shall discover * * * that the landed proprietor, the kulak, is simply so much mud on the path of progress and must be swept aside if society is to advance.

"The farmer is a bad winner and a rotten loser and deserves about as much sympathy as any other man who feels that it is the Government's duty to pay him for being kind enough to exist."

Carter left the Department to become a ghost writer for the administration, but the socialization of agriculture, begun in the years when he was expressing a frank opinion of the American farmer and in the years of the farmer's deepest trouble, still goes on.

The Soviet steps, as shown in their present program in occupied countries are: (1) Oust the original landowners; (2) divide the acres among tenants and party followers; (3) force the new owners into a government collective farm.

As most farmers already own their land, we can skip the first step in the Soviet agricultural pattern and not hang American kulaks on their own apple trees or march their families into exile to get acres for the toiling peasants.

Though forcible police methods cannot be applied in the United States, our Department of Agriculture cherished a similar though gentler program, certainly as late as 1941. In that year, Director Baldwin, expounded to his Farm Security Administration workers in Columbus, Ohio, a plan for redividing the country's farm land into small family-type holdings.

Under this plan, the right of public domain would be granted the Government "as a means of securing the subdivision of large landholdings into family-type farms." Instead of being dragged out of his home, the landowner would be served with a court order in the American way—less brutal but just as effective. Also, under this plan, the Government would not dispose of any land which it now owns and would acquire as much more as possible. These Federal tracts could be converted into Government farms. These would grow bigger while destroying the big independent farmer. The advance into the third step with the family-type farms, new and old, consolidated into collective farms—we'd call them cooperatives—would be easy. In the end, the Government would be the only farmer.

As Wallace and his group disappeared from the Department, this drastic program for making over the rustic face of America faded out, but only to return in new dress and ornaments. Secretary Brannan's formula for trimming down the big farm is more adroit, less abrupt. In the meantime, Federal controls over the farmer's planting, harvesting and marketing increase with each passing season.

The Supreme Court has upheld the Government's right "to regulate and control that which it subsidizes." For the farmer, that means Federal controls go hand in hand with price support for a crop or commodity. The Secretary of Agriculture with a staff of some 105,000 State, county, and community committeemen in farm areas, is the supreme arbiter. Before World War II, each State's three to five committeemen were elected by the farmers. They are now appointed by the Secretary. As they control 10 percent of a State's allotment, elected county and community committeemen are dependent—another tightening of Government control.

How such controls and regulation of farms are inseparable from support of crop prices or unending debate over percentages and payments is the diverting smokescreen behind which the farmer is goose-stepped into socialized agriculture. Price support now means that the Government will finance a crop at a price not exceeding 90 percent of parity, parity being computed on the farm cost of living for specified previous years. Congress decides that certain crops will be supported. The Secretary can add others, fixes the parity percentage and imposes the controls. Controls in the price-support program—they have no relation to controls in soil conservation and other programs—are in four classes with many variations for particular crops or conditions.

The financing, purchases or loans, is done by the Commodity Credit Corporation, second only in size to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation among half a hundred Government corporations. CCC has an authorized borrowing power of $6,750,000,000 to carry out price support.

Acreage allotments, stating how many acres a farmer may plant, are the most used control. An allotment may be a hardship or a blessing, taking or giving acres. An allotment may be more valuable than the land itself. Real-estate dealers and land speculators as well as farmers are applicants in seasons of Government distribution.

In North Carolina, with its burley tobacco fields, an allotment is rated at $1,000 an acre. The speculator who receives one can thank the Government for a quick profit. It is not as easy for the farmer who puts the land to use and must accept the controls that go with it. The tobacco allotment may be for a trifing part of a farmer's total acreage, but he must obey Department rules for soil conservation and other practices for all other crops. The Government becomes his farm manager.

When a surplus threatens, the Secretary can cut allotments for a commodity. An allotment is to a farm, not to an individual. So the fun starts. In burley tobacco, for instance, the law does not permit reducing an existing allotment below nine-tenths of an acre. Farmers, each his own "barnyard lawyer," foresee a coming cut. Wives, children, and relatives are rallied and each is given legal title to a fraction of the old homestead and its total allotment. A family combination of ten is sure of 9 acres. One North Carolina county had 850 burley allotments in 1938; 2,400 in 1950.

This year, Representative LINDLEY BECKWORTH polled the Brannan committeemen who distributed the latest cotton acreage allotments in Texas. Bell and Van Zandt Counties reported that about one-tenth of their applicants were genuine farmers, the others wanting an allotment to add to the sale of rental value of the land. In Newton and Angelina Counties, some allotments were only one-tenth of an acre, while in Hill County, one-third of those receiving less than 5 acres quit growing cotton and one-tenth of those who lost out quit farming.

"I was allowed two and two-tenths acres for cotton," a farmer wrote. "I kept off WPA and lived hard in 'Hoover days' but only 2.2 acres out of my 30 forced me on the soup line. I'm too old now to get a job and didn't go to school long enough to get a 'position' and my rheumatism's too bad to dig ditches with a pick and shovel."

"If this farm program were put on a sane and sensible plan without the fiddling, dilly-dallying, measuring, and all the silly stuff telling a farmer how much of each crop he is allowed to plant, it could be handled with one-fourth the number of helpers and save millions," wrote another, adding a hope that the "whole program will be junked" unless quickly improved.

Though few may see a finished picture of the Department's drive toward complete socialization of agriculture, more and more farmers complain as their acres are put under increased Government controls. Price support gives the farmer a satisfying sense of security while its controls destroy his right to manage his own farm. As he looks at the national picture, he sees a Government building up surpluses whose weight, unless absorbed by wars or other disaster, will swamp him with controls.

The farmer also realizes that payments depend on changing sessions of Congress and the discretion of a Secretary of Agriculture. He sees himself a pawn of politics as Government power spreads over his livelihood. The Secretary of Agriculture can manipulate price supports by deciding when to buy or not to buy. Suspension of buying before the last two national elections—soybeans, corn, and grain storage were involved—which are said to have profited speculators and cost farmers millions, were interpreted by Congressmen as a warning to the farmer that his vote also is under control.

One farmer or several hundred cannot speak for the 5,970,000. Their farm organizations can. The National Farm Bureau Federation (1,435,000 members) and the National Grange (850,000 members) are for a flexible price-support program based on supply and demand and are opposed to the Brannan plan. The Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union (450,000 members) supports the Agricultural Department program in all weather.

The farmer chafes at the shackles which price supports put on his freedom but accepts other controls as fair and necessary. Farming is big business with $105,000,000,000 invested in realty, crops, livestock, and machinery and $22,000,000,000 more in cash and banks. The Government, like private institutions, makes loans to buy farms, stock, and seeds and to improve property. It writes crop insurance and makes direct payments to farmers who follow a soil conservation program. Like any other creditor, the Department enforces approved farming methods, fertilizer, contour plowing, terracing, drainage, livestock, inoculation, insecticides, and crop rotation.

The Department conducts experimental farms, its experts roam the world collecting animals and plants, and it is the Nation's most prolific publisher.

Thus, while the Department wins good will through constructive assistance and advice, the program to regiment agriculture moves steadily forward. In hillbilly slang, the taxpayer and farmer "Ain't seen nothin' yet." Secretary Brannan now carries the torch of the former Wallace group to socialize the farmers.

His Brannan plan outlines what may lie ahead for the farmer, consumer, and taxpayer. Introduced by Senator ELMER THOMAS of Oklahoma, it sleeps in committee but is not dead. If it becomes law, government control of every farmer will be absolute—what he plants, how he farms, even how he must spend a goodly portion of his cash income. Fifteen of the bill's 86 pages enumerate penalties on farmers and more pages are bad news for dealers. If the farmer does not keep books and make reports, he can be fined $500. If he makes a false report—even veteran bookkeepers make mistakes—the fine may be $1,000 and a year in jail.

In distinction from the present price-support program, the Brannan program is called production payments or income supports. The farmer will sell a crop on a competitive market for whatever it will bring. The consumer will buy it at the same low price with additional costs for distribution and handling. The Government then gives the farmer a check for the difference between what he received and 100 percent of the parity price for the crop, not 90 percent as at present. Parity would be the average for the first 10 of the preceding 12 years.

The Secretary has not said how much this plan will cost but others estimate from $5,000,000,000 to $12,000,000,000 in added taxes. The consumer will pay his share of taxes from his portion of fictitious savings and the farmer will pay his from his fictitious profits the Government taking back its presents from both and loading the farmer with controls to keep him from producing too much.

Farmers, good businessmen, already see loopholes as in the potato program. One native son took as an illustration two farmers on opposite sides of a road who raise a few hogs for home consumption, not for market. It could apply to other supplies for farm consumption. Instead of feeding his hogs what is raised on his own farm, each farmer drives across the road and buys his forage from his neighbor at the market price. The Government pays the seller the difference between what he got and the income support price. The pig eats the feed and the farmer has it, too. That is, he has the cash equivalent.

The plan has new controls to eliminate the American kulak. Putting the big farmer out of business has vote appeal though experience in other countries proves it uneconomic. Mexico tried it. Thousands of newly established little farmers raised only enough for their families. Russia tried it and the big collective farm was the solution with government, instead of an individual, as the operator.

The Brannan plan replaces the proposed public domain seizures with cash register tests. At first, income support was to be limited to $20,000 of a farm's receipts. A farmer would trim his acres to that income. This was replaced by a "comparative unit" computation of income which also seems headed for discard. In all plans, as in present price support, the farmer is hobbled with controls that balk rational supply and demand.

The value of 10 bushels of corn is the unit in the new Brannan currency. A farmer receives income support for not more than 1,800 units. If corn is $1.35 a bushel, he would get support for 18,000 bushels, or up to $24,300. With wheat at $2, it would be 12,500 bushels, and so on for other crops and livestock but not more than $24,300 for all crops on one farm. The Secretary would designate the crops and acreage of each.

The farmer has no assurance that this will continue. When the national treasury starts scraping bottom, Congress will cut the billions for income support. The 1,800 units will shrink to a smaller number per farm. The efficient or so-called big farmer who has been producing at low cost up to the 1,800 limit is trimmed while the small farmer who never got to 1,800 units is not helped.

Secretary Brannan says his plan will provide income support for 98 percent of America's farms. The two percent out in the cold included the big farms and ranches, which each year produce many times two percent of our farm wealth.

Farm statistics, like others, can give a distorted picture. The Census Bureau rates the average yearly income of one sixth of American farms at $17,500; another sixth at $7,500; one-third at $1,600, and a final third, or 2,000,000, at less than $500. The Bureau defines three cultivated acres or a piece of land returning $250 a year as a farm. Thousands of such "farms," politically lumped to show the sad state of the farmer, are garden patches where city workers or retired plutocrats putter around for the fun of it.

Merits, methods, costs and operations of any national farm program are important, but back of all these is the drive toward state socialism where the Government will be the only farmer and the farmer of today a mere worker in his former fields. The farmer already has marched a goodly distance down the regimented road which leads to complete socialization of agriculture. It is not too late to halt and decide whether he or the Government is to boss his own acres.

Rules put on the farmer

Basic controls which the farmer must accept to obtain price support under the law of Representative CLIFFORD R. HOPE, of Kansas, and Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN, of Vermont, as amended by the act of Senator CLINTON P. ANDERSON, of New Mexico:

1. Marketing quotas: Specifying the quantity each grower may sell. In 1950, these were in effect only on tobacco, peanuts, and upland cotton. A farmer who sells more than his quota is fined under a complicated schedule of percentage deductions from receipts, differing for each commodity. The Secretary can proclaim a quota for any commodity but it does not become effective until approved by two-thirds of the voters at a referendum in the producing area.

2. Acreage allotments: Limiting the area a farmer may plant, as when the Secretary fears a crop will exceed domestic and export demands plus 15 to 30 percent storage allowance. Allotments are on all storage crops and the Secretary has proclaimed them and marketing practices on many others. The usual penalty for excess planting is forfeiture of 50 percent of the support price. A pin hooker (tobacco argot for bootlegger) who has not paid the penalty is liable to $1,000 fine or 1 year in jail. Excess acreage for one crop may not deprive a farmer of support for other crops. If the owner of several farms exceeds his allotment for tobacco or potatoes on one, he forfeits support for that crop on all farms. If he violates it on wheat or other basic crops, he does not lose support for his other farms within the total allotment.

3. Marketing agreements: The voluntary contracts between one farmer or a group and the Secretary for specified areas and commodities. They are exempt from the antitrust laws.

4. Marketing orders: A rigid form of agreement where the Secretary enforces an order which fixes prices, quality, quantity, and where the commodity may be sold. Milk orders are in effect in some 35 city areas and others apply to certain fruits, nuts, soybeans, hops, and honey. The Secretary can start civil action against a violator for either an injunction or civil damages or criminal action for a $50 to $500 fine for each day's violation.

Shall Our Goverment Be Destroyed by the Courts?—The Judith Coplon Case

OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if I can regain my equilibrium after listening to the gentleman from New York, Mr. CELLER, protest against anybody stirring while, as he says we are "plunging over Niagara" under Mr. Acheson, if I can regain my equilibrium, sufficiently, I should like to call attention to one of the most disturbing decisions of which I have ever read.

Thomas Jefferson said that if this Government were ever destroyed, it would be destroyed by the courts. I wonder if we aren't approaching that catastrophe.

A circuit court of appeals in New York on yesterday reversed the case of Judith Coplon, not on the ground that she was not guilty of treason, but because she was not arrested under a warrant.

If George Washington had caught Benedict Arnold at West Point, as he came very near doing, and Arnold could have got before this court, it would probably have turned Benedict loose on the ground that he was not arrested under a warrant.

Judith Coplon was convicted of treason, stealing and selling Government secrets to a country that she knew was an enemy of this country, yet this court, while admitting her guilt, reversed the case on the ground that she was not arrested under a warrant.

I can almost hear Joe Stalin laughing over that decision.

We may have to invoke the power of impeachment in order to stop certain courts from attempting to wreck our Government by such decisions.

If some of our courts continue to disregard the Constitution and to change our form of government and our American way of life by judicial fiat, and Congress sits quietly by and lets them get away with it then—

God save the country!

The Internal Security Act—9

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to present the ninth of a series of editorials from the Milwaukee Journal on the Internal Security Act. The following editorial appeared on November 3:

THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT—9

(This is the ninth of a series of editorials discussing the Internal Security Act of 1950, the so-called McCarran anti-Communist bill.)

America has profited greatly from men and women who slipped out of Communist controlled and other totalitarian governments and sought refuge in this country.

We have received from them invaluable information, scientific data, all of the things for which spies risk their necks.

Under the Internal Security Act of 1950 these men and women are branded as dangerous to our security. They cannot come here, or stay here, without special and temporary dispensation of the Attorney General.

What does this mean, for example, to one of the Poles who quit this Communist nation's United Nations delegation and asked refuge here? Does it mean deportation to Poland, where death or worse awaits him? Are we going to break the traditional promise of political haven for men who have fled totalitarian governments? Are we going to say to these refugees who want our help, "Go on home and get shot?"

Under the new law, that's exactly what we say. We make no provision for people who can help us if we help them. We make no provision for the age-old American right of a man to change his mind. Our law says now "once a Communist (or any other totalitarian 'ist'), always a Communist." We make no provision for a youth to get a break if he has ever, no matter how young, been affiliated with a totalitarian regime.

We are, in effect, alienating the very men and women of other nations who might prove to be our most valuable friends. This is absurd, it's against American tradition, it's against common sense. It should be remedied as soon as Congress meets.

The McCarran law, in addition to working hardship on people and breaking our traditions, creates great difficulties in our relationships with foreign governments. Spain and Argentina, for instance, are certainly totalitarian governments. Under the law, their nationals cannot visit us on business, pleasure or anything else.

Many nations send experts with their diplomatic missions or conference missions who do not have diplomatic status and serve only as civilian advisers. Under the McCarran law the attorney general has to bar them, or submit them to the embarrassment and delay of special action in order to grant them temporary visiting permits if they come from nations that are or were totalitarian.

Here is a law that was passed without thought, because of a commendable desire to do something to cope with the insidious Communists. Here is a law that not only destroys American tradition but makes it hard for us to pose as the world's friend. Here is a law that needs rewriting as soon as Congress can get the job done.

Gorgeous Telecolor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. HOWELL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I want to call the attention of the House to the following editorial printed in yesterday's Washington News. This editorial presents quite clearly the current situation prevailing in the color television field, resulting from what I consider to be precipitate action by the Federal Communications Commission. I hope the FCC will reconsider its recent action and allow additional time for development in this field, especially in view of the almost certain curtailment of production in the TV industry due to our war and defense needs.

GORGEOUS TELECOLOR

We went down to the National Broadcasting Co.'s studies at Fourteenth and New York Avenue yesterday with Fred Othman to watch RCA's color television. His story about it is on the page opposite.

No doubt you've been reading about the row over color television. Particularly if you're a television owner, or if you're selling television sets, because the kind of color broadcasting which is permitted by the Federal Communications Commission definitely hits you right in the pants pocket.

FCC, led by Wayne Coy, decided to O. K. Columbia Broadcasting System's color technique. This calls for that motor-driven pinwheel arrangement you've heard about.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

It also would "degrade," as the trade calls it, the black and white you receive on your current set. Also, you'd have to spend more money on your present set in order to get even the inferior black and white broadcast. And still a lot more money for another color set or converter, if you wanted color.

Comes now the RCA with a demonstration which makes the FCC position either dishonest or silly.

There is no third choice of adjectives.

RCA has been trying to tell FCC about its progress in making a set in which the tube would do all the work, without a mechanical pinwheel, and which would not hurt black and white broadcasting.

RCA didn't invite FCC to its demonstration yesterday. Checking on that, we discovered FCC had been invited several months ago to come and take a look at it, and had refused. Said the matter was closed. How do you like that?

Anyway, take our word for it, the RCA color broadcast was swell. It didn't interfere with black and white, which was shown on a screen right beside the color set. That is to say, in video language, the color broadcast was "compatible" with the 10,000,000 sets now in existence. So your present set, under the RCA color broadcast system, would still be good and useful.

If FCC will change its position to conform with realities, your black and white set will receive broadcasts undiminished in clarity. Sets presently on store shelves will not be suddenly obsolete. You'll buy color if, as and when it is available, and you want it.

This will be some time in the future, because of the war situation. The FCC refused to withhold its recent decision, even though military considerations might delay production of color video. It said the public needed color television (the pinwheel kind) right away. It's haste, to some folks, was unseemly.

At any rate, relay is now a fact; just as real as RCA's new color tube. And the military crisis, which will dip heavily into electronics production capacity gives the FCC an out. That is, if the FCC has enough sense or intellectual integrity to take it.

Since defense needs are going to delay all color television in any case, the FCC should use this time to restudy and rectify its present questionable position.

The Internal Security Act—10

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to present the tenth and final editorial of a series from the Milwaukee Journal on the Internal Security Act. The following editorial appeared on November 4:

THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT—10

(This is the last of a series of 10 editorials discussing the Internal Security Act of 1950, the so-called McCarran anti-Communist bill.)

For all of its many dangerous and contradictory provisions, the Internal Security Act of 1950 is not all bad. There are in it several provisions that need to be on our law books, either in their present or in modified form.

At least four sections of the bill, which makes improvements to our internal security laws, encompass suggestions made by the president as the result of experience of the FBI and other security agencies which disclosed deficiencies in present laws.

In general these provisions tighten the controls and penalties for transmission of defense and other vital information to foreign powers or to anyone who might use them against the interests of the Nation.

Five sections of the law make minor changes in the naturalization laws that have no particular significance. They do not, however, add appreciably to the Nation's security but neither do they make any changes worth arguing about.

One section of the law makes it a crime to try to influence a court or jury by picketing or other public demonstrations. As the President pointed out, "the courts already have considerable power to punish such actions" but the new law does add another weapon to fight such actions.

The entire second section of the new law, which grants the Government the right to seize and detain persons who might commit sabotage or espionage in time of invasion, war or insurrection, is a power the Government should have. This section, however, should be made stronger. In its present form it does not suspend habeas corpus, and so would enable persons seized to gain freedom through the courts. To be effective in time of real danger habeas corpus would have to be suspended.

These sections listed above have a place in our security laws. They deserve to be retained in more or less their present form. If Congress rescinds the internal security act of 1950, or removes its "silly" provisions, it should re-enact or retain these beneficial provisions.

As for the rest of the law, it is a dangerous hodgepodge that ought to be blotted from the law books. Many experts believe that the courts will do just that. Congress, however, should not wait for the courts. We have, in this country, legal provisions for our security that require only a little tightening up here and there to give us every protection we need. These laws that existed before the new act give us security while retaining our liberty and our traditions of freedom.

We should not allow ourselves to be stampeded into so much "security" that we destroy the liberty we want to secure. The internal security act of 1950 resulted from a stampeding Congress. The Congress should waste no time in calming down after the elections and repairing the damage it has done.

Financial Aid to Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY F. TAURIELLO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. TAURIELLO. Mr. Speaker, the struggle for the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine and the successful culmination of that struggle which resulted in the creation of the State of Israel, has always been a source of deep interest to me and many millions of Americans who admired this great effort on the part of the Jewish people.

On numerous occasions, I did everything in my power to be helpful in this great cause of the revival of a people and the rebirth of a nation on its ancient soil, and I shall continue to be helpful also in the future.

In the 2½ years of its existence as an independent state, Israel has admitted over a half-million homeless and persecuted Jews from all parts of the world. Israel still continues to receive and absorb this unprecedented flow of immigrants and is doing its utmost, in the face of economic strain and financial difficulties, to give these people food and shelter and to guide them into productive channels.

Despite the fact that Israel is in a state of great economic stress as a result of this huge immigration, many immigrants are coming from countries which have imposed a limited time period for emigration, so that if they do not leave now they may never have the opportunity to join their kinfolk in Israel—nevertheless the country continues to grow and develop in a truly democratic spirit. American democracy and the American way of life are well understood and admired there. The United States has gained a true and genuine friend in the people of Israel. It is hoped that in the not too distant future, when final peace will have been established between Israel and its Arab neighbors, the experiences of democratic Israel will influence and inspire its neighbors in the direction of freedom and democracy, as we understand them in this country.

In the meantime, however, we must help solidify Israel as a democratic state, stabilize its economy and set it on the road of economic independence and self-sufficiency. This can be accomplished through American economic and financial aid to which Israel is entitled as a democratic state. By its record of accomplishment and its conduct in supporting our aims in the United Nations, Israel deserves to receive such aid from the funds established by the United States in support of democratic nations throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, it is my view that our Government extend to Israel special consideration and immediate financial help to aid our ally in the Near East. The people of Israel constitute an enterprising and industrious population, undaunted by economic difficulties. They do not want a hand-out, they desire help in the form of a substantial grant-in-aid from this country which will enable them to purchase the necessary machinery and other means of production to help them attain economic stability.

The United States has assumed a great responsibility in the last few years—the preservation of democracy in the world. In order to achieve this task, we undertook a program of financial assistance to those countries which made a serious effort to maintain democracy and the democratic way of life. Certainly, during its brief period of existence as an independent state, Israel has shown that it is deserving of such assistance.

I firmly believe that in order to buttress and bolster the cause of democracy in the Near East, and in the world as a whole, Israel should receive financial support from the resources at the disposal of our Government for such purposes. In so doing, we shall be complying with the wishes of the American people. I call upon my colleagues in Congress to urge and support the effort to grant immediate aid to Israel, so that it may cope with its present economic burdens and have the opportunity to build a sound economy on a democratic basis.

There's Nothing Wrong With the Air Force Except There's Not Enough of It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD A. PATTEN
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. PATTEN. Mr. Speaker, the news that is coming in today from Korea is very serious indeed. In the face of it, we must end our disagreements, quit our bickerings, and stop our sniping at domestic adversaries. The need of the day is unity—on the national level.

A month ago, when things were going better for us in Korea, and there was talk of an early end of the war, a number of people took advantage of the improving situation in Korea to do considerable sniping at home. The special target of some effective sniping was the United States Air Force.

I say effective, because as a result of the sniping there is an approaching congressional investigation of tactical air power, and many people have been given the impression that the United States Air Force failed to do its job in Korea. While the battle is still going on, "lessons" are being drawn from the operation. In short, a distorted picture is being given the American people of air action in Korea, and to that extent the people are being misled.

Mr. Speaker, the truth about our Air Force in Korea is that it has done a magnificent job, a job that has won the highest praise from Army and Army privates. The only thing wrong about our Air Force in Korea is that there hasn't been enough of it—and not enough Army, Navy, or Marine Corps either. Congress never made the appropriations to buy enough defense, and enough military power for offense too. But that brings up questions I do not want to discuss today.

Today I want to call the attention of this House to two articles which have appeared in the past few weeks, both by reputable commentators, that throw some light on the sources of the criticism that has been directed against the Air Force, and reveal the unjustness of it. It will be to our advantage to read these articles carefully, and to remember the essential facts that both point out.

Korea is not a full-scale war—at least not yet—and we should not draw wrong conclusions from it. But as the threat of action directed against the United States itself grows greater we should be very thankful that we have an Air Force prepared to make a retaliatory attack on the source from which aggression against us would come.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion it is the duty of this Congress to examine all possible explanations of why the Air Force is being criticized before we start accepting the criticism simply because it is being repeated so often in certain circles, by certain people. We not only owe it to the Air Force and to the men who are doing the fighting. We owe it to ourselves, and to the general cause of unification which must be served, if we are to survive this period of crisis.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article by Bob Considine that appeared in the Philadelphia (Pa.) Inquirer of October 27, 1950, and an article by Bob Sibley that appeared in the Boston Herald of November 12, 1950.

These articles are as follows:

[From the Philadelphia, (Pa.) Inquirer of October 27, 1950]

AIR FORCE FACES FIGHT IN CONGRESS

(By Bob Considine)

WASHINGTON, October 26.—When Congress returns to Washington this winter the Air Force will be called upon to defend a dramatic arm of its service which should need no defense—the ability of its men and machines to support ground forces.

All through the Korean War there has been an undercurrent of semimalicious needling of the Air Force's job of fending for the Korean troops when the odds were heavily against them, and clearing a path for them when they were able finally to advance.

It will be charged by carefully briefed or ruggedly ignorant members of the committee concerned that the Air Force failed dismally, as compared to the Marine air arm's tactical support of its leathernecks. Inferentially, or openly, it will be said that the Air Force must revise its training and perhaps its jet-purchasing program, or yield some of its hard-won sovereignty as a service.

If the customary defense tactics prevail, a handful of the highest-ranking Air Force generals—good men all—will be brought to the congressional hot seat and questioned sharply. The inevitable and tragic occasional mistakes made by our airmen, which cost a few lives, will be reviewed tartly—and for a damaging day or two the casual newspaper reader and radio listener will gain the impression that the Air Force killed more of our GI's than it saved.

Then, in all probability, the thing will blow over. But the scars will remain and the general cause of unification will not have been served.

It would not be wise nor even possible to deprive Congress of its ancient right to heckle the military, and serve as watchdog over military appropriations. For this country's basic tradition remains civilian rather than militaristic. But it doesn't necessarily follow that all members of all congressional committees are automatically expert in the military fields they probe. Some have been sold a bill of goods by other interests, some are just dopes.

What amounted to a secret smear campaign against the Air Force jets will be reaired at the congressional hearing. It will be said that this type of machine, without which we would lose a modern air war, was preposterously unsuited for tactical support. It was too fast.

The inference here would seem to be that we go back to obsolescent propeller-driven types of craft. Some Air Force officers fear that in the confusion it will be forgotten that if Russia had sent in its jets in support of the North Korean cause, no American propeller-driven plane could have operated in Korea and if we had no jets of our own the land forces then most certainly would have been pushed into the sea. And with not only a shocking loss of life, but an all but irreparable loss of face.

Trouble with congressional needling of all services is that the committees usually call only the generals and admirals. Most of these witnesses were not near the front and must substitute tedious facts and figures for graphic testimony.

In the case of the impending blast against the Air Force's grossly libeled ability to attune its gait to that of the inching progress of the gallant infantry, the Congress should hear from officers and men who fought in Korea and are alive today only because outside Taegu when a grimy marine and Army air arms turned in a superb job—one that gave beleaguered men on the ground below their only excuse to cheer.

The touching gratitude of ground troops for the work of the airmen was to be seen on all sides in Korea. Maybe it was best summed up one day at a First Cavalry regimental command post outside of Taegu when a grimy major touched the sleeve of Gen. George Stratemyer as he walked by and said, with emotion, "Sir, I don't know where the hell we'd be today if it wasn't for you guys."

Congress should hear from a few fellows like that, rather than from Air Force generals who, placed on the defensive, will be forced to give a negative form of defense.

Whether the impending probe was inspired by military elements still disgruntled by the form which unification took remains to be seen. We trust not. But there was and is glory enough for all arms serving in Korea. To create a bickering aftermath of such glory is to profane the memory of men who made unification work in the hardest way of all—by giving their lives.

NEW SNIPING DRIVE AIMED AT AIR FORCE—WILL STRESS DEFICIENCIES IN KOREA—REAL BLAME RESTS ON WHITE HOUSE

(By Bob Sibley)

A new campaign of sniping at the Air Force is just about ready to get under way. In fact, some portions of it have started already.

One of the chief themes will go something like this: That the Air Force neglected tactical, or ground support, aviation because it was so busy building up strategic air power—long-range bombing planes built around the B–36 Consolidated bomber.

This new sniping drive may become as bitter, if not more so, than the recent whoop and holler concerning the B–36, which critics scorned, and the canceled 65,000-ton flush-deck supercarrier which the Navy and friends of the Navy said was badly needed.

GRAIN OF TRUTH

In this sniping program, which will seek to blame the Air Force for the pushing around the Army got in the first stages of the Korean War, there will be just enough element of truth to make the criticism sound plausible as lessons of Korea are cited.

The truth is that there wasn't enough United States tactical aviation—in the right place or anywhere. But there wasn't enough of anything. There wasn't enough ground support aviation because the appropriations never came through to buy it, and the White House, not the Air Force, can take the bulk of that responsibility.

Who said 48 air groups were enough, at a time when more qualified authorities were saying 70 groups would be the bare minimum necessary for self-preservation in these times; and that even 70 would not be enough to win a war? President Truman said that.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Well, the lack of appropriations sufficient to create an adequate air force posed a terrible decision for air commanders. The decision was this: That since we couldn't have everything, we'd have to make sure our long-range, Sunday punch was the best ever. And that punch was and is strategic air power which can reach deep into distant continents. For big-type trouble, if it comes.

WORDS OF FINLETTER

Weeks after the Korea action started, with all its setbacks, the Air Force still contended:

"This strategic Air Force must be unmistakably good. No effort must be spared to see to it that this strategic Air Force constitutes a defensive countermeasure of such violence that it will make clear to anyone who thinks of attacking us or the society of which we are a part that it will be a most mistaken thing to do. * * *

"It is a curious thing this preparation is in the interests of peace, but that is the way it is. The more violent the potentiality of our air arm, the greater is the hope that it will never be used."

The words are those of Thomas K. Finletter, Secretary of the Air Force.

Well qualified testimony on why air power got a slow start in Korea comes from an aviation writer on the scene who says:

"There is not the slightest reason to apologize for the air show in Korea. On the contrary, our air units have done a magnificent job with what they had."

HOPELESS EFFORT

"Memories can play tricks, and while we remember the power of this once great force, we are all too likely to forget what has happened in the past 5 years while a handful of crusaders have hammered away at Congress, at the administration, and at the public, in a hopeless effort to prevent our Air Force from being rendered impotent.

"We forget the sudden demobilization, the great rush to get the boys home, the deactivation of so many groups that we were left without even a token defensive force.

"We forget planes we deliberately junked, hundreds we pickled, thousands of tons of radio, radar, and construction equipment we bulldozed into the sea on Guam and Okinawa, because we didn't have the men around to look after it.

"We forget the warnings of Finletter and Symington and a few others who kept telling the Nation we were going to find ourselves caught short.

Well, it happened in Korea, and a little sooner than we thought. We didn't win a 3-day battle there because we simply didn't have the planes and equipment necessary to win a war. They weren't in Korea. They weren't in Japan.

PHONY CONCLUSIONS

So now come the snipers seeking to find fault with the Air Force for not having used men and equipment the Air Force didn't have, and citing to a considerable extent some phony conclusions from lessons learned in Korea.

We'll have to watch out for those lesson conclusions. Some of them seem to argue that we shouldn't go forward, shouldn't make progress, and shouldn't learn anything new.

Take, for instance, the usually astute Hanson W. Baldwin of the New York Times, already deep in the Korea lessons business. He recently remarked that at Inchon and off the mud flats and rock-bound coast of Korea the test of battle has supported the Navy's concepts of war.

Baldwin, who just happens to be an Annapolis graduate, also said sea power made victory possible and proved to be the key to success.

This is like saying the ignition system is the key to a successful automobile ride and failing to mention the gasoline, oil, and four wheels. How about the Army, Air Force, and Marine Corps.

The case was framed a good deal better by the Herald Tribune's Gill Robb Wilson, who warned, with deep sincerity:

"Don't learn fallacious lessons from this highly unusual operation (Korea) that would be applied erroneously and disastrously in any planning for a major conflict. * * *

"All of these so-called lessons, if applied to the military's planning for an all-out war, could well bring on disaster rather than success. * * *

"Our principal lesson is not to draw wrong conclusions from the Korean War because of the absence of aggressive hostile air."

Helping Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN R. WALSH
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention that a movement has been launched to assist the work of Congress through an educational program for American citizens, sponsored by the Committee for Congress using Your Congress magazine to introduce a course of study on the specific functions, duties, and responsibilities of Congress and its Members into schools, colleges, and various adult groups. In my opinion, there is vital need of just such a program. It is to be hoped that the newsmen back of this project are given all possible assistance and cooperation. I am pleased to comply with the request to insert in the RECORD the following letter from a resident of the National Capital area pointing out the need of action to strengthen Congress and improve its influence and effectiveness:

NOVEMBER 28, 1950.

Mr. HAL J. MILLER,
Executive Director,
Committee for Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MILLER: I can think of no project that is more practical in these perilous days, than your committee's proposal to try to awaken, through educational processes, a better appreciation and understanding of our Congress and the work of its Members. The Congress is the keystone of our republican form of government. On it, our representative democratic system will stand or fall. We must let every American know that he is a part of, and has a personal stake in, the work of our Congress.

There is great need for understanding Congress as more and more of the prerogatives of Congress are being handed over to the United Nations. And, of course, we must always have a strong Congress, to prevent inroads on its responsibilities and rights by the Executive. Whether we have a strong or weak President we must always have a strong Congress. It is to be hoped that the program of the Committee for Congress is such as to help strengthen and support our congressional system.

The committee can do real work of the individual Members of the House and Senate. Congressmen are often criticized, unjustifiably and unmercifully, and that is bound to leave its imprint on the public mind. This has tended to create an entirely incorrect view of the men and women who are honored with election to the House of Representatives or the Senate. I doubt if you would find a more able and more honorable assemblage of Americans.

Far too seldom are Congressmen given credit for the good work that they do. There is a tendency to stress so-called shortcomings. And all too often, when a Congressman has risked his own political future for a cause that is not popular in some quarters, he is not given so much as a thank you by the people he assisted.

I am pleased to see the formation of the Committee for Congress, and to note that the people behind it are all practical students and observers of the Washington scene. Now it is up to our national leaders to throw their interests and support and influence and means back of the program.

I hope that your Congress study materials introduced in the study courses are a means of offsetting some of the definitely socialistic and almost communistic trend of material reported to be in some of the textbooks in use.

With good wishes,

EDWARD T. MCGRATH.

The Dying Eagle Turned His Head and Saw That the Arrow Piercing His Heart Was Feathered From His Own Wing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the editorial which appeared in the Olean (N. Y.) Times-Herald under date of December 5, 1950, raises a very pertinent point for serious consideration; that is, Has not the time come to look after the people of the United States of America?

There is a point, however, which I wish to stress at this time, and that is that vast quantities of war goods under the Marshall plan have been moving steadily behind the iron curtain to Red China. Moreover, some of the industries which we have rehabilitated, even to the erection of new buildings, are producing essential war materials for the benefit of Russia and Red China.

It has now been brought to light that we are furnishing direct from the United States the instruments of death to Russia and Red China with which to murder our boys. It is disclosed also that the United States Department of Commerce has been remiss in its duty in not stopping these shipments to our enemies, which is simply a repetition of what the administration did when it armed Japan, and let her kill thousands of our boys with instruments of war which were furnished to her as a result of the inept leadership of the Democratic administration.

Under leave to extend heretofore granted, I am inserting the above-mentioned editorial in today's RECORD:

ANY MORE NEEDED?

Did you notice that story in this newspaper the other day relative to the improvement that has taken place in the countries of Western Europe, as a result of the operation of the Marshall plan?

If you didn't, here are a few of its high lights:

Europe's factories now are producing more of nearly everything than ever before in history.

The official report of the European recovery program organization states that industrial production in those countries benefiting from the Marshall plan aid during the second quarter of the present year—apparently the last quarter for which statistics have been tabulated—was at a postwar peak, averaging 24 percent higher than in 1938.

And 1938, remember, was not a postwar year at all, but a prewar year. That's a trickly little sentence that might mislead many people.

"Moreover," says this official report, "output in June, which was 127 percent greater than before-the-war output, was the highest for any month on record."

"New postwar highs," the report continues, "were achieved by Austria, Germany, Greece, Italy, and Sweden."

The article stated that European nations planned to increase steel production under the Marshall plan to a level 29 percent, higher than before World War II; but that actual steel output has topped that level in recent months in key nations.

For instance, Britain's steel factories are producing almost 30 percent more steel than before the war, while the annual production in Sweden has jumped from 276,000 tons on the eve of World War II to 344,000 tons at present.

As to general industrial production, the output of the combined industries in Marshall plan countries on an annual basis is 27 percent higher than in 1938.

But that was the average.

West Germany showed a spectacular jump of 90 percent, despite all her war damage, while Greece had an increase of 100 percent, and Austria 200 percent.

In other words, most of these countries seem to be doing not only an excellent business, but a far greater one than they enjoyed in the years before World War II.

The American people will be highly gratified to realize that their sacrifices—for they have been sacrifices—have done so much to pull the countries of Western Europe out of their economic stagnation following the termination of the war.

But they can be forgiven for wondering whether the time has not arrived when most of these countries are perfectly able to operate under their own power.

The administration in Washington apparently is mapping out a program to continue economic aid to Europe for at least another 5 years.

Whether the President and his associates could secure enactment of the necessary legislation to provide for such continued aid, as a result of the new complexion of the Congress consequent upon the November elections, is problematical.

For matters are not going any too well with us. We, in case it may have been forgotten, badily need aid in Korea. We may need aid in several other directions before we emerge successfully from the situation in which we now find ourselves embroiled.

The expenditures that we will be compelled to make for defense purposes during the next few years will be tremendous; and as our leaders in Washington have emphasized in recent days, the course of international events cannot be divined.

The time would seem to have arrived when not only nonessential expenditures in our own country should be eliminated, but financial commitments for the aid of other nations, other than for defense purposes, should be reduced to a minimum if not cut out altogether.

Christian Patriotism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, on Sunday, November 12, I had the privilege of hearing a sermon at the Bethlehem chapel of the Episcopal Cathedral here in Washington which impressed me greatly. The preacher was one of the canons of the cathedral, Luther D. Miller, chaplain, major general, United States Army, retired. I ask unanimous consent to have the patriotic words of Chaplain Miller printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the sermon was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

Yesterday we celebrated Armistice Day. On such national occasions we display the flag of our country, hold devout communion with our departed comrades, and brag a bit over the fact that we are Americans.

And we should be proud of our country, but we should never forget that back of it are the blood and the life of many patriots. The sacrifice that produced American freedom was sown on blood-stained battlefields from Lexington to Appomattox, to Flanders, to north Africa, Italy, Germany, and the islands of the Pacific. We should see the struggles and the triumphs and realize that every foot of the way has been bought by toil and suffering and sacrifice.

To be devoted to the best spiritual traditions of one's own land, to be glad about them, to be proud of them, to rejoice in them, to want to live up to them, to want to fight and defend them, that is not militarism—that is Christian patriotism. A great dream was born in America and Lincoln's government of the people, by the people, and for the people not only shall not perish from the earth but, continuing, shall in nobler fashion than ever in the past, hold the torch for all the world.

Democracy has come to be what it is because our citizens refused to let her down. Too many tears and too much suffering have gone into the making of our democracy to walk out on it. Whether our system of government and the American way of life will rise or fall, whether it will continue or be crushed will entirely depend upon the number of people who are willing to defend, willing to protect, and willing to sacrifice for it.

In this world anything which deserves to be called progress appears to be impossible except by way of sacrifice and by the way of the cross. The cross does something to the human heart which nothing else appears to do; it rebukes its selfishness; it shames its cowardice and it appeals successfully to its latent capacity for goodness. It is when men strive in sweat and blood and tears for the realization of a true ideal that they develop their deepest insights into the meaning of life and their mightiest faith in the existence of God.

To some, war may be the worst of evils, but to the Christian there is one thing worse—the failure to resist evil, the compromise with unrighteousness, and the unwillingness to die that justice and liberty may live.

Democracy is being challenged again in the world today. We must be prepared to defend this heritage, this trust that our forefathers and our comrades gave their last full measure of devotion. We must defend those beautiful things which few nations of the world can boast of having: The Constitution, religious freedom, free speech, public schools, and an equal opportunity for all. We must establish the necessary barriers behind which free men and women can live.

In one of the great battles of long ago a color sergeant rushed way ahead of the regiment into a most dangerous and advanced position and planted the colors. The commanding officer shouted: "Bring back the colors," but the old sergeant made history when he shouted: "Bring up the army." That is the spirit that is needed today. Oh, for men of that stamp to climb high up on the mountainside of human progress and cry to those below: "Bring up the army of American citizenship, bring up the purity of America's institutions, bring up the standard of manhood and womanhood, bring up everything and everybody that stands for God and home and native land.

The world needs as never before men and women who will render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's. The world needs as never before men and women whose hearts are aflame with the Holy Spirit that stirs and moves them with a sacrificial love to give to our Nation an undivided allegiance. Only such patriotism, exemplified in the lives of every individual citizen of this country can make America a great Nation whose past glories shall be surpassed only by the grandeur of its future.

In these trying, anxious days may every American lift this prayer:

God bless our native land,
Firm may she ever stand
Thru storm and night.
When the wild tempests rave,
Ruler of wind and wave,
Do thou our country save
By thy great might.

For her our prayers shall rise
To God above the skies,
On him we wait;
Thou who art ever nigh,
Guarding with watchful eye,
To thee aloud we cry,
God save the state.

The Men the Reds Hate Most

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURR P. HARRISON
OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the Men the Reds Hate Most, a condensation by the Reader's Digest of an article which appeared in the October issue of the American Legion Magazine:

THE MEN THE REDS HATE MOST

(Condensed from the American Legion Magazine)

(By Eugene Lyons)

(Badgered by public criticism and abuse, the Committee on Un-American Activities remains the one effective enterprise in exposing the Kremlin's agents, spies, and stooges in our midst)

Ever since its launching in 1938, the House Committee on Un-American Activities has been the object of systematic, reckless, ferocious attack by Communists and self-styled

"liberals." A Congressman who accepts a place on the committee knows that he is staking his name and peace of mind. "It is the penalty of service on the committee to be reviled and blasphemed by persons and groups sympathetic to the aims of the Soviet Union." Representative Richard B. Vail told the House on April 1, 1948. He spoke from ample personal experience.

Plenty of Americans with no special love for the Kremlin have helped along in the organized assault. In January 1949, for instance, 313 "educators, writers, scientists, artists, and clergymen"—to quote the Daily Worker's proud inventory —signed a demand that the committee be abolished. Most of them were blithely unaware that they were stooging for Communists and fellow-travelers with a vested interest in frustrating any investigation of subversion and espionage. They objected to the committee's methods; those who rounded up the signatures were scared of the committee's objectives.

Unhappily, Communist smears have an immense resonance. Ordinary folk fear to speak out for the committee, knowing that epithets like "reactionary" and "Fascist" will be their reward for candor. For a professing liberal, even of the anti-Communist brand, the acme of moral heroism is to admit publicly that he approves the committee's work.

Yet there is no charge leveled at the Un-American Activities Committee that cannot be directed with equal justice against most other legislative probes. The Walsh Committee, when it exposed the Teapot Dome scandal, was accused of headline-hunting and unfair tactics. So were the La Follette Committee, of which the pro-Communist John Abt was counsel; the Nye Committee, of which Alger Hiss was counsel; the Truman Committee when it looked into war-industry frauds; the recent committee digging into the 5 percenters' racket.

The list could be extended for pages. In every case innocent suspects were hauled into the limelight, as is inevitable in any genuine investigation. The function of a legislative committee, however, is not judicial but fact-finding; it can neither convict nor punish anyone. Its exemption from the rules of court procedure has been established practice from the beginning. An article by Felix Frankfurter, published in 1924 in the New Republic and entitled "Hands Off the Investigations," declared: "The power of investigation should be left untrammeled, and the methods and forms of each investigation should be left for the determination of Congress and its committees, as each situation arises."

The right of Congress to investigate any area of the Nation's life is of the essence of democratic government. The committee's bitterest critics concede that. Why, then, has the Un-American Activities Committee been singled out for unlimited excoriation and defiance? There are many answers:

1. This committee has dared intrude on the cozy secrecies and anonymities of a powerful element in American society: the Communists and their conscious or deluded allies—a group that has disciplined spokesmen and confused sympathizers deployed throughout the American press, radio, schools, and pulpits.

2. The committee has been obliged to educate public opinion as it went along. Americans understand familiar corruptions and cheer those who expose them. They are just learning to comprehend the far more serious subversive corruptions of this totalitarian era. They can grasp the implications of a Costello or an Erickson in the witness chair but are baffled when the accused is a high public official, a movie writer, or a college professor.

3. The committee has labored under the serious disadvantages of the unbridled hostility of the Administration. Repeatedly its inquiries were discounted in advance by two Presidents as "red herrings." The kind of help normally available to legislative groups from the executive branch, and especially the Department of Justice, has often been barred to this committee. Consequently it has had to operate—always on a modest budget—with its own limited research, investigating and legal staffs.

4. Because it has been wrestling with a vast and many-sided conspiracy, the committee has contended with fanatics and with expert liars. Its witnesses have often been hostile and unscrupulous, trained in prevarication and double talk, coached by able but disloyal lawyers, backed by the resources of a well-heeled movement here and a great power abroad.

Considering these piled-up handicaps, the committee has done a remarkably effective job. While its career has naturally been marked by errors, false starts and indiscretions, it will stand comparison with any congressional undertaking of that scope.

The most vital contribution of the committee has been in terms of public education. The very concepts of a false-front organization, a transmission belt, an innocents' club, a fellow-traveler, were unkown to the average American when the committee started its work 12 years ago. Today they are part of the mental equipment of the American people. As a result, we are better prepared to identify and combat those disruptive forces which have robbed one nation after another of freedom and independence.

The array of recent convictions—the 11 Communist Party chiefs, Alger Hiss, Harry Bridges, Gerhart Eisler, Leon Josephson, the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee—would have been impossible without the amassment of vital data by this committee.

Whatever the Supreme Court may decide on the constitutionality of the Smith Act under which they were prosecuted, it will not change the findings of fact in the case of the 11 top Communists. Their so-called party has finally been identified as a branch office of a world-wide plot to overthrow democratic governments, our own included, by force and violence. The months-long trial translated into evidence—under the rigid safeguards of judicial process—testimony painstakingly accumulated by the committee.

A San Francisco jury's verdict that Harry Bridges perjured himself in stating that he had never been a Communist simply confirmed what had been spread on the committee record for years. The indictment of William Remington of the Commerce Department for perjury in denying Communist affiliation is the direct outgrowth of testimoney given to the committee by Elizabeth Bentley. At the time this was written his trial had not been held. The proceedings which rid our country of the Eisler brothers, Gerhart and Hanns, of J. Peters and other foreign agents, had their genesis in committee hearings of Louis Budenz, former editor of the Daily Worker. Miss Bentley and Whittaker Chambers, alike, had made desperate efforts to interest other Government agencies in their fearful secrets before the Un-American Activities Committee took them in hand.

As a result of the committee's activities, the very executive officials who cried "red herring" have been constrained to act. The Federal loyalty program, which admittedly has swept hundreds of subversives out of the Government was forced upon the executive branch by public opinion reacting to the disclosures of the Un-American Activities Committee. The Department of Justice, whose officials often sought to disparage the committee's work, has used its findings as the basis for an official listing of subversive organizations. There is no branch of the Government, including all its intelligence services, which does not turn confidently to the huge committee files and cross-index for information.

The most impressive aspect of the record, when we realize that a great conspiracy is involved, is how few mistakes the committee has made in naming names and labeling organizations. The "liberal" press raged hysterically back in 1941 when Dr. J. B. Matthews, for the committee, gave the Department of Justice a list of 1,124 names of alleged pro-Communists on the Federal payroll. The rage was echoed by a large portion of the non-Communist press and radio. By now, several hundred of those named have been identified as subversive or have admitted the charge by resigning under fire.

Organized labor owes a particular debt to the committee. Memory is short. Reading today about the expulsion of Communists from certain unions, who remembers that the committee was attacked unmercifully when it first alerted us to the Red infiltration of unions? Not one of the unions or labor leaders exposed by the committee from 1938 to date has been falsely accused.

The committee began its work with an examination of Fritz Kuhn, leader of the German-American Bund; in due time this outfit and others in the brown constellation were exposed and neutralized. In the initial 10 years, incidentally, fully one-quarter of the committee's time was devoted to probes into Nazi, Fascist and racist groupings. But the people who bemoan our lost liberties when Communists are investigated apparently saw no violation of civil rights, no vile political motivation, when witnesses were asked whether they ever belonged to the bund, the klan, the silver shirts.

In its first year the committee took testimony from and about Earl Browder, William Weiner and Nicholas Dozenberg which ultimately led to their conviction for passport frauds. More important, it uncovered the methods of the passport mills. Two Fascist leaders on the west coast, after their activities were exposed, fled the country. The first of many disclosures of Communist entrenchment in the CIO were spread on the record.

In the second year the silver shirts dissolved under committee fire and the German-American Bund was forced to make public its foreign control and Nazi aims. Communist fraud in election petitions in many States was so well documented that more than 50 convictions followed.

In 1941 the committee unmasked the chief Red front of the Stalin-Hitler pact period, the American Peace Mobilization. It also showed up a long series of Communist-fomented strikes in munitions industries—in effect sabotage of the Allied war effort under Muscovite instructions.

As the committee's own education progressed and its facilities improved, dozens of leagues, congresses, and committees under liberal titles were unmasked as Communist stooge outfits. The committee smoked out Communist cells on atomic projects and spotlighted weaknesses in atomic-security machinery. It must be credited also with the only effective job yet done in tracing the espionage ramifications of the Soviet-satellite legations and the Soviet Embassy itself.

One of the main purposes of any congressional inquiry, of course, is to provide the factual basis for legislation. The recommendations for tighter laws on espionage recently made by the Department of Justice and enacted by Congress stemmed largely from the committee's work.

At every turn in this long and wearing effort the committee was vilified, smeared, mocked. The nature of the committee's work naturally has made its hearings highly newsworthy. But the very papers and radio chains which jam the committee room with reporters, microphones, and cameras assail committee members as publicity hounds.

As was to be expected, the probe of Communist infiltration of the motion-picture industry probably marked the peak of sensationalism. One critic who found the spectacle highly distasteful declaimed about "ham acting, screaming and shouting, parades of stars, chartered planes of glamor, klieg lights." He failed to note that it was the Communists who deliberately staged the spectacle, chartered the planes, organized the parades, and did the screaming.

While there are also honest, misguided critics of the committee, the rock-bottom fact is that the slanderous campaign against it is led and fed by Communists and fellow travelers. For Americans at large, reason dictates a simple three-point attitude: (1) Praise for the committee's useful achievements; (2) blame for its faults and fumbles; (3) continuing encouragement for its general aims.

The committee is far from perfect—what Government body is flawless?—but it has been for 12 years and remains today the one successful enterprise in exposing Stalin's agents, spies, and dupes in our midst.

The World's Hope and Last Chance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 7 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a thought-provoking editorial entitled "The World's Hope and Last Chance," written by Mr. E. J. Melton, editor of the Cooper County Record of Boonville, Mo., published in the Cooper County Record for November 30, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE WORLD'S HOPE AND LAST CHANCE

When our fathers were taking lands from the Indians, who retaliated with pillage, torture, and murder, there were no qualms about advantage with firearms over arrows. Had there been, we would not be here today.

Since man first lengthened his reach with a stone ax, survival has hinged on advantages. Protectors never have hesitated to use new-found power—the jawbone of an ass, gunpowder, dynamite, TNT. The notable exception was desisting from gas in World War II, since each side had tasted it, and knew the other could retaliate.

The first time powder and lead slaughtered archers there was no world condemnation of the victor, but a scramble for the bandwagon.

Asiatics today have advantage in numbers, a short supply line, and unified resentment of the West. Super weapons are our only superiority. We cannot return to complete isolation because the world has shrunk, yet it is too big for the United States to conquer with conventional weapons and token aid from other free countries.

If we are liquidated in Asia, or withdraw, or are long embroiled, Russia can march in Germany and through Western Europe. When Japan was brought suddenly to her knees with mass deaths, hundreds of thousands of lives were saved, and perhaps half of those were American. We know, too, that if Russia could match us with weapons she would have used them.

Three West German states in free elections have registered hostility to our regime. We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars trying to help a former foe. But those Germans fear fighting with us against Russia and a homeland again ravaged. They prefer to save their property and lose their liberty. We cannot change people who are not ready to change.

Most of the world is ready for nothing American beyond loans and grants. And where we fight and conquer we assume new responsibilities and expense.

This attitude of other peoples is understandable. Winston Churchill at Fulton suggested a single sovereignty for the English-speaking world, and a chill settled on the audience. We would fight from street to street and house to house an invader in war. The conquered dislike their masters, no matter how benign, and blame them for whatever evils befall.

We cannot force primitive minds to accept western ways and it is folly to hope the quivering common clay of the Orient will beat in tidal waves in vain against the finely molded vessels of American manhood, buttressed only by conventional weapons. The Korean emergency is but the first of a series of Red-inspired upheavals calculated to exhaust us militarily and economically. We need to plan far ahead. So the bomb.

Reduce it to your boy, your purse. Is not one of ours worth much more than many heathen who are unwilling to accept truth as we see it? The prayerful Puritan thought so. He used every advantage—superior weapons, know-how, better organization. And when Braddock failed to be realistic his defeat became a rout.

We need to be practical. We should recognize and publicly admit that we find much of the world unwilling to accept the American cure-all—gifts and loans coupled with more expense to us for unwanted rule—and that we propose no further imperialism, no more gifts, and that unless the enemy withdraws we will use every super-weapon wherever it is practical. Then, if the foe ignores the threat, hit him with everything we have.

In this darkening night this course seems the only gleam from the Christmas star. It might save many American lives into which parents and country have poured vast investments in loving care and education such as no other generation anywhere ever before received. The ensuing devastation and death would confound and confuse the enemy, rob him of the initiative, and be a lesson far more searing than that of gas in World War I. We are fighting an undeclared war almost alone and can't afford to waste time. Peace through fear might in time develop into peace through growing understanding.

Then the world would yield her increase, want would retreat, and man's energies could be released for exalting the race.

Failing to take this bold step, we may sacrifice the chance of peace to growing chaos. Russia and China have a mutual assistance pact. If we stop the Chinese Red with American flesh and bone instead of awesome bombs, Russia may throw in her conserved forces. And India, now walking a tight wire, may be expected to line up against our ebbing strength and growing confusion.

We have few friends. Nearly all resent our wealth, our easy life. The rich relative in brotherhood of man never gives enough—even unto bleeding his taxpayers to anemia. Our few loyal friends are feeble from war, political experiments, or internal strife. Their effectiveness would diminish with our reverses but might wax if the tide runs with us. We saw that before and after the MacArthur amphibious landings in Korea.

We are as alone as the Puritans after departure of the Mayflower. We have the know-how to produce abundantly the sinews of war but we cannot match Asia in manpower. Can we outwit her leadership? Our early settlers outwitted and outfought the wily, fanatical and more numerous Indians, and eventually brought oil riches to remnants of that vanishing race that would never have unlocked those natural resources.

Diplomacy in a democracy is molded by the articulate people themselves. At this late hour let each citizen write to Representatives in Congress, to the Commander in Chief, to the military, to United Nations officials. Put on pressure for the bomb. This is a fight for existence. Don't belittle your influence—use it. It is a magnificent bequeathal that must be exercised to be preserved.

This task is more important than today's bread; it means tomorrow's all. Ask God's help. And remember: God helps them who help themselves.

Which Will It Be, Peace or War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following excellent article from the Evening Tribune, Lawrence, Mass., Monday, December 4, 1950:

NO TIME FOR PANIC

Said General Wu, representative of the Chinese Communists, to Ambassador Warren R. Austin, "I must tell you, your threats do not frighten anyone." He wasn't entirely right, because the panic which is coursing through Great Britain and Europe as a result of the Korean crisis shows pretty definitely that General Wu was speaking only for China, and maybe Russia. No one will deny that it is perfectly allowable to be frightened in the face of what lies ahead. And you can bet there is even some slight fear back of the deadpan diplomacy which the Russians and Chinese are so adept at practicing. As far as this particular talent is concerned, the democratic world should take a leaf from their bloody book. Hysteria isn't going to help a bit.

European nations which are directly in the path of the Soviet juggernaut are understandably anxious, but this anxiety should not be allowed to deteriorate into blubbering terror. Right along, ever since the UN launched its defense of freedom in Korea, there has been evidence that some of our partners in the enterprise have felt only a mild enthusiasm for it. But they were ready to yield to American insistence that it was a crossroads issue so long as their own resources were not too extensively committed. Now that there is reason to believe that there was basis in fact for the American viewpoint, now that it is becoming increasingly clear that Korea is not a local infection but a manifestation of systemic disease, now that heroic therapy may possibly have to be resorted to, the all-out concern of Europe contrasts sharply with the token encouragement the United States got in the beginning.

Great Britain's Mr. Attlee wants the fullest prior consultation before any decision is made to use the A-bomb and has projected himself across the Atlantic to argue his case in person. This is all right, but it is somehow incompatible with the calm dignity which should possess the democratic chancelleries in times of crises. It is this negative sort of approach that Moscow and Peiping, and all aggressors, wax fat on. Vishinsky winks and nudges Malik and says: "Look at old Attlee. Losing his nerve."

And France, which has made no noticeable progress toward settlement, through negotiation or any other means, of the trouble in French Indochina, has adopted a resolution urging the United Nations to negotiate with the Chinese for a buffer zone between Korea and Manchuria.

Western Germany, which is most directly exposed to the menace of Soviet power and which is displaying marked disinterest in proposals that it be rearmed to help neutralize that menace, is praying that some miracle (other than the A-bomb, that is) will persuade the Chinese to call off their dogs.

All of us in this country most certainly hope that the wishes of Europe will be realized and that there will be no war. But all of us also know that nothing effective will be accomplished in an atmosphere of fluttering helplessness.

An Analysis of President Truman's National Health Insurance and Public Health Act—Part 4

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to present the fourth talk which I made during my last campaign and which related to the need of some overall national health insurance and public health program and also contained a rather detailed anlysis of the three comprehensive bills which are now pending in the Congress.

I delivered this talk over radio station WOW, October 13, 1950. The same was as follows:

President Truman's National Health Insurance and Public Health Act, as introduced in the Eighty-first Congress, is contained in three bills, to-wit—S. 1679, H. R. 4312, and H. R. 4313.

This legislation was introduced in both the Senate and the House of Representatives on April 25, 1949, following the President's special health message to Congress on April 22, 1949, in which he said, in part, the following: "We need more widespread use of modern methods of paying for medical care through prepaid insurance. * * * Health insurance will mean that proper medical care will be economically accessible to everyone covered by it, in the country as well as in the city, as a right and not as a medical dole."

The Senate sponsors of S. 1679, were Senator THOMAS, Democrat, of Utah, and seven other liberal Democratic Senators. Congressmen DINGLE, of Michigan, and BIEMILLER, of Wisconsin, sponsored companion bills in the House of Representatives.

The magazine, Consumer's Reports, for October 1950, calls attention to the fact "that in addition to the three national health insurance bills, there have been seven other bills before the Eighty-first Congress to provide more extensive medical care—Senator TAFT's bill, which would allot $300,000,000 a year to the States for the care of the medically indigent; the Hill bill, giving the medically indigent free membership in voluntary hospitalization plans; and an elaborate measure authored by Senator FLANDERS, of Vermont, for the development of comprehensive voluntary insurance plans."

All three of these aforementioned bills are comprehensive pieces of legislation. The first three, National Health Insurance and Public Health Acts, recognize as stated by a trustworthy legislative analyst, the need for:

1. More doctors, dentists, nurses, hospital administrators, and allied personnel.
2. Research necessary to discover the causes, cures, and prevention of diseases that take a heavy toll of life and productivity.
3. More hospitals and health centers.
4. Personnel and facilities, including clinics and ambulance services, in rural and other shortage areas.
5. More State and local public-health services.
6. More services for maternal and child health care and services for crippled children.
7. A program assuring everyone of a means with which to pay for the health and medical care necessary to make and keep them well.

They propose to meet these needs by providing:

1. Funds for increasing the enrollment in schools of medicine, dentistry, dental hygiene, nursing, public health, and sanitary engineering; for expanding the facilities of such schools; and for providing scholarships and maintenance funds to deserving students in these fields.
2. The establishment of research institutes in the fields of poliomyelitis, diabetes, arthritis, rheumatism, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy, and epilepsy, and other diseases that take a heavy toll of life and productivity.
3. Additional funds for the construction of hospitals, health centers, clinics, and group practice facilities under the Hospital Survey and Construction Act.
4. Special funds ($35,000,000) to aid rural and other shortage areas in getting and maintaining personnel, hospitals, clinics, group-practice facilities, mobile clinics and ambulance services, and funds to establish and operate demonstration farm-health cooperatives in selected areas.
5. Additional funds for the extension of State public-health services and for the establishment and extension of local public-health departments wherever needed.
6. Additional funds to carry on programs for maternal and child-health care and for services to crippled children.
7. The establishment of a national program of health insurance enabling everyone to pay for needed health and medical-care services.

More specifically, each title of the bill provides as follows:

Title I. Federal aid to medical education: Provides authorization of Federal aid for the education and training of physicians, dentists, dental hygienists, nurses, sanitary engineers, hospital administrators, and other health personnel. Aid is for the expansion and improvement of existing professional schools; the construction and equipment of new schools; the maintenance of schools through grants for each student up to an average past enrollment and incentives to increase enrollment through much larger grants for each student beyond the average past enrollment; scholarships awarded through the States, including students' tuition and expenses and a substantial sum toward students' maintenance.

Funds to help meet costs and to encourage increased enrollments will go to—

Medical schools: $300 per student (based on average enrollment over the period June 1947-49) and, in addition, $1,700 per student added to that average.

Dental schools: $250 and $1,300.

Schools of dental hygiene: $150 and $800.

Schools of nursing: $200 and $1,200 where room, board, textbooks, etc., are not provided; $200 for first-year students, $150 for second-year students, and $50 for third-year students in schools where these are provided.

Schools of public health: $350 and $2,400.

Schools of engineering: $200 and $1,200 for students seeking degrees in sanitary engineering.

The administration of this title is under the Public Health Service with a special advisory council. A section giving aid to the training of practical nurse is administered by the Federal Commissioner of Education.

Title II. Aid to medical research: Authorized the establishment of additional institutes in the National Institute of Health, under the United States Public Health Service especially for poliomyelitis, diabetes, arthritis and rheumatism, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy and epilepsy, and other diseases or groups of diseases. The Surgeon General is empowered to establish one or more additional institutes, and to terminate or combine institutes from time to time as may be required. Special advisory councils in each technical field are authorized.

Title III. Liberalization of Hospital Survey and Construction Act: This title (a) doubles the length of the program now authorized, extending it until 1957; (b) authorizes doubling the annual appropriation from $75,000,000 to $150,000,000; (c) liberalizes the grants-in-aid so that the poorer States may obtain up to two-thirds Federal contribution instead of only a flat one-third as at present; (d) permits grants to clinics and other facilities for group medical and dental practice, not at present authorized; and (e) authorized a special appropriation for studies and demonstrations in the local and regional coordination of hospital facilities.

Title IV. Part A. Special aid for rural and other shortage areas: Through an authorized annual appropriation of $35,000,000 for 4 years, rural and other areas short of personnel and facilities could obtain help to meet a variety of needs, e. g.: (a) Grants or loans guaranteeing income to doctors, dentists, and others who would practice in such an area; (b) aid toward the travel costs of these persons and their families to encourage their establishment in such areas; (c) mobile clinics; ambulance service in connection with hospitals inside or outside the area; (d) loans to supplement inadequate local funds for construction under the hospital construction title; (e) grants for the maintenance of hospitals, group practice units, health center and clinics; (f) grants and loans for construction and equipment of group practice units and of diagnostic and treatment clinics.

These aids to rural and other shortage areas are to be administered by the National Health Insurance Board. This Board may deal directly with the local areas until a State plan has been approved under the national health insurance title. Thereafter, the operations will be part of the State plan.

Part B. Assistance to farmers' experimental health cooperatives: From authorized appropriations of $10,000, for the first year and $15,000 for each of four succeeding years, aid may be furnished to rural cooperative organizations established to provide medical services in areas which are in need of such services and in which surveys indicate that such cooperatives may be practical. Aid may be through (a) technical assistance for surveying needs and for organizing the cooperative and (b) toward the facilities and maintenance of the cooperative during its initial years. Not more than 50 projects, nor more than 2 in any State may receive such aid. This program is to be administered by the Public Health Service in consultation with the Department of Agriculture.

Title V. Aid to States for State and local public health work: This title broadens and liberalized the existing grant-in-aid system under the Public Health Service, with the aim of extending local public health units where needed and of expanding and improving special health services under health departments.

Title VI. Aid to States for maternal, child health, and crippled children's services: Provides similar expanded grants-in-aid for these functions through the Children's Bureau and funds for the Children's Bureau to carry on research in child life.

Title VII. National health insurance: This title provides, just as the health insurance titles of S. 5 (81st Cong.) and S. 1320 (80th Cong.), the following:

1. A system of health insurance, national in scope and covering approximately 85 percent of the population. This includes employees, self-employed persons, and the dependents of all such persons.

2. Persons eligible for benefits would be entitled to medical and dental service from general practitioners and specialists, home nursing care, hospital care, laboratory service, X-rays, expensive prescribed medicines, eyeglasses, and special appliances.

3. Free choice of doctor and dentist by the patient is guaarnteed, as well as the right to change one's choice.

4. Every qualified doctor, dentist, nurse, and hospital is guaranteed the right to participate or not and to accept or reject patients. These guaranties apply to organized groups of practitioners, clinics, consumer cooperatives, and similar health service plans, as well as to individuals. Every hospital that participates is guaranteed freedom from governmental supervision or control.

5. Payments to doctors from the fund can be made on a fee-for-service basis (as at present), on a capitation basis (so much for each person who has chosen a particular doctor), or on a salary basis—the decision will be made for each local area by the doctors practicing in that area; but should individuals or groups of doctors in the area prefer a method different from that chosen by the majority, this, too, is permissible.

6. Provision is made for grass-roots administration of the program. In each local area administration would be carried out with the help and participation of local citizens, including members of the medical profession. Each State is given the right to administer the system through its own State agency and to divide the State into local areas. The State plan must meet certain general requirements stated in the bill. At the Federal level, administration is under a 5-man board, assisted by an advisory council of lay and professional people.

7. State and local agencies responsible for the subsistence and health care of needy persons (persons having insufficient earnings to contribute to the health insurance funds) may provide medical services for these persons by paying into the health insurance fund on their behalf. (The administration's public assistance legislation now before the House Ways and Means Committee provides Federal aid to the States to finance this.)

All of these Democratic and Republican health measures aid but do not attempt to control in the slightest degree medical practice or practitioners. They are not socialism or socialized medicine by the widest stretch of the imagination.

However, I am now and have been always against socialism, socialized medicine, and compulsory health insurance, and, even though there is no congressional legislation now pending in the Congress, seeking to set up socialism or socialized medicine, I am against any such proposed changes in our form of government; and if there was only one vote cast in the House of Representatives against socialism and socialized medicine, it would be my vote.

I have been consistently opposed also to compulsory health insurance, not because some people seem to think it is a trend toward socialized medicine but because in many instances it would be an unnecesary insurance duplication and would also in other instances be unfair to private insurance companies.

It would be an unnecessary insurance duplication, in my opinion, as far as the following groups are concerned: the veterans of World Wars I and II, the railroad workers, the packinghouse workers, the metropolitan utilities workers, the Omaha public power district workers, and also other workers having a worthwhile company health program for workers.

It would be unfair also to private insurance companies by taking away from them, perhaps, insured persons holding policies of insurance in the Blue Cross and Blue Shield, and policy holders in other insurance companies, fraternal and otherwise, who have satisfactory health and accident insurance coverage already.

I am and have been against compulsory health insurance and a supporter of a voluntary health insurance plan, erroneous statements to the contrary notwithstanding. If here must be a Federal voluntary health insurance plan to take care of those who might be regarded as too great a risk for private insurance companies to service, made it a voluntary and not a compulsory matter.

I also believe that in the cases last mentioned, voluntary insurance payment by the worker and his employer should not be 2 percent of a maximum salary of $4,800 but perhaps 2 percent of a total not to exceed $3,000 to $3,600 in salary, so as to give private insurance companies a chance to continue in business after such a worker has become health insurance conscious.

From the hearings before the congressional committee, no insurance company objected to such a plan and I believe that even the American Medical Association might favor such a plan.

I also think that every other fair-minded person will support voluntary health insurance and oppose all changes of our Government to a socialistic one, and will also oppose socialized medicine and compulsory health insurance.

Thanks for listening, ladies and gentlemen.

Thy Will Be Done

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following very interesting and thoughtful article from the Christian Science Monitor, Boston, Mass., Wednesday, December 6, 1950:

IN ALL THY WAYS

Two courses lie open before the American people. In this hour of crisis they can continue to struggle confusedly for a way out of defeat and dilemma. They can continue to guess at the aims of aggressors and make the same kind of human calculations which have repeatedly failed them. They can continue in the tendency of mortal minds to swing from unfounded hope to unfounded gloom.

Or they can choose a better way. They can turn wholeheartedly to God for guidance. They can go forward with the calm assurance that comes with willingness to rely on His omnipotence. They can demonstrate the insight and foresight which come with even a partial understanding of mind's omniscience. They can purify their own purpose and prove once more that a purpose steadfastly based on principle carries its own protection and progress.

If we read the thought of the Nation correctly, it is today riper than ever before for a concerted and definite move along the second course. The shock of events has prepared it for prayer. Confused, dismayed, frightened, their own devices exhausted, millions are recognizing the need for a higher wisdom. They have gained the first requisite for effective prayer—humility.

In such an attitude the people are readier genuinely to follow Solomon's counsel in proverbs: "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths." Prayer in this spirit does not attempt to instruct the Almighty. It does not beseech the all-loving Father to make a special dispensation for certain favored ones. It recognizes that His purpose is already wholly good, irresistibly right and seeks to aline the petitioner with that purpose—"Thy will be done."

Prayer is essentially an individual affair. It does not require forms of words or crowds of people. Nor is it something in which one can or should engage only on special occasions. Millions undoubtedly are already praying daily, as the Chief Executive has said he is.

But in the present situation there would be value in a more definite move to turn the whole Nation toward spiritual communion with the one God, each seeking in his own way to open his thought and his hands to the divine help that is ever available. On that level the American people can reach a foundational unity prerequisite to any conciliation of partisan or personal strife. In that spirit we urge the President to call the Nation to a day of prayer.

Housing and Rent Control Act of 1947

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, in voting for H. R. 9763, I do not thereby indicate deviation from my general opposition to controls. I believe it was Thomas Jefferson who said "that country is governed best which is governed least." Sooner or later, we are bound to come to the conclusion that at least for normal times we already have too many laws, restrictions, and regulations. We are undeniably at this time in the greatest crisis of all history. Even the wisest scarcely know how to turn and what to do. There are, of course, those who are properly denominated rent hogs. Thank God they are in the minority. It is manifestly unfair to discourage and penalize the ownership of property by permanently restricting incomes therefrom. It is unjust and inequitable to control or restrict one segment of our citizens or property holders and allow the vast majority of others to go without restrictions. In my particular section of the country, there is no special need for rent control. Our local government agencies have already acted under the law providing for decontrol. The present time, however, justifies harsher and more rigid restrictions than normally we would agree to.

This Congress has already empowered the President to impose controls on prices and incomes or wages. He ought to have long since acted on this important matter. With the hope that the short extension provided for in this resolution will induce the President to immediately impose across-the-board controls, I am voting for the measure. Surely the President and his advisers cannot mistake the signs of the times. A warfarer ought to know that controls are past due. Let us hope that world conditions will soon be such that we may release ourselves from all controls.

Lessons of the Air War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, there is no more progressive and patriotic group of Americans than the members of the American Legion. Veterans of two world wars, they are men and women who put service to country above everything else, and are deeply concerned with guaranteeing the security of this country, and keeping the United States free from the dangers, the sacrifices, and the destruction of another world war.

The important aeronautics committee of the American Legion is now publishing the Legion Air Review, as part of their Nation-wide air-power program. This monthly publication is expressive of the broad, objective point of view characteristic of the Legion in all its services to the Nation. It beats the drum for no branch of the armed forces, no type of aircraft, no aircraft company, no particular aviation activity. It covers all phases of aviation, and air activities. As a result, the pamphlet has a value that would be lacking in a similar pamphlet published by an organization of less exalted purpose than that of the American Legion.

Mr. Speaker, in the December issue of the Legion Air Review, which has just reached my office, I find an editorial worthy of consideration by every Member of this Congress, and by all other thoughtful citizens. In the face of reverses in Korea, and of a future that may call for the use of air power to an extent scarcely presaged even by World War II, it is important that we keep clearly in mind the lessons of the air war in Korea.

Lt. Gen. G. E. Stratemeyer, Commander of the Far Eastern Air Forces, has said, "Nothing in the Korean War changes the basic fact that air superiority must be won before ground and sea forces can move freely in modern war." The editorial reminds us "It must be remembered that winning a war is a job for ground, sea and air forces combined, and undoubtedly always will be." There is no contradiction between the two statements, nor need there be any disagreement or misunderstanding between any patriotic Americans devoted to the best interests of their country, if, instead of drawing fallacious conclusions from the Korean War, they will understand the action in Korea for what it is—and understand the many air war lessons which we will need to understand if we ever become involved in war with a first rate air power.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert in the Congressional record the editorial from the Legion Air Review on Significant Lessons of the Air War in Korea.

The editorial is as follows:

SIGNIFICANT LESSONS OF THE AIR WAR IN KOREA

There have been criticism and much misunderstanding of the role of air power in the Korean War. Some of the fallacious conclusions of parlor strategists appear to be widely shared and should be corrected before they become deep rooted.

Particularly in the early phases of the war there were some who maintained that air power was over-rated because it failed to stop the steady advances of the North Korean ground troops, although there was little or no enemy opposition in the air to hamper us. Later there was widespread argument that our jet planes were too fast and couldn't stay over the target areas long enough to do an effective job. And it was argued that the strategic air power concept could not halt the advance of the North Korean armies. These specious lines of reasoning have been refuted repeatedly as the war wore on.

In the first place it must be remembered that winning a war is a job for ground, sea, and air forces combined, and undoubtedly always will be. But in the early days of Korea, when the Communists were advancing relentlessly, the United Nations had only a comparative handful of well-trained and equipped ground troops—hardly one adequate battalion for every division mobilized by the enemy. No amount of airplanes could halt such overwhelming numbers of troops. But our fighters and bombers did slow them, liquidate thousands of enemy soldiers, and rip supply lines to shreds. Early in August Maj. Gen. Hobart R. Gay, veteran First Cavalry commander, said eloquently: "Without air support we simply would have been pushed into the water a month ago."

As to the concept of strategic bombing, the operations in Korea have been of a highly unusual nature. In a matter of days our medium bombers had run out of strategic targets of any importance, since the enemy's sources of supply were in a neutral country. It would be folly to use the Korean situation as a model for planning military operations. In an enemy country that has vast industrial and supply potentials to back up its armies, the picture would be entirely different and strategic bombing of these sources would be the first essential.

In Korea the F-80 jets proved they could provide ground support and also defend themselves. Said a Marine air group commander, "The jet can survive in the air and that's the first requirement for a fighter plane." Slower F-51 and F-4U piston-engine fighters provided good ground support, but no matter how good that support potential is, it has no value if enemy planes can knock it out of the skies—as would certainly be the case in conflict with a first-rate military power. The famed German Stuka was a terrific ground support fighter until it met air opposition.

Korea was the first proving ground for the jets. It taught us that we must build jets with greater range than the F-80, and must equip them with more firepower. It taught us that we must develop means of carrying on effective tactical operations at night as well as by day. It emphasized the extreme necessity for careful ground-air coordination and liaison and the need for adequate communications equipment of all types. It taught us many air war lessons which we will need if we ever go up against a first-rate air power. But most of all it taught us that we must continue to develop the concepts of both strategic and tactical warfare and the jet-powered aircraft to fulfill them.

Our Merchant Marine for Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, those of us, in Congress and outside, who believe that a well-considered, long-range program, of rehabilitation and maintenance in the merchant marine and shipbuilding field is necessary for the progress of the Nation in peacetime and its security in emergency are greatly concerned over recommendations contained in the Foreign Economic Report recently presented under the direction of Mr. Gordon Gray.

I have before me an editorial from the Los Angeles Times of Saturday, November 25, 1950, entitled "Our Merchant Marine for Defense," which presents very forcefully some of the arguments in opposition to the recommendations of the Foreign Economic Report. I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR MERCHANT MARINE FOR DEFENSE

All the barometers indicate rough sailing for those sections of Gordon Gray's foreign economic report dealing with the United States merchant marine. The CIO, AFL, American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, National Federation of American Shipping and Shipbuilders Council of America have joined in harmonious chorus to denounce the Gray recommendations.

SCOPE OF GRAY REPORT

President Truman, in a cagey preface, did not buy the report of his former Secretary of the Army outright but subscribed only to his statement of basic objectives, which boils down to the assertion that the nations of the world are economically interdependent. Gray's assignment was to find ways of closing the "dollar gap" in foreign commerce in anticipation of the day when ECA ends and countries which have been propped up by American aid have to walk alone.

It has long been known that one of the best ways foreign nations can earn dollars is to sell shipping services to the United States. Since the United States maritime unions enforce wages and working conditions far above those of any competing merchant marine, foreign-flag ships can almost always underbid American shippers in an open market.

SUBSIDIES APPROVED

But public policy in the United States has been to subsidize American shipping, by direct subsidies in some cases and by preferential legislation in others. This is justified as a national defense measure and also, in the language of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, as necessary for the development of (United States) foreign and domestic commerce. Since the humiliating spectacle of a train of foreign colliers following our great white fleet around the world in 1907–9, a large segment of American opinion has demanded that an adequate United States merchant marine be maintained to make us independent of foreign shipping for our essential trade.

This attitude inspired the congressional provisions that cargoes for the Army and Navy be hauled exclusively in American bottoms and that at least 50 percent of ECA or other Government-financed cargoes be transported in American-flag ships. The Gray report takes exception to this policy, urging that direct subsidies be substituted for preferential restriction of competition and only to the extent required for national defense.

Foreign maritime nations, the report argues, should be allowed to earn needed United States dollars by furnishing shipping services over and above those provided by the minimum merchant fleet we must maintain as insurance. The Gray report does not, however, attempt to fix this figure.

The trouble is that it cannot be fixed. Neither Mr. Gray, nor any other man or committee, can say exactly how much merchant marine we may need to meet a war emergency. It depends on many factors—how many places we have to fight; how far away they are; how successful the enemy may be in destroying our shipping; how quickly we can begin launching new ships on an assembly-line basis.

A REMOTE PROSPECT

There are good arguments on both sides of the question of subsidizing merchant shipping. The United States is not alone in the practice; most nations give their own flag vessels even greater preference. The Gray report wishes somewhat wistfully that this might be outlawed by international agreement, but in the present state of affairs this prospect seems remote.

In the meantime about the best that can be said is that any peacetime merchant marine is bound to be hopelessly inadequate for war purposes. It is not a question of cutting down the present subsidized United States shipping industry to size and letting foreigners take what's left. It is more pertinent to ask whether, even with our mothballed reserve, we have enough ships to weather the initial shock of total war. We came too close to losing the last battle of the Atlantic for much comfort.

Mr. Gray proposes that the shipping of friendly free nations be pooled for mutual defense purposes. This is fine and dandy and so long as we and our allies control the sea lanes with superior naval power we can be fairly certain that foreign shipping will work for us in war. But even this pool is far from enough by the experience of World War II.

From 1949 to 1945 we were allied with the principal sea powers of the world and they furnished for our use about 700,000 tons of shipping. But we furnished for their use over 5,000,000 tons of American shipping and then we just barely got by.

The Development of Our Inter-American Policy Under Secretary Acheson's Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD BOLLING
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, I spoke yesterday very briefly about the accomplishments of Secretary of State Dean Acheson in welding together the strength of the American Hemisphere. I would like to add a few words to what I said. I do this to try to bring in focus one of the many valuable achievements of Dean Acheson in strengthening the free world at a time when his virulent detractors are trying to drag him down with the most distorted charges.

The past several years have seen a development of inter-American relations to the point where today the solidarity of the hemisphere is greater than ever before in history. This solidarity is demonstrated most importantly in the United Nations, where on every significant issue the 21 American nations, under United States leadership, stand as one in their opposition to Communist designs. Such unity of purpose and policy among so many nations is unprecedented even in the history of inter-American affairs. It has not been achieved by accident. It has been achieved by a diplomacy that has created confidence in the leadership of the United States, based on a full appreciation of what this country stands for and what is at stake in the fight against communism.

The importance of inter-American solidarity in the United Nations is self-evident. The developments of the last couple of years in our inter-American relations have, however, a more far-reaching importance. The fact that the machinery of the inter-American system has been developed to the point where it goes far to insure the peace and security of the entire hemisphere gives the United States an assurance that the hemisphere provides a secure base for the development of its policy overseas. In other words, the United States need not be preoccupied with fears of troubles in its home hemisphere at a time when it is required to give its attention to the grave dangers facing it in Europe and Asia. Especially since the conclusion of the inter-American mutual-defense treaty at Rio de Janeiro in 1947, the inter-American system has shown amazing effectiveness in maintaining peace among its members and relieving the tensions that might otherwise lead to disruptions of inter-American solidarity. Specific examples are the resolution of difficulties between Costa Rica and Nicaragua, and again between the Dominican Republic, Haiti, Cuba, and several Central American states. Today every one of the American Republics has taken positive action to ratify the Rio Treaty, and all are loyal members of the Organization of American States. The inter-American system has earned the increasing confidence of its members. The developments that have brought this about have in large measure been manifestations of United States leadership under the administration of Secretary Acheson.

There is one more aspect of strength in the Western Hemisphere and a very important one which should be stressed. The American states, in strengthening their common determination over the past 2 years, have taken increasingly aggressive and effective action to control and eliminate communism inside their borders. In 1947 the Communist parties of Latin American had a probable total membership of 360,000. By 1950 this membership has been cut to little more than 200,000. The United States can now give its maximum attention to dealing with the dangers of communism in the east and west with confidence that the danger from the south is receding and under control.

All these achievements of solidarity and strength among the nations of our hemisphere did not come about by accident or by their own accord. They came about through skillful diplomacy continuously exercised and the highly successful Latin-American policy under the administration of Secretary Acheson.

A Question for Defense To Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DONALD L. JACKSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Santa Monica (Calif.) Evening Outlook of December 5, 1950:

A QUESTION FOR DEFENSE TO ANSWER

In the last week millions of Americans must have wondered why it would not be possible to stop the Chinese invaders of North Korea by dropping a string of atomic bombs across the narrow waist of the peninsula. Unless the effects of an atomic explosion in contaminating large areas have been greatly exaggerated, such a use of A-bombs should halt the supply of the big Chinese armies, regardless of how many of the invaders were killed.

Equally important, this use would be a purely defensive one, which would give Russia no excuse for entering the war, much less for bombing European cities. Of course, the Russians and the Chinese Reds would broadcast huge lies about it, but they have already done their utmost to inflame the Chinese masses against us, and they could hardly afford to frighten their own people by falsely accusing us of killing millions of Asiatic civilians.

If we used the bomb defensively to seal off northern Korea, Russia would be no more and no less likely to attack Europe than she is already. So it would seem that the governing consideration should be whether such a use of the A-bomb would be effective in checking the Chinese Reds and in saving the lives of UN troops in Korea.

That question can only be answered by our top military authorities. And it is not impertinent for civilians to request an answer in view of the extremely critical military situation in Korea threatening the loss of half of our available ground army. The United States and the free nations of the world cannot afford to suffer a Dunkerque in Korea.

The narrow waist of the Korean peninsula would seem to offer an ideal testing ground for such tactical use of the A-bomb. The territory which would be blasted and made radioactive for weeks would not have to be much larger than that sector of the British front in 1918 which the Germans contaminated so thoroughly by mustard-gas bombardment that it had to be evacuated. Atomic radioactivity should be much more effective than mustard gas in stopping an army which depends on masses of men moving by night, as does the Chinese. Its use would be relatively humane and the moral effect on the Chinese of a series of atomic-bomb explosions should be considerable.

We think this question has sufficient urgency in the minds of millions of Americans to warrant a statement on the subject from the United States Defense Department. If such tactical use of the bomb is not being considered, let the Department tell the American people why.

Too Low an Estimate of Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend remarks I am including an editorial from the Paris Appeal, one of the outstanding weekly papers of the Nation signalized recently by a picture of the Appeal plant drawn by Norman Rockwell and published in the Saturday Evening Post.

Jack Blanton, the editor, writes a column for the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and publishes a column in his own paper noted for its wit, frankness, common sense, and unregenerated Jeffersonian democracy.

The following editorial is characteristic and mingles the bitter with the sweet and I commend it not only to the Members of the Congress but to their constituencies as well:

TOO LOW AN ESTIMATE OF POLITICS

There is to much loose talk about depravity in politics. Like this: "If he isn't a crook now, he will be very soon after he gets into office," which remark was made by a man in Paris while a candidate for United States Senator was speaking during the recent campaign. This is but a sample of things people say when talking about politics in this country. A stranger would think our Congress and legislatures were composed of thieves and plunderers of the lowest type. While it is true, of course, that Congressmen and legislators are not measuring up to old-time standards of patriotism and ability, the fact remains that an overwhelming majority of them are above reproach so far as common honesty is concerned. As for the general run of officeholders, the ones with whom we come in contact in our post offices and courthouses are fair samples of the whole. They most always are valuable in church and community, men whose credit is good in bank and store.

In destroying the confidence of young people in everybody who engages in politics we destroy confidence in our form of government. It is a Government of parties, and parties must have offices and patronage of other sorts in order to survive. Besides, how could a party enact its principles and policies into laws without electing men to law-making bodies? Instead of denouncing politics as a crooked game, and officeholders as men unworthy of confidence, a better policy would be to improve the type of men we elect to make our laws. While the average Congressman, Senator, and State legislator is an honest man, not many of them are outstanding for ability. Most of them should be replaced with men who rise above present levels.

UN Politicians Pass the Buck—Second-Guessing MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I am asking permission to insert in the RECORD this article by Parker La Moore printed in the Washington Daily News on December 7. It certainly hits the bull's-eye. The above-mentioned article follows:

UN POLITICIANS PASS THE BUCK—SECOND-GUESSING MACARTHUR

(By Parker La Moore)

Ever since he became commander of the United Nations forces in Korea, Gen. Douglas MacArthur has been under general instructions to use his own judgment in carrying out his mission.

Nevertheless he has been denounced for exceeding his authority whenever his decisions have been subject to second-guessing.

Usually these were instances in which he was compelled to act because the politicians in the UN had passed the buck to him by withholding specific instructions.

Typical of this was the issue of the thirty-eighth parallel.

Under the initial UN resolution under which he was acting, General MacArthur was to "furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area."

When the question of crossing the thirty-eighth parallel was raised, President Truman took the position that this should be decided by the UN.

However, a majority of the delegations to the UN ducked the question by contending—always off the record—that they had been operating on the theory that General MacArthur had had the right all along to send his forces across the parallel.

Even when India's opposition to this assumption forced a more formal treatment of the issue, the UN balked at using the words "thirty-eighth parallel." Instead, it adopted a resolution that "all appropriate steps be taken to insure conditions of stability throughout Korea * * * including the holding of elections * * * for the establishment of a united, independent, and democratic government" in which "all sections and representative bodies of the population of Korea, South and North" would be invited to cooperate.

Then a special representative of UN was sent to Tokio to confer with General MacArthur concerning the government of newly won areas in North Korea.

A similar situation developed when the intervention of the Chinese Communists confronted the diplomats at Lake Success with another tough decision.

As early as September 2 General MacArthur reported the possible recruitment of Manchurian Koreans to reinforce the Red forces. Sixteen days later he estimated that between 40,000 and 60,000 troops trained in Red China had been released for service in the Korean campaign.

Finally, on November 6, General MacArthur announced that though the armies of North Korea had been decisively destroyed, he was confronted by a new enemy, which had invaded Korea from the privileged sanctuary of the adjacent Manchurian border. Pointing out the limits of his present mission, he obviously expected new instructions.

This crisis introduced the period of appeasement.

President Truman, in a public statement, assured the Chinese Reds that the United States would respect China's territorial integrity and urged their forces to withdraw from Korea. Britain made a similar plea, in a formal note to the Peiping government. Both powers made unofficial overtures to the Reds through the Indian Ambassador at Peiping, the details of which have not been revealed.

The UN invited the Chinese Reds to send a delegation to Lake Success to present their charges of aggression in Formosa against the United States.

Throughout this period the Chinese Communist troops were at war with the UN forces. By late November General MacArthur's intelligence reported a concentration of 500,000 troops on the Manchurian border. But the diplomats at Lake Success still refused to believe that Red China wanted open war.

Under standing orders to establish peace throughout Korea, General MacArthur faced the dilemma of digging in for the winter in the bleak Korean hills, or pushing on toward the border and trying to complete his task. He chose to march—and met a disastrous defeat at the hands of an enemy which outnumbered his forces by two or three to one.

When, at the beginning of his end-the-war offensive, General MacArthur told one of his field commanders he hoped to get the boys home for Christmas, he was indulging in optimism which events did not sustain.

But who can say that the Reds would not have moved against him if he had chosen to sit down and wait?

Acheson and the Snipers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, for many years the San Francisco Chronicle has been recognized as the leading organ of the Republican Party in Northern California. In view of the violent attacks which have been made recently upon Secretary of State Acheson by so many Republican newspapers throughout the Nation, the following editorial entitled "Acheson and the Snipers," which was published in the Chronicle of Saturday, December 2, is a noteworthy expression of opinion from a distinguished Republican source. The editorial follows:

ACHESON AND THE SNIPERS

Secretary Acheson undertook, in his Cleveland speech, to relate the current crisis in Korea with the entire world situation in which America finds itself. We think he did it rather well—not spectacularly, but competently. It was, furthermore, the sort of thing a Secretary of State ought to do. He is peculiarly charged with keeping foreign affairs in perspective, and a little perspective at this time can be used to advantage by the American people.

The speech hardly made a hit with the Acheson critics, however. They came down on him tooth and nail, charged him furiously with being calm in a time when calmness is intolerable, and renewed the singsong demand that he be fired.

We're getting a little tired of that refrain. When an able man is doing an earnest and competent job in a difficult situation, and the fate of all of us depends upon how well he does the job, we favor letting him see it through. We have seen too often in history this situation: A calm and competent man of vision puts his case before a people. But the people are befuddled by hysteria and hysteria-mongers, and throw him out.

Secretary Acheson is doing such a job in such a situation. We don't happen to agree with his boss politically, but there can be only one President and one Secretary of State at a time, and while he's there he's representing all of us, Democrats, Republicans, Prohibitionists, and everyone else. If he loses it will be just as expensive for us as though we had put him there personally. So we want to give Acheson the leeway he needs. We don't want him loaded down with needless handicaps that are going to prevent him from serving us to the best of his ability.

He is currently being overburdened with that kind of handicap. We would estimate that the trouble he gets at the hands of Vishinsky and Stalin and Mao Tse-tung doesn't slow him down half so much as the trouble he gets from the Americans who keep bleating, "Throw him out, throw him out."

What has he done or failed to do to merit this kind of vicious carping? What's the bill of particulars against him?

The old China policy grudge is still the only thing the critics really hold against him. The Communists won in China, Chiang Kai-shek was whipped, and Acheson got the blame. All the weaknesses of Chiang's regime, the corruption that surrounded him, the eagerness with which his own forces deserted by the millions to the enemy camp—all that is forgotten or ignored. Acheson single-handedly defeated Chiang and turned China over to the Communists. That's the gist of the critics' argument, and Acheson has been built up as the great symbol of the failure of American foreign policy.

We don't go along with that.

We don't think, in the first place, that American foreign policy has failed—yet. Certainly, we could have done better in China, if we could have availed ourselves of second sight. But Acheson didn't have it, and neither did his critics. And we don't go along with the smug Monday-morning quarterbacking when, as now, there's far more pressing work ahead.

Acheson has done a distinguished overall job as Secretary of State. He has plugged patiently and ably for European strength and unity and won a fair degree of success there. He rose splendidly in the Korean crisis. He has championed the United Nations while turning back the Russian effort to convert it to an instrument of Soviet will. It was Acheson who came up with the answer to the Russian veto in the Security Council, and cleared the way for authority to be transferred to the veto-free Assembly, where it now resides. That was a stroke of master statesmanship, managing as it did to save the United Nations and enhance its authority. And now he has outlined a policy of long-range strategy that aims at rearing the maximum strength and unity by free nations while holding to the minimum the likelihood of world war III.

We doubt that Acheson could satisfy his tormentors by any move short of resigning, but if he undertook to follow their counsel on foreign policy we should have real cause for alarm. What they want, judging from the tenor of their criticism, is for the United States to sever all bonds with the United Nations, defy the friendly world, and set out along our solitary way to whip the Communist empire.

We think Acheson's program, though admittedly more complicated, makes far more sense, and we support him in his effort to work it out under circumstances that grow more trying by the hour.

Northeast Pacific Fishery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the Pacific Fisheries Conference recently adopted a resolution relative to the desirability of having included a provision in any peace treaty signed with Japan stipulating that the Japanese fishermen be excluded from the fisheries of the Northeast Pacific Ocean, a recommendation in which I wholeheartedly concur. Under leave to extend my remarks, an editorial appearing in the December 4, 1950, issue of the Fairbanks, Alaska, Daily News-Miner on this subject is set forth below:

FISHING AND THE STATE DEPARTMENT

Fairbanks is a good many miles from the famous fishing grounds of Alaska but what's going on in Washington, D. C., should be of intense interest to every citizen of the Territory.

We in Fairbanks will be directly affected if the State Department doesn't get busy and realize that the economy of Alaska depends upon the ability of Americans to catch and process fish products in Territorial waters.

And yet there are people in the State Department who at this very moment are talking about a treaty with Japan that would not include a definite settlement of the fishery question. In other words, they would leave the matter wide open for a later settlement at an indefinite time.

This is causing a great deal of furor in Alaska where we can remember back a few years before the war when Japanese fishing vessels sailed into our fisheries and caught the salmon headed for Alaska spawning streams. That situation ended only because of the heated protests that almost resulted in an earlier war.

Now the Japanese are staying away from our salmon because General MacArthur is running the show and has set definite limitations on their activities. Once a treaty is signed, those limitations go out the window.

The Pacific Fisheries Conference, made up of representatives of all branches of the fishing industry from Alaska to the Mexican border are practical men. At their meeting in Seattle recently they left no doubt in anyone's mind about how they feel.

After the meeting, Congressmen, Secretaries of State, Defense, and Interior and other officials received telegrams notifying them that the conference is united in demanding that the Japanese stick to their fisheries and we'll stick to ours.

More specifically, the conference demanded that the State Department settle the issue at the same time the treaty with Japan is signed.

You don't have to be an expert in international affairs to know that the best time to get anything settled is at the time contracts are signed. A wife seeking alimony doesn't wait to argue her case a month after the divorce papers have been signed. An automobile buyer doesn't wait several months after he has made the final payments and then try to get a set of seat covers.

In this case, we're not asking for anything that isn't rightfully ours. These fisheries were developed by us and belong to us. All we're asking is for a reciprocal provision in the treaty.

This treaty would keep Japanese out of American fisheries and Americans out of Japanese fisheries.

The miles between Fairbanks and Alaska's fishing banks in no way lessen our intense interest in this matter. We should let it be known that all Alaska is united in its demand for action.

Misquoted History

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial which appeared in the East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal on Tuesday, December 5, 1950, entitled "Misquoted History." It follows:

MISQUOTED HISTORY

Addressing the United Nations political and security committee recently, Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Y. Vishinsky made an unhappy historical selection in illustrating his claim that "hatred being stirred by the ruling circles of the United States against the democratic forces of the Chinese people is not something new."

Vishinsky chose to refer to the Boxer Rebellion of 1900, during which the United States played a part in the suppression of the people's revolt in China.

It is a matter of history that United States forces were used in China to protect Americans there. The Boxers, a loose translation for the Chinese guerrilla bands committed to destroy all foreigners, had made wholesale onslaught against all Christians. Scores of Roman Catholic and Protestant missionaries and thousands of Chinese Christians were done to death at the hands of the insurgent bands.

It is important that only a fractional part of the people participated in the persecution of the foreigners. The disorders were confined largely to northeastern China, led by fanatics. American action during the uprising could not have made them hate the foreigners more, for they already hated them enough to kill.

After the Boxer uprising, China was laid open to aggression by foreign powers. True, the hands of neither the United States, Great Britain nor Japan are clean on that score, but it is a matter of history that Russia was there grabbing territory with both hands. It took, in fact, the Anglo-Japanese alliance of 1902 to force Russia to desist. Russia was building a Manchuria for her approaching war against Japan and, although she lost that war, she never has relinquished her political grasp on that often-fought-over area.

It is to the United States' credit that she claimed only rights to some treaty ports, which were relinquished in 1943. And she also returned her share of the indemnity exacted from China to aid in educating of the Chinese.

Vishinsky's reference is ill-chosen, in the light of the history books of the rest of the world. His mistake, probably, was in believing a Russian history book.

Depletion of Our Natural Resources

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES I. DOLLIVER
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Paul A. Johnson, secretary of the Iowa State Watershed Association:

America had the most wealth of natural resources that any nation ever had. Forests, fertile soil, climate, fisheries, minerals in such abundance that Europe and Asia were poor by comparison. These made her a place to which our fathers came seeking the opportunity that was offered them. America became great and strong in a very short period of time. A land of opportunity under a free people's government.

Loss of these resources is fast making us a have not nation. Mines and oil wells may be exhausted. Even then we have, if we can keep it, our soil, the source of food, of clothing, of shelter. Are we keeping it? "Jesus told a parable of the men to whom the talents were distributed. One wasted them, one made no use of them at all, one managed his so that they were useful and increased. What has America done with the soil resources a bountiful God gave to us?"

There are rugged individualists who are farmers. They are not all lumbermen, oil men or mine owners or builders of monopolies. In the United States as a whole we have had some 160,000,000 acres of what was once farm land destroyed. The total of farm and grazing land ruined is given as 275,000,000 acres. There has been a loss of fertile top soil from Iowa farms since they were first plowed of 30,000,000,000 tons.

How much is 30,000,000,000 tons? An acre inch of soil weighs between 130 and 140 tons. A big truck might carry 10 tons of soil. If my figures are correct a line of trucks necessary to haul back all of our top soil that has gone from Iowa's fields would go around the earth about a thousand times.

One farmer said to me once and I will always remember it, "What can a county agent tell me? I have worn out three farms already." He was a real rugged individualist.

During a spring flood in Crawford County it was found, after careful checking, that the amount of top soil swept off the farms and carried down the Boyer and its tributaries in 4 hours would cover 1,660 acres of land to the depth of 12 inches.

When the Mississippi River is in flood a 40-acre farm is carried down to the Delta every minute. Twenty-four hundred acres per hour. No wonder the total loss of fertile soil is more than that of eight States the size of Iowa. Is this our cooperative American way of life?

When the battle of New Orleans was fought in 1812, that city was a port on the Gulf of Mexico. Now ships ride high above the city down a silt filled, diked channel, to reach the Gulf over 160 miles away, through a delta built up from eroded topsoil, a lot of it from Iowa.

Dean Herb Kildee spoke at a celebration in Mississippi a few years ago. The president of the chamber of commerce, in introducing him said, "Dean Kildee you are standing on 50 feet of black Iowa topsoil. You should feel right at home. The dean said it came so close to the truth that it wasn't even funny.

Why this enormous loss of Iowa's greatest resource? It can be summed up by the statement "Too many farmers are of the rugged individualist type. They neither cooperate with God or their neighbors in the saving and the building up of what God gave to them. As a result gullies (land cancers) are devouring our fields."

Iowa was the State most blessed with black soil, one-fourth of the grade A soil of the Nation was once within her borders. My good friend Fay Murray, former secretary of agriculture of Iowa, tells this in one of his poems entitled "Iowa, Past and Future":

"Iowa, I love the name,
Sweet to boyish lips it came
Magic name for prairies wide
A fertile fragrant countryside,
Iowa, I love it still,
All my being knows its thrill
Pregnant place of growing corn
Feeding place of men unborn.
Oft I wonder as I sit
What the future holds for it
After centuries, ten or twenty,
Will it still mean Land of Plenty?"

Will it? As Iowa goes, as to her soil, so goes the Nation?

This story of soil destruction is not the American way of life. It is not cooperation. It is that old story of me and mine, my son John and his. Not I and my neighbor working together. It is a lack of concern or interest in the other fellow. This is the spirit that breeds wars, creates race hatreds, and leads to suffering and destruction.

God said, "The world is mine, and the fullness thereof." God gave it to man to use, to make fruitful, to feed him, to make an abundance of the good things of life and of happiness.

Man has created a place where some have too much and many have too little. Our American way of life can exist only in a land of opportunity, where there is a better future for folks to secure for themselves. Where justice and equal rights for all are assured because the people are the state.

Our ancestors came from a war-torn Europe seeking opportunity for homes and happiness where resources were abundant. They worked together and built a great Nation. A place where the sick and unfortunate were cared for because there was an abundance for all. A country where folks could live up to the teaching of the golden rule and, not merely recite it in church or Sunday school. A country where the living Christ could rule, for all races, for all creeds, for all folks rich or poor; fortunate or unfortunate. A country where children could have homes where the spirit of cooperation could prevail, where love could rule, where service above self could be taught.

That is what we believe is America, our American way of life, an ideal worth fighting and dying for if needed. Other parents, whose sons gave their lives, feel as I do. They gave their all in the belief that America needed their sacrifice so that it could continue as a land of opportunity, of cooperation, a Christian land, in which the words "do unto others" and "inasmuch as you do to the least of these, you do it unto Me" means the freedom they fought and died for. Can we remember these men and their sacrifice?

In the hurry of everyday life, shall we forget? We can humbly ask the giver of all good things that we may see more clearly what He would have us do and have us be. Then America, our country, shall continue to be that country in which God, not selfish men, shall direct and govern and the teachings of His Son, our Christ, shall continue to be the American way of life, our individual way of thinking.

Proposed Changes in the Administrative Set-Up of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters regarding the proposed changes in the administrative setup of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation:

SMALLER BUSINESS ASSOCIATION
OF NEW ENGLAND, INC.,
Boston, Mass., December 4, 1950.

The Honorable THOMAS J. LANE,
House of Representatives,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LANE: There is enclosed a copy of a communication addressed this date to President Truman relating to the proposed changes in the administrative setup of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

We call your attention to the following:

1. The Boston loan agency is the fifth largest of the existing 31 branches of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

2. We would suggest inquiry by your office as to whether the contribution by the production facilities of the New England area toward the over-all economies with their present and prospective financial needs is one that should be handicapped by transferring local authority out of this area.

You undoubtedly well know that the attitude of this association is that Reconstruction Finance Corporation does not meet the essential need of smaller business for long-term and equity financing and that the need of smaller business is for a capital bank or similar body. Until such time, however, as the capital-bank plan becomes a reality, it is essential that the facilities of RFC should continue to be available to provide fullest assistance to New England business in the most efficient and economical manner.

Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been of definite assistance to New England. We feel that you, too, would want nothing helpful to this area to be moved from it. The proposed action is to become operative December 15, 1950. Those interested in this issue request that a public hearing be granted before any such action be taken. We hope that you see fit to promote this request.

Very truly yours,

JOHN D. MALOY,
Executive Secretary.

SMALLER BUSINESS ASSOCIATION
OF NEW ENGLAND, INC.,
Boston, Mass., December 4, 1950.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We address you regarding a recent release in the local press heralding certain projected plans for what would appear to be radical changes in the existing administrative setup of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and which, according to current press and radio comment, will result in the virtual liquidation of the Boston loan agency of the RFC as at present constituted and operated.

At the outset may we observe that the members of this association are, and for sometime have been, sturdy advocates of any measures looking toward more efficient and economical operation of our Government, at both the State and National levels, as is evidenced by the series of weekly broadcasts which the association has sponsored in this area for the past 3 years.

It is to be noted that we use the expression "efficient and economical," and to us these two qualifications are inextricably interwoven. It is a truism that observance to economy alone at the expense of efficiency produces neither economy nor efficiency. Further, it would seem reasonable to assume that any appraisal of the value of the RFC as a Government instrumentality should be measured in ratio to the extent to which its operation conforms to the basic requirements of "convenience and necessity," and we entertain grave doubts as to whether the proposed reorganization plans will conduce to observance to those fundamental requisites.

The entire economy of the New England area is virtually rooted in the soil of small business. The number of so-called industrial giants in this area in relation to total number country-wide is relatively small. The membership of this association is spread throughout the six New England States and one of our foremost association objectives has been the promotion of those measures that would conduce to easier credit requirements, even to the point of advocating the creation of facilities that would permit of the making of capital loans and equity financing.

These objectives have been the subject of repeated conferences in Washington, over the past 2 years, between representatives of this association and the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the New England area. It has been repeatedly pointed out that, by virtue of the existing tax structure, plus the lack of easy and convenient credit facilities, the average small business is effectually frozen and denied the opportunity for growth and expansion, and the consequent increase in employment capacity.

It, therefore, becomes understandable, that the operations of the RFC have been a matter of great interest and concern to our membership, and, in this connection, the association has maintained a close liaison between its board of directors and the Boston RFC loan agency for sometime past. By virtue of the information which we derive through this medium, we are extremely dubious as to whether the changes suggested by the RFC directors in the presumed interest of "economies, balanced operations, and increased efficiency," and to become operative December 15, 1950, will conduce to any one of those three objectives and for the following reasons:

Item 1: The present Boston loan agency administers to the needs of the six New England States and is the only existing agency of the RFC country-wide that embraces that many States.

Comment: The present personnel of the Boston agency numbers 102 and according to current local press comment, this number will be reduced to 13. In addition, the plans of the directors contemplate the centralization of "all fiscal and personnel matters, all loan administration, and all official files and records in the regional loan agency," which it is proposed will be located in New York City. In addition to the six New England States, it is proposed that the New York City office will supervise four other States, plus the Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico.

How, in the name of common sense, can it be successfully argued that the removal of the base of operations with all vital records to a point more than 200 miles from the center of the scene of action, can result in either economy or efficiency? Particularly does this become questionable when it is considered that a very substantial percent of the loans in number in the New England area are in the small brackets where the borrower can afford no high priced advisory talent in the fields of accounting, taxation, and research, and, as a consequence, of which the personnel of the Boston loan agency are not mere perfunctory examiners, appraisers, and reviewers, but rather of necessity, become in the nature of advisers to many small-business enterprises.

The value of this service is evidenced by the fact that there are those applications which are withdrawn after the RFC examiners and appraisers have reviewed the situation and as a consequence of their efforts and analysis, the needs of the borrower have been accommodated through normal facilities at local banking levels.

Item II: Within the limitations imposed on it by law, the Boston loan agency according to our information is being operated in a generally satisfactory manner and we understand without substantial, if any, expense to the taxpayers.

Comment: Under the present management, since April 1949 the operating expense of the Boston loan agency has been sharply curtailed with respect to personnel, rent, and other administrative costs, and this, during a period when the number of applications presented, the number of loans approved, and the outstanding loan balance, were progressively on the increase (see item III).

In addition, by virtue of a most unusual and, if we may say so, a somewhat unbusinesslike method of calculating reserves, it would seem that this area is the subject of unfair discrimination. The requirement as established by the Controller, provided for an immediate reserve of 3.3 percent of the amount disbursed, beginning June 30, 1948, and up to July 1, 1950, on the latter date the reserve requirement was reduced to 2.8 percent.

There can be no quarrel with the setting up of a reasonable reserve, but the one inexplicable aspect of the system from our point of view, as businessmen, lies in the fact that after a reserve of 3.3 percent has been set aside against a given loan disbursement, it remains as a reserve against that disbursement even after the loan is completely liquidated and paid off.

This doesn't seem to make sense. On the other hand, we are possessed of a complete awareness that the RFC is a Federal agency and that the possibility is ever imminent, that the losses in one or more of its present 31 branches, may exceed the reserves applicable to the disbursements of those one or more branches—hence the necessity for the establishment of reserves on a national level basis becomes obviously essential. We submit, however, that a privately operated national concern would maintain and would give wide distribution to statistical data disclosing the results by branches, if only for the purpose of specifically pointing out to the management of all branches, what might be regarded as a yardstick from the viewpoint of efficient operation, and for the further and highly desirable purpose of stimulating the natural and human competitive urge to the end that the highest possible measure of operating efficiency be the prime objective.

We introduce this subject because it is our belief that on the basis of an unprejudiced analysis, the Boston loan agency will rank high. We have no authenticated figures, but it is the considered opinion of our contact with the local RFC office that the reserve established June 30, 1948, plus cumulative reserves on disbursements subsequent to that date, at the rates earlier mentioned, would produce an aggregate sum substantially in excess of all losses sustained by the local office since the beginning of the lending program in 1934, and of those aggregate reserves, a sizable percent is a reflection of the reserves chargeable against disbursements that have been completely liquidated.

We have seen no figures as to a comparative analysis with regard to the 31 branches of the RFC; neither have we seen any figures on a comparative basis with regard to the adequacy of reserves on those loans authorized by the Washington office, either from direct application to Washington, or on appeal to Washington following negative action by the advisory committees of the present regional agencies. If such figures are available, we would like to have access to them, and in passing, may we say that this is one of the many phases of this situation which should be explored before precipitate action is taken on the proposed administrative changes.

Item III: Within the limitations imposed on it by law, the Boston loan agency is making what we believe to be an intelligent effort to meet the progressively increasing requirements of the New England economy.

Comment: The present management assumed office in April 1949. Despite the operating economies referred to in item II, the business of the local agency has substantially increased as to the number of applications, loans approved, and total outstanding dollar volume. As of April 30, 1949, there were 118 loans outstanding, involving $5,846,000. As of September 30, 1950, there were 220 loans outstanding, involving $20,469,000.

Certainly, the suggestion that a regional area office be liquidated, which in 17 months has multiplied its service to the area by fourfold, does not seem to be a reflection of what would normally be regarded as sound business judgment. Certainly, no efficient privately operated business would contemplate the curtailment of its local service facilities to its customers in the face of such a trend.

Certainly, it cannot be successfully argued that there is any likelihood of a lesser demand on the Boston loan agency in the period that lies ahead. We have, in New England, a greater concentration of small factories and shops equipped for precision work and a greater number of skilled workers in these crafts, than anywhere else in this Nation. These are the shops, the factories, and the workers that are going to be called upon, as they have been before, to contribute much to the pending preparedness program incident to the international crisis which presently confronts us. Obviously, the demands for financing in many instances, what will be regarded as capital financing, will increase in direct proportion to our appropriations for defense.

From this particular aspect of this situation, we are constrained to observe that the action of the RFC Directors is another classic example of that too frequent tendency on the part of governmental agencies to act as completely independent entities, without public hearing for the benefit of those most vitally affected, without regard to the effect of proposed action on the operations of government as a whole, and we regret to say, without adequate consideration to the interests of all the people who, in the finality, constitute the Government.

There are many other points we could make in support of our contention that this situation should be the subject of reexamination as a matter of policy, and that there be a postponement of the announced intention of the Directors of the RFC that the proposed changes become operative December 15, 1950.

May we point out to you what we regard as two basic principles:

1. The moneys expended by the RFC in connection with its loan activities and for administrative cost incident thereto are the moneys of the taxpayers.

2. The New England area represented by this association certainly contributes its proportionate share to the general tax structure from which the expenditures of the RFC are derived.

Having in mind these two basic facts, may we very respectfully suggest, but in a manner not at all lacking in firmness, that those whose interests are most vitally affected should have an opportunity to make themselves heard with regard to any suggested radical departure from the existing modus operandi or at least should be considered and consulted as to suggested changes in advance of their becoming operative.

At this critical juncture in our history, it is obvious that the share of the responsibility to be assumed by the New England economy, with regard to the future of our Nation, will be a heavy one. We submit that the principle of orderly planning dictate that we be permitted to express our views with regard to these proposed changes, to the end that New England industry be guaranteed that no unnecessary obstacle is created that will militate against its efficiency in the discharge of that responsibility.

Accordingly, we request that the RFC be required to publish a complete text of the proposed changes, and that a public hearing be held with regard thereto, either by the Directors of the RFC or by the appropriate congressional committee. Pending such hearings, we request that the proposed changes to be effective December 15, 1950, be postponed.

It is our considered judgment that the procedure we suggest is consistent with democratic processes as we understand them.

In closing, may we repeat that this association is militantly in favor of economy. We are disturbed primarily at the suggestion that the local autonomy with regard to existing authority to approve and grant loans be impeded, restricted, or abolished to the sacrifice of prompt consideration and action on matters involving the steadily growing needs of New England business.

Respectfully,

HOWARD D. WILLIAMS,
President.

National Grange Opposes Central Arizona Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN PHILLIPS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, I have asked permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD in order to bring to the attention of the Members of the Congress a resolution adopted by the National Grange at its eighty-fourth annual session in Minneapolis, Minn., November 15 to 25, 1950.

I also call attention to excerpts from a letter from the legislative counsel of the Grange, on this same subject. Writing to a member of the Public Lands Committee, Mr. J. T. Sanders of the National Grange said:

In view of the burdens imposed on the Nation's economy by the growing international crisis, the economic unsoundness of this proposal, and the fact that it would add over $2,000,000,000 to the Nation's tax burden, it is clear to us that the project would be contrary to every principle for which the National Grange stands. We therefore urge you, as a member of the Public Lands Committee, to vote against a favorable report on S. 75, the central Arizona project.

The resolution follows:

RESOLUTION OF THE NATIONAL GRANGE, OPPOSING ARIZONA PROJECT BILL, ADOPTED AT THE EIGHTY-FOURTH ANNUAL SESSION, MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., NOVEMBER 15 TO 25, 1950

Whereas a bill is now before the Congress which, if passed, will authorize the central Arizona project; and

Whereas the proponents of the bill admit that it is designed to rescue about 226,000 acres of land where the underground supply of water is being or has been voluntarily overdrawn; and

Whereas the construction costs of the irrigation features designed to serve the rescued land will amount to more than $1,800 per acre, with little, if any, of the cost being repaid by the landowners; and

Whereas Oscar L. Chapman, Secretary of the Interior, has officially stated to Congress that the central Arizona project will cost the American taxpayers over $2,000,000,000 for interest alone, which will not be repaid; and

Whereas the central Arizona project can be built and operated only if the established principles of economic feasibility as set forth in the national reclamation laws are grossly violated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Grange does hereby oppose the passage of this legislation and urges its defeat.

Alaska Statehood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, at the recent sixth annual conference of the Alaska Moose Association the members at the conference adopted a resolution adding their voice to the thousands and thousands of other Americans who advocate statehood for Alaska. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to present that resolution here:

RESOLUTION ON STATEHOOD OF THE SIXTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE ALASKA MOOSE ASSOCIATION, PALMER, ALASKA, SEPTEMBER 23, 1950

Be it resolved, That inasmuch as the present international situation is making our Territory a target for the eyes of the world in both a political and a military sense, and inasmuch as the people of Alaska have demonstrated that they are capable of living up to the obligations of citizenship which statehood will entail; therefore, this sixth annual conference of the Alaska Moose Association favors immediate statehood for Alaska and urges each and every member in each member lodge to assist in achieving this objective.

Approved by the convention, September 23, 1950.

Distribution: President of the United States, Secretary of the Interior, Delegate to Congress, Speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress, President of the United States Senate, speaker of the house and president of the senate of the Alaska Legislature, Governor of Alaska, supreme governor of the Moose lodge at Moosehart.

L. E. EVANS,
Chairman, Resolutions Committee.

No Friends for the Lender

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, in connection with our foreign giveaway program, I have long argued that it is human nature, generally speaking, that those who are under obligations to you financially or otherwise are at best inclined to avoid you and at the worst to become your enemy. This unfortunate human weakness applies to our international relations, as has been well pointed out in a recent editorial in the Vineland Times-Journal entitled as above. I think it is worthy to be included in the official record of our proceedings. It follows:

NO FRIENDS FOR THE LENDER
(By Ben Leuchter)

On the wall of a gasoline station's office or a small candy shop one often sees a printed sign which says in these or similar words:

"Let's stay friends. Please pay cash."

It's axiomatic in the business world that the retailer who demands cash payment on his sales retains the friendship of his customers. Only when he begins to extend credit does he make enemies, for some customers, having been tendered the credit (which is the same as an interest-free loan), resent attempts by the seller to obtain payment for his merchandise or service rendered.

That strange trait in human nature which motivates people to bite off the hand that fed them is as evident in international relations as in the retail business world. For more years than many Americans care to remember, Uncle Sam has been the world's lender, seeking to further his own prosperity by helping other nations to arm, wage war, and rehabilitate themselves. He has been even more than a lender, for the funds advanced were loans in name only. Part of the time, repayment of the loan was not expected either by the lender or the borrower.

Verbal and monetary thanks have been received by Uncle Sam for his generosity, until the objects of his philanthropy felt economically able to lose conveniently a portion of their memory. Particularly true has this been since the end of the Second World War, which ushered in one-way flow of money and material eastward across the Atlantic Ocean in a volume and spirit never known in the world's history. Great Britain and France, ravaged physically and starved financially after being America's allies in two wars, pleaded pitifully for aid in restoring their strength. The two great powers of Europe minus any power but that in their vocal chords, lapped up every drop and morsel of American aid, and as their digestive organs were given more use, so were their vocal organs—only more so. Until the present day the process continues, reaching a culmination in these last weeks in which Uncle Sam is threatened with loss of military support if he follows actions not meeting the approval of those great powers, England and France.

That is the galling background attending Prime Minister Attlee's trip to Washington to confer with the President.

Not that Mr. Attlee is personally to blame, as he has been pictured as a "moderate" attempting to contain the pack of idealistic jackals in his own Labor Party who have grown politically fat experimenting with social panaceas paid for by Uncle Sam. The brazen ingratitude of Great Britain has been exceeded only by that of that land of corruption and indolence across the English Channel. France, which is spending on the Indochina rebellion the exact amount of money she receives from the United States in Marshall-plan aid, wiggles her fingers at Uncle Sam and whips up the courage to declare she will not assist her American friend if he should drop the atomic bomb and become involved in an official all-out war with Communist China.

Yet, American indignation at the attitude of her alleged allies must be bridled by the realization that somehow what Mr. Attlee is telling Mr. Truman may make sense. The Prime Minister probably is arguing that if America allows her entire war effort to be sucked into the Asiatic theater, Europe will be left defenseless 'neath the feet of the Russian Bear. He is asking America to seek some "honorable" diplomatic settlement of the Korean War, but he has not publicly stated what he means by "honorable." With Red China now holding the whip and cracking it for everything it's worth, it is difficult for the United States to make any settlement that does not smack of appeasement.

The Communists and You

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I am asking permission to insert in the RECORD this column by Walter Winchell in the Washington Post of December 7:

THE COMMUNISTS AND YOU

(By Walter Winchell)

Our armies are fighting with their backs to the wall in Korea, not against defeat, but against annihilation. Militarily and diplomatically we are suffering one of the worst disasters in our history. The Nation's leaders, reversing their statements of only a few weeks ago, now tell us we are fighting for survival. The situation is far too critical to be solved by finding a scapegoat. What the Nation wants is a cold analysis of why we are losing and how we can win.

Before you know where you are going, you must know where you have been. In 1945 we thought we were on the brink of a new and peaceful world. F. D. R. staked all on the good faith of his allies and like his old chief, Woodrow Wilson, he nobly and magnificently failed. In the belief that the loss of 15,000,000 of its people was enough to make any nation sick of war, F. D. R. was prepared to give Russia every assurance that it would not happen again. By quieting Russia's fears, F. D. R. thought he was laying the foundation of permanent peace. But F. D. R. and Stalin weren't playing the same game; Stalin was playing power politics; and from a power politics viewpoint he was taking all tricks. In his mind, Stalin knew the territories he was acquiring were not defensive areas for Russia but staging areas for future offensives of the Red army.

Stalin's first problem was to neutralize the greatest military force in Europe. That was Russia's ancient foe, Germany. While Germany was half occupied by him, obviously it couldn't fight at all, and if there were a fight with the west, Germany and not the Ukraine would be the battleground. That is why he continues to occupy Germany and why there will be no peace treaty reuniting it as a sovereign nation.

His traditional enemy in the east, Japan, was knocked out. Further, he had gotten Manchuria and the Kurile islands as bases from which to keep Japan flat on her back. Thus, the only important force he faced was that of the United States. His diplomatic objective, therefore, was to get the United States to knock itself out, and he succeeded to an incredible degree. We brought the boys home, as he built up more and more divisions to war strength. The last 5 years tell the story: As we receded they advanced.

In power politics the final question is much like a small boy's challenge: "What are you going to do about it?" As we continued our demobilization, and Russia built her armies and air force to an all-time strength, we could do less and less; and she could do more and more about it. She took 13 countries and 600,000,000 people under her dominion, and is still going. At the same time she got us to remove even the last vestige of resistance in the east—the Nationalist Government of China. Power, like water, follows the line of least resistance. Since no Far East nation has nearly the power of any European country, the Soviets are exploiting the vast break-through in Asia. Power goes until it is stopped, and there is nothing of any major resistance left on the Asiatic mainland.

Thus the real question is: "What do we do about it?" The first paragraph in any military manual will give you the grim and simple answer: Assume the worst and do the best you can with what you've got. The truth is we can't do very much about it right now. But a man in a raging sea has no choice but to swim. Our program is now dictated by the same inexorable logic of events. Here it is:

We haven't nearly enough arms and until we do we can't do anything. Accordingly we must again turn our country into the "arsenal of democracy" and teach our men how to use the new weapons. This means war priorities, price control, rationing, and universal military training.

By treaty and policy we have decided to arm the Atlantic alliance. This is a double gamble. The six Red field armies poised on the iron curtain are capable of smashing to the Atlantic coast. It is unreasonable to suppose they are going to sit there indefinitely watching western Europe forging the weapons to defeat them. The Red Army will probably blitzkrieg in overwhelming attack to the west, when it moves, so that it can capture Europe's Marshall-plan factories without destroying them, and thus use them against us.

Assuming the worst, as sound military caution dictates, we must consider that Europe may well be overrun and Great Britain neutralized by rockets, submarines, and air raids. Thus, even as we rearm Europe, an underground should be prepared to function in that emergency and demolition squads trained and ready in case we must yield the territory. Thereafter we and Canada will have to carry the fight, with very little help from South America.

Our choice in Asia is even more limited. Our current Far East policy is changed now to a salvage operation. No agreement with Red China will be kept by it; the President has 52 broken Communist treaties on his desk. The further fact is that the Korean campaign is only part of a continuing general Asiatic conquest now in progress. Tibet we will not defend, and Indochina we cannot defend against the Red Chinese forces when released from action in Korea. That means, at will, the Communists can sweep down to Singapore as easily as the Japanese did.

In the Communist pattern they are seeking to extend the area of their victory by a proposed peace treaty. If we accept their peace terms, it will give them equal rights with MacArthur in Japan, wipe out Chiang Kai-shek, and permit them to purchase the goods they so sorely need in America.

We have lost a campaign, but by deluding ourselves that they will keep any peace treaties we can lose the global war. Appeasement in Korea will be more tragic in results than appeasement at Munich. We will cut our own throats if we admit Red China to the United Nations. From the moral standpoint, for which we say we are fighting, it would be as disastrous as the acceptance of Mussolini's rape of Ethiopia. A bank robber, though successful, is still shunned by a self-respecting community.

We have now been officially told we are fighting for survival. That means we must use all the help we can get from wherever we can get it. It is the first rule of survival that common enemies make natural allies. Our natural allies are the imprisoned countries, and they should be used. With almost suicidal blindness, up to this time, our intelligence has been forbidden to arm the underground resistance movements. That policy should be reversed today.

Our country no longer has the slightest choice. There is only one way. We have gambled that there would be peace—and lost a war. Our last chance is to rush preparation for a global war—and hope to save our country.

Is England a Helpful Ally or Are We Just Pulling Her Chestnuts Out of the Fire?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, light on the question carried in the caption above may be gleaned from an editorial of the Chicago Tribune of December 6, printed herewith:

ATTLEE AND COMPANY

Prime Minister Attlee was sped on his way to Washington with a mighty outpouring of censure for America from British politicians and the press. The English ally views us with suspicion and dislike, and is at no pains to conceal it. When the military situation in Korea could not have been worse, Mr. Attlee's minister of defense, Emanuel Shinwell, and his minister of war, John Strachey, showed their mettle.

Did these responsible ministers of our valiant ally take energetic measures to get reinforcements to Korea? Did they call for speed and resolution in organizing against the world menace of Soviet aggression? Not that could be noticed.

Strachey made a stirring call to Englishmen not to surrender social gains to defense needs. Socialist business as usual was his prescription. Shinwell deliberately falsified the United Nations mandate under which General MacArthur was ordered to proceed north of the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea. He said that MacArthur had brought all the trouble by exceeding his orders.

Britain's responsible military leaders proved good backbiters. They specialize in biting their allies, not their enemies.

Yet no one ought to be surprised at these attitudes. Last March Strachey's ideological inclination was brought into question by Lord Beaverbrook's London Evening Standard, which said that Strachey was a Communist who had never disavowed communism. This was denied by Attlee and Strachey, who asserted that Strachey had broken with the Communists in 1940, when Stalin was supporting Hitler's war with Britain.

The letter to a magazine which Strachey cited as proof of the break was not very convincing evidence. If there ever was a break, it is difficult to reconcile it with statements made by Strachey as late as October, 1945, after the end of World War II, which were published then in his book, "Socialism Looks Forward." In chapter 12 Strachey said that the proof that socialism works was that Russia had triumphed in the war "without the assistance of a single Russian capitalist or landlord." In the windup of a panegyric to Communist Russia, he wrote:

"But, somebody may say, isn't Russia a pretty tough sort of place? What about the purges and the shooting and the lack of civil liberties and the trouble with the peasants, and consequent food shortages, which we used to hear so much about in the British newspapers before Russia became our ally?

"Yes, Russia is pretty tough. Things have happened there which I, for one, most passionately hope may never happen in Britain. But let us never forget this. It is very largely we and the other capitalist states of the world who have made Russia tough. First we made war on her; then we subsidized all the Russian landowners and capital owners who had been turned out to make war on her; then we drew what was called a 'sanitary cordon' around her; then we boycotted her; then we refused her all credits; then we refused to make common cause with her against the Nazis, hoping they would attack her. And now people are surprised because she is very tough, pretty rough, depends on nobody but herself, and trusts nobody but herself.

"Russia has been through unspeakable difficulties and sufferings, of which the German invasion was only the last; but she has been through them, and has come out one of the strongest nations on earth. This giant strength of Russia is built on the concrete foundations of a Socialist economic system. So when you hear people say socialism 'won't work,' just whisper the words, 'Like the Russian Army?' "

Nobody so sympathetic to the cliches of Communist propaganda, and no one with such a vast admiration for the Soviet system and Soviet military power, could ever put his heart into the job of preparing a defense against Russia. A man with this outlook would be better equipped to greet an invading Russian army as liberators bringing the New Jerusalem.

Of Shinwell, the best that can be said is that he has an almost identical view. He was a great shouter for the second front to relieve Russia in World War II, once suggested by implication that the Churchill war cabinet harbored "subversive thoughts" about the Soviet ally, and again stated, "The effect of the Russian resistance to Nazi aggression on political thinking in this country is very great." He and Attlee have been agreeable to retaining Strachey, and they have defended him.

How can any American expect British military assistance in a war against Communist aggression when men like this control the political decisions governing the British military establishment? To them Russia is the Socialist fatherland.

United States Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, since American foreign policy is a principal topic of discussion, I believe Members will be interested in reading a historical review and summary of the present United States foreign policy and Stalin's world-conquest program prepared by the Women Investors Research Institute, Inc., which follows:

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY AND STALIN'S WORLD CONQUEST PROGRAM

Ever since Dean Acheson first proposed the Marshall plan in 1947, the people of this country have been led to believe that the objective of our foreign policy is to halt the spread of communism in the world and end the threat of Communist world domination.

Analysis of our present foreign policy—particularly as set forth by Mr. Acheson in his radio talk November 29—reveals that such a policy cannot either halt the spread of communism in the world or end the threat of Communist world domination since, it ignores the very heart of Stalin's program to conquer the world.

Stalin's plan for world conquest is not original. It is a combination of tenth century Russian plans to conquer eastern Europe and Genghis Khan's plan to rule the world.

RUSSIA'S FIRST INVASION OF EUROPE

Russia's tenth century plan called for bringing all of Europe from northernmost Russia to the Mediterranean and east of the Danube under its control. Historical records establish that hordes of Russian pagans flowed down through eastern Europe in a drive to the Mediterranean—slaughtering, raping, conquering all intervening tribes and countries.

The Greeks—seeing their Byzantine Empire threatened by advancing Russian pagan hordes—sought to stem the tide by bringing about a temporary unity of western European countries in an effort to build up military forces of sufficient strength to turn back the Russian advance.

That attempt to unify the forces of western and central Europe against the threat of Russian invasion met with little more success than the present North Atlantic Pact unification plan to halt Russian domination of the same area is presently meeting.

That Russian invasion of western and central Europe finally was halted by the invasion of the Middle East and Russia by Genghis Khan—the Tartar-Mongol "Living Sun"—who also had his plan for world conquest.

CHINA INTERRUPTS GENGHIS KHAN PLAN

Starting from northern Asia—Genghis Khan first conquered Manchuria, then northern China and the plains of western Asia. With this area under his control and using the mass manpower of Asiatic barbarian hordes, he pressed on through southern Asia—conquered the Turks, passed the Caspian Sea by its southern shore and invaded Georgia (birthplace of Stalin) and the Caucasus to the southern steppes of Russia.

His advance was halted there by trouble in China. More than a decade elapsed before he succeeded in liquidating Chinese war lords who believed that China should be ruled by the Chinese. With China once more under his control, the Khan was able to return to his conquest of Russia and the linking of that country to his world empire.

Genghis Khan made Russia a political dependency of Asia. Stalin plans to make Asia a political dependency of Russia. The Khan believed that once the natural resources and mass population of Asia, the Middle East, and Russia were linked together, he would be able to compel the rest of the world to bow to his rule. Stalin evidently entertains the same belief.

The Khan's descendants were unable to keep the Chinese under control and once that control was lost, the encircling chain was broken and the Khan's dream of world rule was ended. But Russia—regaining her freedom from Asiatic rule—did not forsake her dream of ruling all of Europe east of the Danube to the Mediterranean.

STALIN COMPLETES RUSSIA'S EASTERN EUROPEAN PLAN

Russian rulers made innumerable attempts to bring that dream to fulfillment. It remained for Stalin—who believes he is the reincarnation of Genghis Khan—to make the Russian dream an actuality through the Yalta, Tehran, Potsdam agreements. The ailing President Franklin D. Roosevelt—with no known record of objection from his political adviser, Alger Hiss, or his military adviser, Gen. George C. Marshall—gave Stalin, at Yalta and Tehran, practically all of the eastern European countries that Russian rulers had sought to conquer for centuries and President Harry S. Truman later approved the Yalta-Tehran agreements at Potsdam. (For a complete listing of countries given Stalin under the Yalta-Tehran-Potsdam agreements, see our Special Report No. 500, Analysis and Historical Review of the Marshall Plan, released March 24, 1948.)

Czechoslovakia was the only country in the old Russian plan which was withheld from Stalin in those agreements. A glance at a map shows that Czechoslovakia—if it remained outside Stalin's control—could become a corridor through the Carpathian Mountains through which an attacking force could pour into the Ukraine, thereby cutting Stalin off from his all-important Balkan oil supply and all possible chance of linking Russia with Asia. It is not surprising, therefore, that Stalin seized Czechoslovakia when he was ready.

STALIN'S GENGHIS KHAN PLAN

Stalin won more at Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam than fulfillment of the Czar's dreams. He also was given Manchuria, North Korea, and the Kurile Islands—all necessary for the next phase of Stalin's plan for world conquest—the Genghis Khan plan—conquest of Asia, the Middle East, and the linking of Russia with Asia so as to completely encircle the world.

Stalin's next move was a series of diversionary tactics in Europe to divert world attention from Asia. With this accomplished, he began to build a huge munitions plant and arsenal in Siberia—east of the Ural Mountains—protected by his control of Manchuria, North Korea, and the Kurile Islands.

His next move was to organize Red Chinese forces in Manchuria to drive Chiang's Nationalist forces from China. Chiang fought valiantly against Stalin's Red Chinese forces but was forced to flee to Formosa when his supplies from the United States were cut off by Dean Acheson and Gen. George C. Marshall when Chiang refused to accept Mr. Acheson's plan for including Chinese "agrarian" Communists in the Chinese Nationalist Government.

Stalin's control of Asia then was almost complete. It faced two threats. Control of South Korea by non-Communist forces and the occupation of Formosa by the remnants of Chiang's Nationalist army. As long as all of Korea and Formosa remained outside the Soviet control-orbit they constituted loaded pistols pointed at Stalin's planned line of march through Asia and the Middle East, linking them to Russia to complete his world-encirclement plan.

His first move to eliminate these twin threats was to order the invasion of South Korea by North Korean Communists. That plan seemed about to succeed when it was wrecked through the genius of General MacArthur and the courage of American soldiers fighting under the spider-web flag of the United Nations.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY AIDS STALIN?

But again the foreign policy of our State Department apparently saved the day for Stalin. Simultaneously with ordering American troops into combat in Korea, without the consent of Congress although it was in session, Mr. Truman, evidently on the advice of the State Department, ordered the United States Seventh Fleet into the waters of Formosa Strait.

Up to that time Stalin had been compelled to keep a large force of Chinese Communist troops stationed in the Foochow-Canton area opposite Formosa to prevent an invasion of the China mainland by Chiang. The advent of the United States Seventh Fleet in the Formosa Strait changed that situation.

That fleet took up its Formosa Strait position under orders from Mr. Truman to, 1: Prevent an invasion of Formosa from China, and, 2: Prevent an invasion of China from Formosa.

Under that order—it no longer was necessary for Stalin to keep Red Chinese troops in the Foochow-Canton area to prevent Chiang's invasion of the mainland. He was able to move these troops—reliably reported to number about 300,000—from the Foochow-Canton area to Manchuria for special training under Russian officers and for new equipment, including winter clothing.

It is believed that the Red Chinese troops now opposing United States troops in North Korea are those which the advent of the United States Seventh Fleet, under the above-cited order, enabled Stalin to move out of the Foochow-Canton area.

If North Korea is returned to Communist control and Chiang is compelled to remain on Formosa until Stalin is ready—without United States opposition—to invade that island and liquidate Chiang's forces—Stalin then will be ready to continue his march through Asia and the Middle East to complete the link to Russia and his world encirclement program.

With that encirclement completed—and his only real opponent, the United States, bled into bankruptcy and impotency through continued heavy spending and manpower losses—Stalin will then be in a position to compel the entire world to bow to his rule. Genghis Khan—the "living sun"—will have returned once more to power.

Can Stalin's world encirclement plan be halted?

STRATEGY OF FREEDOM

It can—but not through Mr. Acheson's "strategy of freedom" plan.

That plan is designed only to strengthen and develop western Europe and Africa. It not only fails to strike at the heart of Stalin's plan—conquest of Asia—but it gives him Asia as the Yalta-Tehran-Potsdam agreements gave him eastern Europe and Manchuria.

Mr. Acheson declared in his November 29 talk that his plan is "rooted in our traditions." His audience assumed he meant the plan is "rooted" in the traditions of the United States.

Study of that plan reveals it to be "rooted" in the traditions of Cecil Rhodes.

Cecil Rhodes, son of an Anglican preacher, amassed millions by a monopoly of South African gold and diamonds. He left the greater part of his huge fortune for the specific purpose of advancing the British Empire expansion program. Key to that program was the development of the immense wealth of Africa.

According to William Stead—his secretary and official biographer—Rhodes set forth in his will that his money was to be used "to establish a secret society in order to have the whole continent of Africa settled by Britons * * *, in the end that Great Britain is to establish a power so overwhelming that wars must cease and the millennium realized."

Stead relates that Rhodes discussed his plan with Lord Rothschild who replied, "This is all very well if you can get America to join—if not, it amounts to nothing." Whereupon, Mr. Stead relates, Rhodes changed his will, rewriting the phrase "settled by Britons" to read "settled by the English-speaking nations," and then established the Rhodes Scholarships as the secret society which was to aid in carrying forward his plan.

Mr. Acheson's strategy of freedom plan is not new. It is a rewrite of the Rhodes plan with one major change—the United States is to pay the entire cost—in men and money.

Cecil Rhodes dreamed of British Empire—not of Stalin. His plan did not envision the reincarnation of Genghis Khan in Stalin and the revival of the Genghis Khan plan for world control.

While State Department planning indicates a deep knowledge of the Rhodes plan for world control—it also appears to indicate a woeful lack of knowledge of the Genghis Khan plan. Otherwise—why should all State Department planning to end the threat of Communist world control persistently ignore the heart of the Khan plan—control of Asia? Why should all State Department world planning be designed to enable Stalin to take Asia without opposition since conquest of Asia practically assures success of his world-conquest program?

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY BLOCKS CHIANG?

Reliable reports indicate Chiang is ready to strike at the heart of Stalin's plan with an invasion of China. He is reported to have 500,000 men on Formosa ready to invade China—with a fifth column of about 1,000,000 ready for action inside China as soon as he begins that invasion.

He is prevented from carrying out this plan by that portion of Mr. Truman's order to the United States Seventh Fleet which directs it to prevent an invasion of China from Formosa and by immediate lack of needed supplies, plus the assurance that supplies will continue to flow to him—even after Stalin is forced to withdraw his Red Chinese troops from Korea.

It is believed by those who know the situation that if Chiang invades China, Stalin will be compelled to recall his Red Chinese troops from Korea and from Tibet; that he will be compelled to halt his flow of supplies to the Red Chinese in the Indochina area, thereby relieving the United States of the financial and military burden of aiding France in that area.

It would appear that—with Chiang's successful invasion of China—Stalin would be compelled—even as was Genghis Khan—to abandon his world-encirclement program and concentrate his efforts on an attempt to reconquer China.

Victory in China for Chiang could result in a period of peace for the world.

Victory in China for Chiang could result in completion of his world-encirclement program.

Chiang cannot begin his invasion as long as those now in control of the State Department continue to dictate our Far East-Asia-China policy.

CAN ACHESON PROGRAM STOP STALIN?

Since Mr. Acheson's strategy-of-freedom program includes no plan to halt Stalin's march through Asia—can it halt his world-encirclement program with its threat to world peace and individual freedom?

Can Mr. Acheson's failure to include Asia within the sphere of his strategy-of-freedom program be interpreted by Stalin as an indication that the United States is ready to trade off Asia in return for a temporary peace in Western Europe?

Such a trade may be acceptable to Western European countries—particularly to Britain and France. Indications daily are increasing that those two countries oppose any United States aid to Asia—apparently fearing that such aid can only result in a curtailment of the aid now flowing from this country to continue and support their tottering Socialist governments in power.

It should be remembered that socialism—the Red twin of communism—is, as Lenin aptly described it, "the primary stages of communism." In view of this, can such a program as that now advanced by Mr. Acheson halt the spread of communism even in Western Europe since its objective apparently is to make socialism secure in that area of the world?

If Mr. Acheson's strategy-of-freedom program is accepted as the foundation of our foreign policy—will it not only enable Stalin to continue his present program of satellite-troop action throughout the Middle and Far East and finally result in bleeding the United States into bankruptcy—thereby making it an easy prize for Stalin once he has finished his conquest of Asia and completed his Genghis Khan world-encirclement program?

Record Refutes Those Professing Fear of Republican Isolationism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the Press-Telegram of Long Beach, Calif., carries an editorial in its issue of November 20, 1950, entitled "Record Refutes Those Professing Fear of Republican Isolationism."

To all who know the record of the Republican Party in recent years, and its great accomplishments over 90 years, the editorial offers little new information, but the editorial is especially timely now and illuminating for those who may have been influenced by techniques of deceiving propagandists.

I ask unanimous consent for insertion of the editorial in the Appendix of the RECORD, and recommend its reading by seekers of the truth.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

RECORD REFUTES THOSE PROFESSING FEAR OF REPUBLICAN ISOLATIONISM

There is variance in the reaction of foreign diplomats to the results of the recent United States election. Those from the Far East have taken heart. Those from the European Continent indicate fear that the Republican victory will give impetus to isolationism. The latter viewpoint has been stressed in recently printed editorials in France and Britain, and it echoes alarmist allegations from United States sources disappointed at the result of the voting.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Such fears of isolationism are not justified in fact. They spring in part from differences in interpretation of the meaning of the term, in part because the word has been used as an epithet for political purposes, and mainly because the record is too often ignored or distorted.

In refutation of the charge of Republican isolationism, go back to the Eightieth Congress, which was Republican and which has been so harshly criticized by President Truman.

The Eightieth Congress enacted the Marshall Plan legislation and the military aid to Turkey and Greece program. This same Congress enacted the Vandenberg resolution to advance world cooperation and improve the workings of the United Nations.

In the Eighty-first Congress Republican Senator HOMER FERGUSON, of Michigan, a member of the Appropriations Committee, authorized a resolution designed to strengthen the United Nations within its existing framework. Appearing before the Foreign Relations Committee, the Secretary of State testified in favor of the resolution, but the supposedly internationally minded Democratic majority did not pass it.

The administration has set up Republican Senators TAFT, WHERRY, and BRIDGES as the king pins of isolationism. The truth is that the Senators not only favor continued assistance to Europe, but they insist that interest in the Far East is imperative to the strategic defense of this Nation.

TAFT, WHERRY, and BRIDGES are among that considerable group of Republican Senators, not forgetting KNOWLAND and SMITH of New Jersey, who didn't want to kiss China goodby and who did not want to see Formosa taken over by the Communists.

It has taken only a few months to vindicate their judgment, for now the Chinese Communists (once called agrarian reformers by certain State Department friends) are locked in battle with United Nations forces in North Korea.

Last year Senator SMITH and Senator KNOWLAND, after extensive trips to the Far East, spoke out courageously of conditions as they saw them. Senator KNOWLAND has returned this fall for another look and his pronouncements will be interesting. In spite of administration jeers, TAFT'S, SMITH'S, and KNOWLAND'S statements gave the public vital knowledge at a time of danger and contributed resoundingly to the administration's defeat this November.

How many remember the Morgenthau plan which proposed to turn Germany into a completely agricultural state? GOP leaders in the Senate and House of Representatives succeeded in preventing the further dismantling of German industry. The same Republican Members of Congress in a coalition with southern Democrats have insisted that Spain and Western Germany—and all friendly countries willing to combat communism—be given a helping hand in the mutual struggle for survival. Now, what is the meaning of isolationism? Quite evidently it depends upon who is doing the name calling.

Not too long ago, the British Labor Government in an official pronouncement criticized the Schumann plan because it would retard the nationalization of some industries in their own and other countries. Doesn't that seem a little isolationist under some interpretation of the term?

Consider Winston Churchill, Pandit Nehru, and other internationally known leaders. No one calls them isolationists because they propound the views they consider to the best interests of the citizens of their countries. That is quite proper. They speak for their own nations. It should be equally logical to expect our duly elected Representatives to present views and plans for the welfare of the United States. Few people would deny that the United States has been interested in the welfare of the world. However, it is not being materialistic to want American leaders to think of Americans first. That is what GOP leaders expect to continue to do.

They do favor assisting European defense and economic aid within our resources. These same leaders believe that the aid given must be justified by other nations' desire to help in their own defense as well as the common defense of all in a time of peril.

The record doesn't substantiate fears of GOP isolationism. It does indicate that the GOP leadership will insist on careful scrutiny of expenditures and a realistic foreign policy that keeps America strong while discharging its obligations as a member of the world community.

No Deals in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, under date of December 6, the Philadelphia Inquirer published a very able editorial entitled "Save Our Troops: No Deals in Korea, No Appeasement," which I think could be read with very great value by every Senator. I ask unanimous consent that it be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

SAVE OUR TROOPS: NO DEALS IN KOREA, NO APPEASEMENT

No deals. No appeasement. No surrender.

That, in this newspaper's opinion, must be the backbone of American and United Nations policy in handling the crisis in the Far East.

Because of the overwhelming force of the Chinese Communists sent hurtling into Korea, the United Nations troops there have been thrown back with large losses and face military disaster.

Grave decisions must be made quickly on the course we now should adopt.

But there is no reason for panic.

It is no disgrace for 200,000 troops, or less, to be pushed back by 1,000,000. Battles have been lost before and retreats made inevitable. Because we have to give up Pyongyang does not mean we have to give up also everything the United States and the United Nations have stood for in Korea.

It may be necessary to withdraw our forces from Korea before the Chinese by sheer weight of numbers shove them into the sea. But there is no reason for them to retreat on their knees. They have fought valiantly and well; if they are to be evacuated, they can regroup elsewhere as part of the mightier military organization that events and the Communist menace compel us to construct.

Britain was not dishonored at Dunkerque, nor America at Bataan. Because they vowed, in both instances, to return. They did not hand France or the Philippines irretrievably to the enemy. They gave ground only to come back.

The dishonor was at Munich, where groveling statesmen sought to buy peace from Hitler by selling out an ally, and where the evils of appeasement were made so plain that no man should ever forget them.

There would be dishonor and futility in seeking now to repair the Korean crisis with a patched-up program of appeasing Communist China and her back-room puppeteer, Soviet Russia.

The possibility has been discussed of prevailing upon Mao Tze-tung to order a cease fire in Korea and to halt the Chinese advance at the thirty-eighth parallel or some other line while dickering continues over the future of the Far East.

In return for such an agreement, it is suggested, the United States would remove the Seventh Fleet as the protecting screen for Formosa and leave the Chinese Nationalist forces on that inland to the tender mercies of the Communists, and the Mao regime would be voted into the United Nations.

Should the United States and the UN allow itself to be blackmailed into a deal like this, nothing but catastrophe could follow. No advantage would be gained in Korea, because even if Mao would halt his advance temporarily to grasp other concessions, he would take over the whole of Korea at his leisure.

The Communists did not respect the thirty-eighth parallel before: Their advance beyond that line is what set off the war. They proved that they want all Korea as part of their over-all plan of conquest, and no appeasement gesture at this time will change their minds. Blackmailers and gangsters never stay bought.

Given right-of-way in Formosa, the Communists would not only destroy the last organized Chinese resistance to their power, but they would take over a base that is one of the most important points in America's defense chain in the Pacific.

They would be in perfect position to swallow Indochina, kick the British out of Hong Kong and walk into Thailand and Malaya. Appeasement now would strengthen them for later on, with violent repercussions across half the world in Europe, where Russia, its Asiatic enterprises made secure by the Chinese puppets, could proceed to further conquests either by force or by deals, in the well-known Hitler pattern.

We did not give up when half our fleet lay on the bottom at Pearl Harbor. There is no reason to give up because of a military set-back by overwhelming numbers in North Korea. One defeat does not mean that we should abandon the UN commitment to protect the Korean people from Communist aggression, and write off the graves of our dead who fell to make that commitment good.

Fall back if we must, evacuate the Korean battlefields to keep our remaining troops out of the Chinese meat grinder, but let it be another Dunkerque, not another Munich.

No concessions to the Communists, no agreements with an enemy who will never keep his pledge, no surrender. If we quit Korea, let us leave with honor—until the day we can return.

National Maturity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, the word "isolationist" is frequently applied as a term of reproach to critics of our foreign policy by those who apologize for it. They seem to regard this as a retort courteous which completely disposes of any statement that might otherwise prove difficult to answer.

For those who have resorted to this evasion, there may be food for thought in a letter written by John Hanna, a distinguished professor in the law school of Columbia University. It was published in the New York Herald Tribune under date of November 18, 1950, and entitled "National Maturity."

I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL MATURITY

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

Isolationist ranks high as a question-begging epithet. What should induce reflection is the number of persons who are often so tagged although they have an obvious and high competence in world affairs. When such persons question American foreign commitments, it is not because they believe the oceans and distance are adequate protection from enemies, or that the United States should be defenseless against aggressors. What they ask is that American policy be defined in terms of American interests, which, considering American purposes and practices, do coincide with the best future of that part of the world which is dedicated to freedom.

The historic American policy as enunciated first by Washington is that the United States should not become a party to foreign quarrels and rivalry. That does not mean our interests may not be global or that to maintain these interests we need no allies. What it means is that we should accept associates on the basis of our own needs and not mix on either side of age-old conflicts. The record of both world wars shows the disasters that can come to the United States from abandoning our historic principles. Unrealistic sentimentality characterized us in both wars. Our people were moved by foreign and our own propaganda to grotesque error regarding both our allies and our enemies. This bleacher mentality dissipated our wealth and power to ends as harmful to the people of our allies as to ourselves and our enemies. Wilson's tragedy was that understanding much of this truth, he yielded to the very waves of sentiment he had deplored. Roosevelt's tragedy is that he ignored every aspect of Wilson's statesmanship and duplicated all America's blunders of a generation earlier.

The historic fact is that from 1917 to 1941 practically no major participation of the United States in world affairs benefited either ourselves or the rest of the world. Since 1941 the bad features of our policy have largely canceled the praiseworthy aspects. The principles of Washington are as valid today as when the Republic began. A return to these principles is not isolationism. It is a mark of national maturity.

JOHN HANNA.

The New Problem in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAY J. MADDEN

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, when the Korean trouble started, no one, including our military, thought that the Communistic hordes of Red China would eventually close in to attack on the Korean peninsula. We are faced with that situation now.

H. B. Snyder, editor of the Gary Post-Tribune in Gary, Ind., outlined some real common sense regarding our oriental problem:

THE NEW PROBLEM IN KOREA

The attack of the Red Chinese has changed the whole character of the war in Korea and forces this country and the UN to adopt a new policy. The first problem is the survival of our Army. With a million Chinese soldiers attacking 175,000 Americans and supporting allies, a new line must be established which can be maintained against the hordes thrown against our men.

The problem is a new one for us but it is not a new one in war. The Germans had to face it in Russia when their armies were submerged by oceans of Communists who kept coming no matter how many were killed. The establishment of a well-planned defense line in depth can probably do the job, but we may not have time to plan and construct it properly. Therein lies the danger, for a soldier can kill only a limited number. Eventually his gun becomes too hot to handle or jams and he is overrun.

Nevertheless there may be ways out of the difficulties facing us and now that we know what the problems are, it is a fair supposition the Red hordes will be stopped somewhere. After that has been done we shall probably have to make a deal with the Red Chinese. Whatever the deal is called, it will be appeasement, but it will be necessary if we do not want to fight a war with China—and we do not.

It has been assumed until this attack that Communist China would not do what she has done. It was believed that Mao would not be the tool of Russia but would act in China's interest. But Mao may think he is acting in China's interest. Who knows what goes on in a Communist's mind?

Well, someone should have known. There are probably more Americans who have lived in China and know the Chinese intimately than any other people. They should have been able to predict China's course. But we don't use such resources. We just blunder along and take what comes. This time the cost of blundering will be very high. Indeed, there is no certainty it will not be complete disaster.

Saving the Army is a military job, and MacArthur should be given a free hand. But if that job is accomplished, we still will have to bring some completion to the Korean adventure unless enough new military forces can be rounded up to drive out the Chinese. Indeed, the Chinese angle has been the weakness of the adventure. Had we united Korea, it would still have been necessary to make an accommodation with China.

From the start we should have realized that some agreement with China would be required under any circumstances. That is, we should have required an agreement. China would not. She could have waited until we withdrew and then have sent in her armies as she has now.

So when we talk about an end of the adventure we mean an agreement with China. But China has said the only agreement she wants is for us to get out. Possibly we can do better than that; but unless we intend to fight and defeat China, we shall undoubtedly have to appease her. It is better to face this fact than to go on talking about saving our honor.

The fact is, we face a terrific defeat which can only be prevented by a very large increase in our military power in Korea. But no such power is available. We don't have it, and if we did we might not be able to transport it to Korea in time to be effective. Therefore, it is no time to talk platitudes nor to discuss impossibilities.

Never at any time was there any contemplation of having to defeat a million Chinese in addition to the 300,000 North Koreans. We haven't the power, unless it is in the atom bomb. Unfortunately, military men do not seem sanguine about using the bomb in the Korean terrain.

The Gravity of the Korean Dispute

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Let's End Korean Dispute Before the Entire World Is Aflame With Terrible War," written by Fred C. Christopherson, and published in the Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Daily Argus-Leader of December 5, 1950. The editorial deals with our foreign policy. The Daily Argus-Leader is the largest newspaper published in the tri-State area of the Midwest.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

LET'S END KOREAN DISPUTE BEFORE THE ENTIRE WORLD IS AFLAME WITH TERRIBLE WAR

(By Fred C. Christopherson)

The powers that be in Washington are engaged in fateful conferences this week—conferences that will influence the history of the world and the destiny of mankind.

These conferences are being held at a tragic time in history. Never before, in truth, has the United States faced a crisis so grave. Our future is at stake. The way ahead may be just a long road of blood, sweat and tears—a road so long that no person now alive will reach its end. But that need not necessarily be the road we take. Whether we do or not depends upon the courage, the wisdom and the common sense displayed in Washington.

THE PEOPLE UNDERSTAND

Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH, of Maine, said over the week end that the American people do not appreciate the gravity of the situation.

Whom does she think she's kidding? The American people understand it very well, indeed. It seems they have a better appreciation of it than those who are in charge in Washington.

President Truman took time off Saturday to attend a football game in Philadelphia. It was, no doubt, a pleasant and a thrilling outing. But he shouldn't have been in Philadelphia Saturday. He should have been in Washington with the day devoted to conferences with the Department of State, with leading Members of Congress, with able thinkers in and out of the Government, with our UN representatives and perhaps informally with men from the British, French and other embassies.

To assume that the President knows all there is to know about the foreign situation is an extraordinary assumption. Of course he doesn't. And he should have been spending all of the week end, not just a part of it, in preparation for the momentous conferences now under way.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

When Senator SMITH says that the people don't realize the mess that exists, she is firing in the wrong direction. Obviously there are men in Washington who don't comprehend it.

WHERE WE ARE

The big question still is: Where do we go from here? To obtain an answer, let's first understand where we are.

The position in which we have been placed and the route that we are now following, in the opinion of the Wall Street Journal, is "an endless road."

Hanson W. Baldwin, distinguished military critic of the New York Times, says: "Today we are involved in precisely the type of war which we can never win, a land struggle on the Asiatic continent in a theater where no decision is possible against the hordes of Asia. * * * We must face the situation as it is today and try to devise a strategy that will extricate us from our present completely untenable position."

Alan C. McIntosh, thoughtful editor of the Luverne, Minn., Star-Herald, discusses a recent sneering reference by Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, to "isolationism" and the attitude of those who wish to reexamine his policies.

"There is a distrust of Acheson in the Midwest," says Editor McIntosh, "that is hard to describe—it reaches a point where it becomes a nausea of fear that something is terribly wrong. A reexamination of American foreign policy is overdue. When a man has a record of as many wrong guesses as the Secretary of State, it does not behoove him to rebuke those who question the course he charts for the ship of state."

This attitude of the Midwest, McIntosh explains, is one of realism and not isolationism.

TODAY'S REALITY

And now what is realism in respect to our world situation? Today the United States stands virtually alone in Korea, fighting a potential army of millions of Asiatics close to their home base. We must transport our men and our supplies across 8,000 miles of water. The Asiatic leaders consider their manpower expendable and will not hesitate to sacrifice the lives of a million soldiers or 2,000,000 soldiers, if need be, to stop us.

Perhaps we can lick China and Russia, too, on their home ground. Military Expert Baldwin, however, says it is a type of war we can't win.

Technically today we are not engaged in an all-out war with China, and, it seems, we should not and must not take a step that would precipitate such a war. If we drop the atomic bomb in Manchuria or in China, we will be at war with China. If we enlist the services of Chiang's army, we will be at war with China. If we make a thrust directly at Moscow, we will, of course, be at war with both China and Russia.

TWO ROADS AHEAD

And let's not deceive ourselves into believing that a game of bluff will produce results. We are dealing with wily Orientals and they are not easily fooled.

In respect to "where do we go from here," this question arises: What are the alternatives?

Along one road—the road we are now following—lies war and destruction. It points the way to a world aflame with no end in sight insofar as today's vision can see. Even if we should defeat China and Russia, what would we do then? What would we have accomplished? We would have acquired and developed hatred on a global scale and we ourselves would be on the brink of collapse.

That road is not a pleasant one.

The other road is the road of realism. It is a path based upon a program of getting out of Korea with as much grace as we can and as little loss of life as possible. If a buffer state would be the answer, let's agree to it.

When a smart man learns that he has started out on the wrong road, he changes his route. Nations, it seems, should be equally smart and ready to revise their programs as the circumstances suggest.

We can battle it out to the bitter end in Korea, of course. But, as and if we prepare to do so, let cold realism tell us what such a program means—a world-wide war, death, devastation, suffering, and utter despair. The sensible course is to get out of Korea as quickly and as satisfactorily as we can.

We Cannot Support or Fight the Whole World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Let's Quit Playing Atlas," which appeared in the Topeka State Journal, Topeka, Kans., December 1, 1950. The Topeka State Journal is one of the leading newspapers of the State of Kansas. I believe this editorial is a true appraisal of our position today in the world and that the writer has placed his hand on the pulse of the times and reflects the present thinking of many folks of the great Middle West.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

LET'S QUIT PLAYING ATLAS

It is hard to see how anything could be more wildly insane than to allow this Nation to be sicked or sucked into a war nobody wants, a war we are not ready to fight if we did want it, and a war we might have to fight alone if we were ready.

We can neither support nor fight the whole world. We ought to get that through our grandiose heads. The Government at Washington ought to realize it. Sadly, and it may be tragically, there are few signs that the Government, if Mr. Truman personifies it, realizes anything of the kind. The President's 500-word prepared statement and his reckless press conference on the Korean situation showed that much.

Harry Truman, however well he must have meant, went off half-cocked in a cock-eyed crisis. He allowed himself, at a terribly serious moment when the entire globe would be hanging on his every syllable and inflection, to be jockeyed into one of his typically hasty, half-thought-through-sound-offs. He has this Nation threatening now with the atom bomb, against a fanatic creed that would like nothing better than to rally the rest of the world against us for doing just that. And how easy it would be to rally that world, already sullen and resentful about America and America's master-race airs.

This Nation of 150,000,000 people simply cannot police the whole world. It cannot underwrite and guarantee the freedom of all peoples. Already governments ruling 800,000,000 persons—a third of the world—are marshalled against us. Other hundreds of millions as in India are sitting ducks for the same fanatic false promises that gained the first 600,000,000. And we do not even know who our friends are. We have no real assurances that the war-weary, war-whipped populations of Europe would follow us through a holy crusade. Only a few of them extended or were able to extend even token support of our trial crusade in Korea.

The American Government has gotten out too far. Our leaders should promise only, henceforth, what we can do and deliver without gutting ourselves. A great many people in this country have come to feel that, no matter how right we may be, or righteously indignant, we should consider a gradual withdrawal as gracefully as possible from Asia, where our presence is misunderstood, and try to live our lives in a fortress America. The crisis in progress is unmaking sincere internationalists and creating just as sincere isolationists by the minute, to use those unfortunate labels. The world has shrunk, to be sure, and we would not wish to retire to a fortress America, preferring to mingle in a friendly way with all; but if that is what we are forced to do to survive, that is what we are forced to do. Political isolation is a reluctant choice, but it is far preferable to overinvolvement leading to the horrors of war.

The A-bomb should not be used, is our opinion. We should save it for self-defense only, and keep our hands clean before the judgment seat of history and the Divine Intelligence. Let the Chinese Nationalists—they still want to send troops to fight the Chinese Reds—take over in Korea, if they will, or let us help them to open guerrilla hostilities on the mainland. Then let us bring our men home and gird to the defense—the fight to the death if necessary—of our own homes and our own freedom. We have tried hard, our very best, to live in good will and on terms of good faith with the world. It can't be done at this stage of humanity's evolution. War would not solve anything; war would not stop communism, which, anyway, like any tryanny, contains the seeds of its own eventual self-destruction.

Let's face the ugly truth about the world and about ourselves, and then let's act on it as a united people, unafraid and unbeholden to anything but the right as we see it. Let's keep one island of liberty in a hate-diseased world. This is difficult but not impossible, and certainly it is not foolhardy. America should quit playing Atlas.

"We Are Not at War; the Action We Have Taken Is Police Action," Said President Truman in June About the Korean War—The Korean War Has Become One of the Most Bloody in the History of the United States According to the Defense Department

OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, like an ostrich with his head stuck in sand, like a small boy whistling when he hurries past a cemetery at night, President Truman told the American people on June 30 that the Korean affair was nothing more than police action. He was so dead wrong. Just as wrong as when he said the United States Marine Corps was nothing more than the police force of the Navy.

The Korean War, according to the latest report of the Defense Department, has become one of the most bloody in the history of the United States. More American men have died and more have suffered casualties than in the Revolutionary War, the Mexican War, the Spanish-American War, and the War of 1812.

Up to Friday, November 24, American casualties in Korea were 29,996 with 4,993 dead, and 4,439 missing in action, and this was before the disastrous attack upon our Armed Forces by Red China. If this is police action then the Revolutionary War, the Mexican War, the Spanish-American campaign, and the War of 1812 were just a slap on the wrist.

Somebody must be wrong, and it looks as usual to be none other than President Truman. This Nation cannot long afford such faulty judgment from the Chief Executive.

The following is a report of the suffering, privation, and desperation of the United States Marines at Hageru, North Korea, by war correspondent Jim G. Lucas:

BUCKY DIED 5 MINUTES AFTER WE LEFT HAGERU

(By Jim G. Lucas)

WITH THE MARINES AT HAGERU, NORTH KOREA, December 6.—The kid corporal from New Boston, Tex., wanted to talk. It wasn't easy because he had been hit in the face with a mortar shell.

"Whenever a wounded man froze to death," he said, "we left him along the road. We couldn't carry our dead. All the trucks were filled with food, ammunition, and wounded.

"It was tough. Everybody in an outfit this size knows everybody else. But we had to do it. That way we made room for more wounded guys who had been trying to walk it.

"I really can't tell you, Mister, how many got killed. Most of us, I imagine."

But the kid said he was lucky. He is going out. The plane was taking off in a few minutes. Others would have to walk it—22 miles to Yonpo.

"There's never been anything like it, Mister," he said. "I'm not complaining. In the Marines the big brass like General (O. P.) Smith will walk right along with you and the Commies would rather shoot generals than anyone else.

"Anything's better than staying here. But we ain't fooling ourselves. Those that get out alive will be lucky. Me, I've had mine.

"All I've got to worry about is this face that'll scare girls from Dennison to Galveston. Them other guys will be lucky if they ever see a girl again."

The corporal was in one of the two Marine regiments that fought their way out of Yudamni. The last of them got to Hageru last night. It's taken 48 hours for them to travel 17 miles. Every mile has been hell. Every mile has been massacre.

I had talked to the kid's commanding officer a few minutes before. I'd known him around Inchon and Seoul—a tall, good-looking youngster with a bright future. No one doubted he'd be a general some day. He is now on the verge of a crack-up. He couldn't remember dates or names. Three times he broke down and cried.

Yudamni is a hamlet along the west bank of the Chosin Reservoir. The Fifth and Seventh Marine Regiments were sent there on November 27. They'd been hit by overwhelming Communist forces as soon as they arrived.

One company was surrounded for 5 days by elements of at least three Chinese divisions. A handful of survivors staggered back to Hageru last night.

"They hit us before we even had time to dig in," said a sergeant with a bleeding face wound. "That first night we fought from 11 until 6:30 the next morning. We killed a hell of a lot of them, but they kept coming."

"We burned everything we couldn't take along," said a marine combat correspondent from Decatur, Ill. "Our tents, packs, and food. We kept our rifles and tried to get out with our artillery and tanks. Some slid into ditches and we'd stop to destroy them.

"They killed 18 of us first, 200 yards out of Yudamni. God, it was awful. They were on all sides and as fast as we moved a mile they closed in behind. And that wasn't the worst of it. There must have been two whole divisions ahead of us trying to keep us from getting out. We had to fight them ahead, from both sides, and the rear.

"There was no point in hitting the ditches. The Communists had mined them. There were hills on both sides of that little road and they had mortars, machine guns, and rifles every inch.

"The guys at Hageru sent a helicopter for our wounded but the Gooks got it. Damned thing burned a hundred yards from me and the pilot burned with it. I saw my best friend get his. He was wounded too bad to jump from the truck, so when he stood up they shot him in the head. We laid him out in the snow and put another guy on his litter."

We were ready to get airborne and the Air Force captain warned the takeoff would be rough.

The kid from New Boston mumbled through bandages: "Ever ride a six-by-six (combat truck) with a mashed-up face?" he asked. "I did—48 hours of it with Gook mortars landing everywhere. And they tell me this'll be rough."

We were airborne now. "Peg o' My Heart," the good old C–47 which had flown coal to Berlin, suddenly rocked. Up in the cockpit Capt. Harry C. Aderholt, of Birmingham, Ala., swore.

"Gooks just tried to lay a mortar in on us," he said. "It hit just under the left wing."

Back in the ship the kids were settling down. Even the mortar hadn't scared them.

"What the hell is another mortar?" a marine from Henderson, N. C., asked bitterly. "That's all we've seen in the last week."

Fifteen minutes later "Peg o' My Heart" let down at Yonpo. The kid from New Boston had found another Texan—from Livingston. They were already planning liberty in Dallas and Fort Worth.

But a big Negro corporal from Ashland, Va., was worried. "What's the matter, Bucky?" he asked one of the guys at his side. He added: "The kid ain't spoke once."

Bucky would never speak again. He died 5 minutes after we left Hageru.

Federal Court Finds Jenkins Act Constitutional

OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, on October 19, 1949, Congress passed a bill known as the Jenkins cigarette tax bill. This is Public Law 363 of the Eighty-first Congress.

Up to that time quite a number of persons and companies were shipping cigarettes into States which had a State cigarette tax law and they were shipping them in such a manner as to evade the State tax law. As a result many States have lost many thousands of dollars that they would otherwise have received. These shippers were, in effect, bootlegging their product so as to evade the State tax. This bootlegging business was carried into many of the States with the result that approximately $30,000,000 annually was diverted from the States. The State of Ohio was losing about $750,000 a year; New York and Pennsylvania were losing more than a million dollars a year. Other States were losing proportionately. Ohio has a 2-cents-per-pack tax while Oklahoma and Louisiana have a much larger tax. The Jenkins bill was drawn to prevent this unfair practice. As a direct result of this Jenkins Act, Ohio's treasury has already been increased by at least a half a million dollars.

This evasion was effected in much the same way by all these shippers. The State laws provide that a tax stamp must be placed on each pack of cigarettes by the seller and there is a penalty for failure to affix this stamp. In some States there is a penalty for a person to have in his possession a pack of cigarettes upon which the State tax stamp has not been affixed. Most of the big mail-order shippers, such as Sears, Roebuck, cooperated with the States and would arrange with the State tax officials to pay the State tax on all their shipments into the State. These bootleggers sometimes openly solicited sales through newspaper advertisements. Many of them had salesmen who quietly solicited sales in factories and other places where a number of men would be employed. They would have large shipments made to themselves, frequently, for distribution among their customers. In many cities the post office would, at times, be full of cigarette shipments, all to be distributed without payment of the tax. This became a disgraceful racket. The Jenkins Act, if enforced, will end this dishonest practice.

The Jenkins Act requires that any person selling or disposing of cigarettes in interstate commerce, whereby the cigarettes are shipped to other than a distributor licensed by or located in a State taxing the sale or use of cigarettes, shall each month forward to the tobacco tax administrator of the State into which such shipment is made certain information, including the name and address of the person to whom the shipment was made and the brand and the quality of the cigarettes shipped. Violation of the act is a misdemeanor punishable by fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment of not more than 6 months, or both.

When this law was passed, most of these bootleggers went out of business for they appreciated that their business was a dishonest business and very unfair to the thousands of tobacco stores that were complying with the law and selling no cigarettes except those upon which the lawful tax was paid. A few, however, hated to give up their lucrative business and proceeded to defy the law.

As a result of this defiance the respective State tax authorities proceeded to enforce the law. It then became a contest between the law and the law breakers.

Finally the matter got into the United States court on an action brought to test the constitutionality of the act. The attorneys in the case were the same who argued the case before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate. The style of this case is United States District Court for the District of Columbia, Consumer Mail Order Association of America, et al., plaintiffs, against J. Howard McGrath, individually and as Attorney General of the United States, defendant; civil action No. 1560–50.

This case was decided by the United States Court on November 30, 1950. It was tried by a three-judge court and the decision was unanimous. The judges were Circuit Judge Fahy and District Judges McLaughlin and Matthews.

In its opinion, written by Circuit Judge Fahy, the court says:

The plaintiff, Consumer Mail Order Association of America, is in the nature of a trade association to which the other plaintiffs belong. The latter allege that they are engaged exclusively in the business of selling cigarettes in interstate commerce. They sue J. Howard McGrath, individually and as Attorney General of the United States, for a declaratory judgment that the act of Congress of October 19, 1949, known as the Jenkins Act, is unconstitutional and for an injunction against its enforcement.

The court goes extensively into all of the spurious arguments made by Counsel Thurman Arnold which are the same arguments made by him before the Finance Committee of the Senate. The court rejects all of the arguments made by Mr. Arnold and his associates and supports completely the arguments made by me before the Senate Finance Committee.

The following are a few quotations from the written opinion rendered by these three Federal court judges:

We find no constitutional infirmity in the Jenkins Act. By its terms it applies to "Any person selling or disposing of cigarettes in interstate commerce whereby such cigarettes are shipped to other than a distributor licensed by or located in a State taxing the sale or use of cigarettes."

The act being constitutional, equitable relief by injunction must be denied in any event. But we think it is within our discretion under the Declaratory Judgment Act to decide the constitutional question, as was done in United Public Workers et al. v. Mitchell (330 U. S. at pp. 93–94).

Some of these plaintiffs, believing the act to be unconstitutional, are violating it, while others, fearful of the consequence of violation, are restricting their operations, regulated by the act, until the issue of constitutionality is settled.

The use of the commerce power to aid the several States in this manner is valid.

The fact that it (Congress) has adopted its rules in order to aid the enforcement of valid State laws affords no ground for constitutional objection.

The complaint seeks a declaration that the statute is unconstitutional without regard to its particular application to a particular State. We need not, in this general attack upon the act, go further than to point out that State policy in this area of taxation may validly be the basis for Federal regulation of interstate sales or shipments.

While it is beyond dispute that the exercise of the commerce power by Congress is subject to the requirements of the fifth amendment—Currin v. Wallace (306 U. S. 1, 14); those requirements are generally satisfied where the means of the regulation of commerce are appropriate to a permissible end.

Even if the prohibition imposed in the exercise of the commerce power results in the destruction of property rights * * * there is no deprivation in violation of the due procers clause of the fifth amendment unless the regulation imposed is unreasonable. Wallace v. Hudson-Ducan & Co. (98 F. 2d 985, 991). Here, the Jenkins Act does not require the full disclosure of the plaintiff's customer list to anyone. The taxing authorities of each State receive only the names of those customers who are residing within the State's borders. There is no showing that plaintiffs will be harmed by the disclosure of these segmental lists to competitors. In these circumstances it cannot be said that the requirement is unreasonable or inappropriate to the permissible end of Congress to prevent the use of the facilities of interstate commerce in evading or violating State laws. The right of a mail-order concern operating in interstate commerce to maintain the absolute secrecy of its customer list is subject to the right of Congress, in the exercise of its commerce power, to require the partial disclosure of that list to State authorities.

In Utah Fuel Co. v. Coal Comm'n (306 U. S. 56), the Supreme Court sustained the power of Congress to go even further in the exercise of its commerce power by requiring the submission of detailed business information and by authorizing its disclosure to a group among whom were competitors of the informant.

Congress may prescribe the "rule by which commerce is to be governed," Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat, 1, 196). The breadth of the power has been frequently expounded by the Supreme Court in recent years.

Finally, as to the contention that the act forces a resident of one State to submit to the jurisdiction of a second State, it is the power of Congress, not of any State, which requires the information to be submitted. The act imposes a condition upon the use of the facilities of interstate commerce, and neither obedience nor violation of that condition subjects the plaintiffs to the authority of any State.

This is the final paragraph of the court's written opinion:

For the reasons stated with respect to the several plaintiffs, judgment is granted for the defendant, and the complaint accordingly is dismissed.

This means that the United States court finds the Jenkins Act to be constitutional in every respect and that the case brought by these cigarette bootleggers should be dismissed.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the United States court has sustained the constitutionality of the Jenkins Act. This law will put an end to a very unfair and dishonest business practice and will protect honest business against dishonest business. It will also transfer about $30,000,000 per year from dishonest channels into the State treasuries where it can be used for schools and roads and many other worthy projects which the States must finance.

Medical Profession Takes Initiative Providing Private Funds for Medical Schools

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OREN HARRIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago at a meeting of the house of delegates of the American Medical Association, its president, Dr. Elmer L. Henderson, issued a challenge to the medical profession to take the initiative in raising private financing and assistance for certain medical schools, rather than seeking Federal subsidies. In response to this challenge, the American Medical Association appropriated $500,000 as a nucleus of a fund to be raised for such aid of schools throughout the Nation.

There is constant agitation that the Federal Treasury be opened up and all medical schools subsidized, whether they are State-supported or privately endowed. It is obvious that such contention is motivated by the fact that some schools are in need of some kind of assistance. This is an issue which must be met and will be met by the American people.

The medical profession is to be commended for taking the initiative in this cause. This is no token but a real and progressive step toward meeting this need. With the American Medical Association actively behind this movement and providing this amount of money as a nucleus of an adequate fund to be raised, I am confident that it will be a success.

The board of directors of the American Medical Association voted unanimously to make this contribution and place the association behind this movement. Dr. Louis H. Bauer, chairman of the board, issued a statement to the association's house of delegates and a release of the action taken, which, I believe, deserves the attention of the House membership and the people of this country. Because of its importance and the importance of this problem, I include the statement in the RECORD:

CLEVELAND, December 6, 1950.—The board of trustees of the American Medical Association is pleased to announce to the house of delegates that it has appropriated a half million dollars out of its national education campaign fund, which was raised to defend medical freedom, for the aid and support of medical schools which are in need of additional financing.

This fund will be given to the medical schools for their unrestricted use in their basic training of future physicians.

This appropriation to aid the medical schools has been made possible by the widespread public cooperation which the profession has received from the American people in its campaign against compulsory health insurance. The fight against socialized medicine must go on until this issue has been clearly and finally resolved, but the pressure for regimentation of the medical profession has greatly lessened, due to the magnificent public support which we have received.

The board of trustees, therefore, feels that it is keeping faith with the American people, who have given medicine such a splendid vote of confidence, when it contributes this amount to the medical schools of the Nation.

There is a growing public awareness that Federal subsidy has come to be a burden, not a bounty, for it is bringing intolerable increases in taxation, and is dangerously increasing Federal controls over our institutions and the lives of our people.

American medicine feels very strongly that it should not seek Federal aid for medical schools, until all other means of financing have been exhausted. The board of trustees announced yesterday its belief that funds for this purpose could be obtained from private sources—and as practical evidence of our sincerity of purpose, this appropriation has been made as the nucleus of a fund which we hope will be greatly augmented by contributions from many other sources.

The board hopes that this action will become a stimulus to other professions, industries, businesses, labor groups, and private donors to contribute to this very important cause of protecting and advancing the interests of medical education and the public health.

The American Medical Association urges all its members to contribute individually to this cause, and we hope that doctors will take the lead in securing contributions from other sources.

Furthermore, the American Medical Association invites attention to the fact that it has been spending about a quarter of a million dollars a year for many years past to advance medical education through its Council on Medical Education and Hospitals and other departments. This appropriation, voted today, for an entire new purpose, is in addition to nearly $285,000 already budgeted for this work during 1951.

The Nation's medical schools are of the greatest importance to every American citizen and the AMA has had the advancement of their standards as one of its main objectives for over 100 years. The board of trustees feels that if all other organizations and individuals will render support of this worthy cause in accordance with their financial ability that not only will the financial security of medical schools be assured, but that their freedom will be protected.

You Can't Do Business With the Soviet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALT HORAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD. I am pleased to enclose an editorial by a brilliant writer of my district. I feel that it is timely to give some of the background of Mr. Fred C. Koch, who wrote the editorial which I am including with these remarks.

Mr. Koch was born in Russia. He was born in a community that had been established by Catherine the Great of Russia. In the nineteenth century she had persuaded many people of German descent to colonize in the fertile valleys of the Volga River. Mr. Koch's forebears were among those who traveled from Germany to settle in Russia. They were promised many things, among them the privilege of maintaining their own language, their own schools, their own churches, and they were also promised that they would not have to serve in the military forces of Russia. Toward the end of the nineteenth century this latter promise was infringed upon and members of these Colonies were pressed into Russian military service. Because of this and other reasons these good peope looked to America and many of them came to settle in eastern Washington. They have become great citizens. They have an understanding of world affairs, not exceeded by any other Americans. They appreciate the full meaning of American liberties. Because of this background, Mr. Koch's writings carry a fuller meaning. During the war and immediately following it Mr. Koch served in the Office of War Information. For a considerable time he was attached at Berlin and helped in the reestablishment of the German press. It was during this service in Berlin that the event occurred upon which he bases the following editorial:

For the past 2 days there has been a ringing in my ears.

It rises to a crescendo every time I read the headlines from Korea and hear the latest news flashes about this mess into which our supposedly astute foreign-policy experts have blundered, pushing before them the torn bodies of thousands of fine American boys who should be at home finishing their school years.

This ringing is not really a ringing. It's more like a voice, faint, distant, ominous, prophetic.

It's the voice of a schoolboy, a university boy, a young chap about 19 in whose home I sat one Sunday afternoon in December of 1945. He had been in the Army only a few months before this time, but now he was back in school, at Heidelberg University, Germany.

I can't recall this boy's name offhand. I'd have to look it up. But it isn't important. Meanwhile I'll just call him Helmut.

Helmut, as I said, had only recently been in the army, the German Army. For a 19-year-old, I found him possessed of an amazing political consciousness and social understanding.

The purpose of my visit with Helmut, who was as strange to me as Joe Stalin's sleigh driver, has nothing to do with this story, but it was out of the story that this schoolboy's words struck me with a force I have not been able to forget in these past 5 years, these words that ring in my ears now every time I hear and read the news of gaping holes in American lines in Korea.

Helmut said:

"You have destroyed us, but you have not yet won the war. You have not destroyed communism, the enemy that is poised to destroy you."

The war that destroyed Helmut's army was won finally by the might and weight of American production. Yes; by American production of planes, ships, tanks, guns. It was won, too, by military strategy—and with the blood of American boys.

But this new war—this war against communism—is something else again. We've lost more of this war since VE-day through bungiers, dupes, internationalists, illusionists, and traitors in and connected with our Government than we have lost in Korea.

For this new war is one that has been waged by the Kremlin long before Helmut's army was destroyed, and it has been waged with an oriental cunning that, with the help of the Alger Hisses, made dupes of our delegations at Tehran, Yalta, Potsdam, Moscow, and wherever else we sat down with the Russians to plan a future world of peace.

Our military strategists are one thing; our political strategists are something else again.

They have steered the country into a mess out of which even the military strategists may not get it without a price too fearful and awful to contemplate.

Our fumbling State Department has lost move after move in the international game with the Kremlin, and by now they have committed America's resources and manpower to a prospect that portends a global struggle which could bleed the country white before the Red army of the Soviet even makes its first strike.

This course to doom was laid partly through stupidity, partly through fantastic idealism, partly through sincere but erroneous motives—and in a large measure through the infiltration of so-called red herrings into high places of Government where they influenced vital decisions and stole information and plans that have already been of valuable assistance to the grand Red scheme.

Helmut was not the only schoolboy back in December 1945 who believed that the war was not over—and that very shortly we would have to fight for our lives against communism.

There were thousands of American 19-year-olds who knew that too. How they knew it, I don't know. Perhaps they were not yet so encumbered with intellectual weight as to have their common sense blunted—a condition that seems to throw our experts off the track time and time again.

It took only the average brand of American horse sense to see what Helmut saw and what so many of our boys saw. But up there in those high places they had their heads in the clouds, apparently. They had their heads in the clouds while Stalin had his feet planted firmly on the ground.

Right now our politicians are haggling around the United Nations Security Council table with a bunch who so far have demonstrated their chief interest in the UN to be what they can get out of the American taxpayers' pockets. Certainly a very few have shown anything but token assistance in a war that is purportedly a United Nations war against aggression.

Meanwhile our military leaders, who will have the sole responsibility for saving this Nation from doom, are hamstrung by words, bickering, indecision, and delay foisted upon us by these international panhandlers.

American boys are dying in Korea. Let Americans decide—at once—how best to save them. Tell the delegates from Afghanistan, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Iraq, Egypt, Siam, Yemen, and all the other countries that have nothing to offer in this fight against Communist aggression except their hands stretched out toward the American Treasury—tell them to go home and come back after this job is done. Only a very few are an asset in a war for survival anyway. About 90 percent of them (my guess) are a liability to an all-out war effort on our part.

If bombing of Manchurian bases will save several divisions of our own troops, let's get the United Nations off our backs and give MacArthur the authority.

It's already been proved that when it comes to action, the United Nations boils down to a one-man show anyway—an American show. The American taxpayer foots the bill and sends his boy to fight—everywhere.

So, let's let American generals make the decisions—and send the international panhandlers home and Mr. Acheson back to his State Department.

If we're going to lock up that fancy building for the duration where the bickerers of the United Nations meet, it might be a good idea to lock up the State Department too.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

The way things are turning out today, they were more hindrance than help to us during and after the last war—and they could mess the deal up again.

And now our administration is calling upon the American people for more sacrifices.

Well that's at least a compliment.

In the years since this new thought of being a world savior came into its ascendancy in the White House—which goes back to 1932—the American people haven't been asked to make sacrifices. The leaders went right ahead and sacrificed them and their future—at Yalta, at Tehran and at Potsdam.

They did these things when they should have known what Helmut and thousands of American schoolboys knew at that time: You can't do business with the Soviet.

Tribute to William Harvey Riffey, a Confederate Soldier, by Hon. A. Willis Robertson, of Virginia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. STENNIS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a tribute by the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], then a Member of Congress from the Seventh District of Virginia, delivered on February 15, 1941, at the funeral of William Harvey Riffey, a Confederate soldier. The gallant subject of this eulogy was the great-grandfather of my friend, Bernard W. Chill, honorable citizen and a leading lawyer of the State of Mississippi.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AT THE GRAVE OF A CONFEDERATE VETERAN

Departed friend, as I stand today beside your open grave my heart is filled with tender memories of the first and only time I ever saw you; of the clear light that shone from the windows of a noble soul; of the gay braveness with which you carried the weight of 97 winters. When you clasped my hand last summer at Lantz Mill you clasped the tendrils of my heart. In that touch you gave me the inspiration of personal contact with a glorious past of which you had been an honored part. I placed my arm that day around your frail shoulders in affectionate acknowledgment of what you symbolized to me. It has never been withdrawn.

As your friends stand here today to do honor to your memory, our tears will not soften a firm resolve that by no conscious act of ours will your fond hopes for the future of democracy, the future of the country you loved, and the ideals for which you fought be turned to ashes. Through nearly a whole century of honest, upright living you have built a monument by which we will be taught to remember not where you died but where you lived. To me you will always live as I knew you last summer when I thought of you as Webster said of the veterans of Bunker Hill: "Venerable sirs, you have come down to us from a previous generation." And what a glorious generation of fair women and brave men; of ideals and the courage of conviction. Your life span covered the most trying period of our history, yet you were never false to a trust nor faltered in the face of danger. But over and above all else you clung to the old Rugged Cross and exchanged it at last for a crown.

As we commit your frail remains to Mother Earth, we rejoice in knowledge of the fact your immortal soul has already taken wings of the morning to join that of your beloved leader, Stonewall Jackson. As he lay mortally wounded in the simple farmhouse at Guinea Station, his dying whisper was: "Let us cross the river and rest in the shade of the trees." May you, too, oh departed Confederate friend, throughout all eternity, rest in the peace and quiet of the shade of the New Jerusalem.

Fly the Flag—Ex-Marine Jack Murphy Started Nation-Wide Campaign To Fly the Stars and Stripes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, one of the finest and most patriotic movements I have heard of is the successful campaign to fly the flag started by Jack Murphy, past commander, Chicago Detachment No. 1, Marine Corps League.

The effect of this campaign, which was started in July of this year, has been to make Chicago the most American-flag-decorated city in the United States. Practically every large downtown building in the Chicago Loop now flies the American flag every day. It is an inspiring sight and indicates the high regard and respect that the great city of Chicago has for the American flag.

Mr. Murphy has been rewarded for his efforts by special recognition by the mayor of Chicago and the Kiwanis Club, as recently recorded in the Illinois Marine:

FLY-THE-FLAG CAMPAIGN GROWS

Kiwanians throughout the Midwest are cooperating in a fly-the-flag campaign inaugurated in July by the Marine Corps League, Chicago Detachment No. 1. The campaign is designed to induce property owners and managers to fly the Stars and Stripes from flagpoles attached to their buildings.

In support of the campaign the city's mayor issued a proclamation, which reads as follows: "The American flag is the symbol of the principles and ideals of freedom and justice for all mankind for which thousands of courageous young Americans in our Armed Forces are fighting today to preserve. In view of this, it is most important that the American flag be displayed as a constant reminder to all of our citizens of their obligations as Americans and as an example to private owners and managers of buildings to do the same."

Under the slogan, "The only red we want is the red we've got in the old red, white, and blue," the campaign is fast reaching across the Nation. Kiwanis Clubs are urged to render leadership to this movement.

APPOINTMENT FROM FAGAN

The following appointment was received by Mr. Murphy recently:

"DEAR JACK: In recognition of your interest and service to the benefit of the Marine Corps League and your marked achievement in your patriotic campaign in Chicago to fly the flag exemplifying a true American, I herewith confirm your appointment as a member of the National Americanism Committee, Marine Corps League, to serve concurrently with my administration with the following members: Lewis E. Ballard, chairman, 108 Hamilton Street, Albany, N. Y., and Jack Brennan, member, 65 Lender Street, Jersey City, N. J.

"Semper fidelis,

"MAURICE E. FAGAN,
"National Commandant."

Every city in the United States would do well to emulate the action taken by Chicago by taking up the campaign of "fly the flag." There never was a time in our history when we needed such good old-fashioned American patriotic inspiration.

Mr. Murphy is to be commended for his persistent patriotic efforts to stimulate greater recognition of the American flag. It would seem proper that the Congress should adopt a resolution urging greater public display of the American flag. I am preparing such a resolution, which I intend to introduce in the Eighty-second Congress.

Shortage of Military Doctors, Nurses, and Medical Technicians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, a year ago the Senate unanimously passed a bill which had been very carefully drafted to meet a most critical situation. I refer to S. 1453, a bill to provide urgently needed assistance to the schools which train America's doctors, dentists, nurses, and public-health experts. That bill was completely bipartisan. It was and is endorsed by all of the professional groups concerned, with one single exception.

The bill should have passed in 1949. The terrible change in world affairs which has since occurred makes its immediate passage by the House a matter of grave national concern. Yet, because of the opposition of a powerful group which puts self-interest before that of our war wounded, this measure, on which the entire Senate of the United States is agreed, has not yet been brought before the House.

We in the Senate well know how important are the matters with which our colleagues in the House have been kept so busy. We can well understand how important measures can be overlooked because of the pressure of others which appear even more immediately important. Nonetheless, I believe that those of us who are aware of the existence of a condition which threatens our entire defense effort, and which can be corrected by action of the House, are under great moral obligation to call such a situation to the attention of our colleagues.

Therefore, I should like to read into the RECORD a few short paragraphs from an advertisement which appeared in today's Washington Post, and I should like to ask unanimous consent that the entire advertisement appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks.

The opening words of this advertisement read as follows:

If all-out war comes soon, America may be short of bombs, tanks, guns, and trained personnel to use them. But there's another shortage that would be an equally grave menace to our national safety. It's the shortage of doctors, nurses, and medical technicians.

Because of this lack, atom bomb victims would die unattended. Mothers would perish for want of a physician's help in childbirth. Epidemics would ravage the country.

To meet the emergency, the United States Senate last year unanimously passed a bill to provide Federal aid for medical education—and thereby provide more doctors. It was a bill that had the support of both major parties, of university presidents, and of most of the medical schools themselves. It might not have been just what the doctors ordered—but it was what the Nation needed.

Today, that bill still awaits action by the House of Representatives.

This, Mr. President, is the situation. It can be corrected if the House takes action in the few short weeks left in this Eighty-first Congress. If that action is not taken, a prolonged delay before the Eighty-second Congress can act is inevitable. Therefore, in the names of America's wounded, and in the light of the grave emergency confronting this Nation, I respectfully urge that the leaders of both parties in the House of Representatives see to it that immediate consideration is given the measure so ably discussed in Collier's.

There being no objection, the advertisement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of December 8, 1950]

WHO'S TO BLAME FOR THE DOCTOR SHORTAGE?

For war—or peace—our need for physicians is critical. Yet a powerful lobby is blocking passage of a bill that would enable medical schools to turn out many more doctors. Learn the bitter truth about the doctor shortage—in today's Collier's.

If all-out war comes soon, America may be short of bombs, tanks, guns and trained personnel to use them. But there's another shortage that would be an equally grave menace to our national safety. It's the shortage of doctors, nurses, and medical technicians.

Because of this lack, atom bomb victims would die unattended. Mothers would perish for want of a physician's help in childbirth. Epidemics would ravage the country.

To meet the emergency, the United States Senate last year unanimously passed a bill to provide Federal aid for medical education—and thereby provide more doctors. It was a bill that had the support of both major parties, of university presidents and of most of the medical schools themselves. It might not have been just what the doctors ordered—but it was what the Nation needed.

Today, that bill still awaits action by the House of Representatives. What happened?

You'll learn the whole shocking story in today's Collier's. You'll learn how the American Medical Association and its omnipresent lobby has again and again blocked passage of this sorely needed legislation. You'll learn how one powerful organization can, and has, flouted the wishes and the welfare of an entire nation.

Just how far are we lagging behind in the production of new doctors? Says Albert Q. Maisel, in Collier's:

"In 1910, our medical schools graduated 4,440 students, producing one new doctor for every 20,000 of our population. By 1940, the number of graduates had increased to 5,097, but the growth of population had far outstripped the increase in doctors. In that year, we produced only one doctor for every 26,000 of our people. In 1950 our physician output mounted to 5,553. But once again, it did not keep pace with population. We produced this year only one new doctor for every 27,000 people."

So it's evident, even by peacetime standards, that we need more doctors. The outbreak of the Korean fighting, of course, intensified the crisis. Says the Collier's article:

"To meet the needs of a 3,000,000-man force, the armed services will have to drain from civilian life substantially more than 5,000 physicians and proportionately large numbers of dentists, nurses, and technicians. * * * Any further expansion of the armed services will require additional levies against our already short-handed civilian health personnel."

Yet, so vigorously has the AMA continued to fight the medical-education measure, it has never even been brought to a vote in the House of Representatives. It is still in committee.

The chairman of the executive council of the Association of Medical Colleges reports that 47 of its member schools favor the bill and only 16 oppose. He disavowed the action of the AMA as "taken independently of our association—and without a poll of our membership."

Why then has the AMA balked a measure so widely favored, so obviously in the interest of the profession, as well as of the public? Before you answer that, better read Our Alarming Doctor Shortage, by Albert Q. Maisel, in Collier's, on all newsstands now.

IT'S NOT "SOCIALIZED MEDICINE"

The article discussed on this page sets forth a serious national problem that, in another all-out war, would become a national catastrophe. The country's medical schools must have money in order to expand and to reduce the sometimes prohibitive cost of medical education.

There is strong public and professional support for financing an expansion program with Federal funds. But the leaders of the American Medical Association are against the idea. So far they have blocked the passage of legislation which would make such a program possible. Collier's thinks that their stand is wrong. We appreciate the association's great contributions in maintaining high professional standards and protecting public health and safety. Yet in this case their attitude seems narrow, and their case weak.

Federal aid to medical education is not socialized medicine. While the danger of general war and atomic attack against our civilian population exists, we hope that the AMA leaders will withdraw their opposition. The Senate has already passed a bill which would provide money to end the doctor shortage. If the AMA continues its fight in the new Congress, we trust that the lawmakers will have the courage to enact the measure anyway in the interest of urgent necessity. (The Editors of Collier's.)

Southern California Citizens Demand That Truman Be Impeached and Acheson Be Ousted

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, responding to my statement in the House on Monday, December 4, that Truman be impeached and Acheson be ousted as Secretary of State, I have received a flood of telegrams, letters, and cards from citizens of southern California.

I have also heard from all parts of the United States expressions of the same views which indicate that the people are aroused, angry, and have lost what little confidence they had in the Truman administration and Acheson's foreign policy.

I received the following telegram from Mrs. Edith Lehman which expresses the sentiments of thousands of women in southern California:

Hon. GORDON L. McDONOUGH:

Fifteenth Congressional District and all the women of southern California do heartily applaud your request for impeachment for President Truman and Secretary of State Acheson. The resentment here is growing to overwhelming force day by day. I am convinced that thousands of women are willing to stand on street corners with petitions to be presented to Congress and Senate calling for such impeachment and demanding that in the face of impending world chaos the American people feel entitled to and demand American representation. May I personally add that this telegram reflects the feeling of the Crenshaw Republican Women, the Southwest Republican Men's Club, and the various women's organizations which I contact as vice chairman of the State Central Committee. Most sincerely my congratulations on your courageous stand.

EDITH ALBAN LEHMAN.

The following are additional wires from citizens of southern California:

Please continue your demand Truman be impeached. He is tool of pro-Communist advisors. Please urge full-scale cooperation with Chiang and Chinese guerrillas. Nationalist China is absolutely key to world survival. Chiang, with American support, can roll-back Red tide, then destroy Soviet Union.

ROBERT H. WILLIAMS NAJOR MIRES.

Congratulations on good work. High time someone took action.

LELAND M. FORD.

Impeach Truman and oust Acheson and clique.

Mr. and Mrs. ROY THOMAS.

Friend McDONOUGH go ahead with impeachment of Truman. Our city is with you.

M. MACFARLANE, M. D.

I have just finished writing a letter to President Truman demanding that our State Department be cleaned up and that Secretary Acheson be fired. I urge you to do all in your power to correct these disgraceful blunders including the election of Harry S. Truman to another term as our President.

L. E. PATRICK.

I was delighted to read your statement in this morning's Examiner relative to the impeachment of President Truman. Most emphatically he should be removed from office, and Acheson with him.

CHARLES C. CONROY.

Being a loyal American mother of an American boy, I quite agree that it is high time that we the American people put a complete stop to Harry S. Truman's bungling in our affairs and put someone in office who knows and understands more clearly this business of protecting this wonderful country of ours.

ALICE B. MCCLURE.

Just read your article in the Examiner about the impeachment of the President and Acheson. Why can't we have action? Please act and let's get them out.

MRS. G. LAMMERT.

It was a great source of satisfaction to read of your demand of the impeachment of our President, Harry S. Truman, and I feel that you were voicing the thought of 130,000,000 of our 150,000,000 American men, women, and children.

STANLEY PRESTON.

I was reading your views on Truman's impeachment. More power to you.

CLAY S. KINNEY.

Read your speech in this morning's paper. You are right. Truman should be impeached. Keep up the good work.

M. KALOVAT.

More power to you in your American call for the impeachment of the President and Secretary of State Acheson, and I would include the entire Cabinet and many civil employees who are Pinks and incompetent and unnecessary, as per the marvelous Herbert Hoover report.

J. MARSHALL WATKINS, Sr.

Your impeachment approach to the current mess is being well received out here. Many of us feel that 1952 may be too late to save the situation. Keep up the good work.

GEORGE F. MEREDITH.

As one of your constituents, I want to commend you for your statement on the incompetence of the present administration. I am sure there are many others who feel the same. Keep up the good work.

T. D. BRADBURY.

From Seattle, Wash.:

We desire to thank you for recording President impeachment. You should have a pat on the back for this action.

MRS. FRED THOMPSON.

From Detroit, Mich.:

I have been saying for 2 years that that political accident has been guilty of malfeasance and violation of his constitutional oath time and time again. Now there is sufficient power in the House with coalition to do the trick. Mr. we must get that guy out of the White House. He will completely wreck us in the next 2 years. Press your demands and don't let up.

EDGAR M. ROBBINS, Sr.

From San Diego, Calif.:

Your charges before the House relating to the President are in line with popular thinking, but you did not complete the job.

Everyone knows that Russia is building a modern navy of many carrier task forces, and that Belgium and other European nations are assisting by shipping steel and copper to Russia. When that project is completed in a few years there will be a war of deadly proportions, which the Russians have long planned—and bringing our Nation under aerial attack, which is not yet possible except by isolated attempts.

Yet there is no ultimatum to declare economic boycott by our administration. That, to my way of thinking is ample grounds for impeachment of the administration.

The Reclamation-Park Service Squabble

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Mr. G. E. Untermann, director of the board of examiners of the State of Utah of the Utah Field House of Natural History at the Vernal State Park, Utah. It is a timely article, entitled "The Reclamation-Park Service Squabble."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RECLAMATION-PARK SERVICE SQUABBLE—WILL THE DAMS RUIN DINOSAUR NATIONAL MONUMENT?

(By G. E. Untermann)

In the July 22 issue of the Saturday Evening Post, noted author Bernard DeVoto, a former Utahan now residing in Cambridge, Mass., asks the question, "Shall we let them ruin our national parks?"

Mr. DeVoto, in his well written Post article, opposes the activities of the Bureau of Reclamation on the principle of opposition to both private and public invasion of a National Park Service area. However, his heavy artillery is leveled specifically at Dinosaur National Monument in which Secretary of the Interior Oscar L. Chapman has recently authorized the construction of Echo Park and Split Mountain Dams. There can be no doubt that the Dinosaur National Monument controversy prompted Mr. DeVoto to make his eloquent defense of national parks as a whole.

Unlike Mr. DeVoto, the writer is not an author of national prominence, but he has lived in and adjacent to Dinosaur National Monument for 30 years. He has been ranger at the monument for several years, and with his wife, also a geologist, and former ranger-naturalist at Dinosaur, has mapped the geology of the more than 300 square miles which constitute the present great area of the monument. Our knowledge of Dinosaur National Monument has been gained from intimate, detailed, on-the-spot experience which has given us an opportunity to know this region better than probably any living persons. If a salesman should know his product, as he is admonished to do, then certainly an author should know his subject to properly write about it. When that subject is 2,000 miles away, as was the case with Mr. DeVoto, sitting in Cambridge, Mass., writing about Dinosaur National Monument, way out in Utah and Colorado, it is difficult to know all one should know about the material upon which one is expounding. Nor does a hasty visit to the area, or digging through musty files, give one adequate information to properly discuss such an involved subject. Had Mr. DeVoto given such superficial research to the material which has gone into his splendid books, as he has apparently given to the Dinosaur National Monument discussion, those books would not be the excellent works of American literature which they are.

The title of Mr. DeVoto's Post article implies that the Bureau of Reclamation is out to destroy our national parks, for "ruin" infers "total destruction of value or usefulness." Such an appellation will not apply to Dinosaur National Monument, for the construction of both dams will affect only 20 percent of this vast area. Fully 80 percent is unaffected by either dam. Dinosaur Quarry and vicinity, Jones Hole, Wild Mountain, Pearl Park, Zenobia Peak, Five Springs, Douglas Mountain, Happy Hollow, Vale of Tears, Blue Mountain, and many other areas, are so far removed from the river canyons that no actual streams can be seen. And what is the nature of the 20 percent of the monument which will be modified by the construction of Echo Park and Split Mountain Dams? It is principally inaccessible canyon country wholly unknown and unknowable, in its present state, to the general public. Probably less than 100 persons have seen this portion of the monument and they had to risk their lives to do so. Many of those who ran the angry rapids in specially constructed boats were too busy saving their own necks to bother about the scenery. A few additional parties have seen the canyons from the air. It is not even possible to drive to the rims of these canyons as no roads lead to overlooks. In fact, there are no roads. In only a relatively few places would overlooks be feasible. For the greater part of any rim drives which may be later constructed, no river views would be possible. Only the canyons could be seen, not the rivers themselves. The average visitor to Dinosaur National Monument is only aware of the Dinosaur Quarry area which is accessible to him. Unfortunately, due to lack of funds, this area is in a very limited state of development, and proves disappointing to many visitors. He does not see the canyons and has no way of getting into them. The canyon portion of the monument is as remote as the moon so far as the traveling public is concerned.

The construction of Echo Park and Split Mountain Dams, with their resultant still-water bodies, will create picturesque lakes on the Green and Yampa Rivers, slightly more than 100 miles in extent. For the first time the canyon areas will become safely available to the public. Mr. DeVoto contemptuously refers to these unique placid lakes as "millponds" and odiously belittles them in comparing them with the violent turbulence of a white-water stream. A cobra-like hypnotic spell seems to come over those who so heatedly defend roaring waters, and like the cobra, it lures many of them to their death. Maj. John Wesley Powell poetically named Lodore Canyon and Echo Park, but being a realist as well as a poet, he also named Upper and Lower Disaster Falls, Hell's Half Mile, and Whirlpool Canyon. Sentiment is a fine thing in its proper place, but realism makes for longevity on these streams. No one has a healthier respect for the rampaging Green and Yampa Rivers than those who have run them.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

It has been our observation, over a period of years, that the stanch defenders of these wildly rushing streams are the last ones to risk their own necks running the canyons in boats. They agitate for the preservation of these terrifying waters for others, but want no part of them for themselves. One of the principal purposes of the national parks is to protect and preserve the areas under their administration for the enjoyment of all the people. The few intrepid boatmen who have so far flirted with lady luck on the Green and Yampa Rivers do not constitute all the people. They represent a very small minority and are the first to acknowledge it. The great mass of the traveling public, those who make up the bulk of the visitors to our national parks and monuments, would just as soon go over Niagara Falls in a barrel as to run the rapids and whirlpools dashing through the canyons of Dinosaur National Monument. Nor could many afford to see the canyons in this manner if they wished. Only experienced boatmen can come through them alive. The fare per passenger for these expeditions varies from $160 to $490, depending upon how many of the canyons are run. The thrilling experience is worth the money but this sort of adventure does not appeal to the multitudes. A boat trip on the canyon lakes, on the other hand, could be had for a few dollars and would be enjoyed by everyone.

Mr. DeVoto leaves the impression that Lodore Canyon will be submerged under 500 feet of water, the inference being that the inspirational value of this great canyon will be destroyed. Actually, the only place where the water will be 500 feet deep is right at Echo Park Dam. The rapid drop in elevation in both Lodore and Yampa Canyons quickly reduces the upstream depth of water in them. Lodore Canyon walls will be reduced in height by only one-tenth, and in the Yampa Canyon the depth of still water is reduced to zero before the upper end of the canyon is reached. Here several miles of rushing river will remain, wholly unaffected by the dam. The depth of water in Split Mountain Canyon will be less than half as great as in any of the canyons above Echo Park, inasmuch as the height of Split Mountain Dam is only 245 feet. The grandeur of these areas will be little affected by such minor changes.

With reference to the canyon lakes which the dams will create in Dinosaur National Monument, Mr. DeVoto states: "No one will ever drive 2,000 miles [Atlantic coast visitors] to row a boat; no one will ever seek recreation in a national park except for * * * the unique experience of awe and wonder that an untouched wilderness spectacle provides." (Mr. DeVoto dogmatically presumes to speak for everyone.) As a member of the National Parks Advisory Board, he surely must have heard of the one and a half million visitors who annually swarm over Hoover Dam and Lake Mead, many of whom drive more than 2,000 miles to "row a boat" in temperatures up to 120°. Apparently millions of Americans do not share Mr. DeVoto's violent antipathy for the works of man or his hatred for the Bureau of Reclamation. It can be assumed, then, that millions will also flock to the Green and Yampa Canyon lakes to row a boat, to fish, bathe, and enjoy water sports in cool, delightful temperatures, amid spectacular scenery which they will have been enabled to see for the first time, because quiet water has at last made it accessible. For those who feel they must have wilderness untouched by the hand of man, 80 percent of Dinosaur National Monument alone remains as nature, the sculptor, left it. In addition, for the simon-pure nature lover, there are hundreds of thousands of square miles of primitive areas and untouched wilderness in western America for those who insist on nature in the raw. It remains untouched mainly because only with difficulty can anyone get in there to touch it.

Alternate sites have been proposed for Echo Park and Split Mountain Dams, outside the monument. Mr. De Voto, in his Post article, refers to the testimony of Gen. U. S. Grant III, who suggested downstream sites as substitutes. In recognition of Utah's 100 years of irrigation, we have a saying to the effect that "a good Mormon can make water run up hill." But even the best Mormon could never push water as far up hill as would be required by General Grant's alternate downstream sites.

Since the Colorado River agreement of 1922, it has taken the upper-basin States 26 years to agree upon a division of water among themselves. Utah's share in this division is 23 percent. In order to use the water allocated to her, dams must be built where it can be taken out of the river and diverted to State use. Nature has provided limited sites and they must be utilized to the best advantage where they are. The Dinosaur National Monument damsites have proven the only satisfactory locations for the dams, for several reasons. Water stored back of these dams would lie in deep, cool canyons where evaporation losses would be at a minimum. It is poor engineering to store water in flat, open areas where the sun can beat down on shallow reservoirs and dissipate their contents through excessive evaporation. Any other sites than those in Dinosaur National Monument involve an additional loss of several hundred thousand acre-feet of water annually by evaporation alone. The upstream site mentioned in Mr. De Voto's article, is subject to excessive evaporation losses and is also threatened with salinity, which would ultimately make the water unfit for domestic use. The power developed at Echo Park and Split Mountain Dams is nearest the power market demand of Colorado, Utah, and Wyoming, revenues from which are the principal means of repaying the cost of these projects. Opponents of western reclamation, like Mr. De Voto, attempt to create the impression that the taxpayer's money is being poured down a bottomless hole. These projects are self-liquidating. The Federal funds which build them are loans, not gifts. If we can give billions to foreign lands without much prospect of a return, surely we can lend money for the development of our own American West when that money is repayable.

At mass meetings held in the summer of 1936, in Vernal, Utah, and Craig, Colo., fully 2 years before the monument was increased to its present size, officials of the Park Service gave assurance to the people of these areas that the enlargement of Dinosaur National Monument, to include the river canyons, would not interfere with the future development of power and irrigation projects on the Green and Yampa rivers, Secretary of the Interior Chapman's decision in favor of the Bureau of Reclamation, in the Dinosaur National Monument controversy, honors this commitment. National Park Service Director Newton B. Drury, has sportingly agreed to cooperate with the Bureau of Reclamation in fully developing the recreational possibilities of the area.

While both the National Park Service and the Bureau of Reclamation are members of the Interior Department family, Mr. DeVoto finds it extremely difficult to say anything civil about his sister agency. He would have us believe that the Bureau of Reclamation is underhanded, treacherous, and a dyed-in-the-wool villain. Only the Park Service plays a virtuous role in his story. Reclamation withdrawals, Mr. DeVoto implies, have been illegal, unpublicized, and tricky. The writer's personal observation has been that the cooperation between the Bureau of Reclamation and the National Park Service has been excellent in all those instances which have come to his attention. The personnel of both agencies have worked beautifully together. Furthermore, a number of Reclamation withdrawals preceded and had prior right over National Park jurisdiction in certain areas. It was the Park Service which invaded the domain of the Bureau of Reclamation rather than the Bureau having invaded National Park Service areas.

Nor is the Park Service entirely with clean hands when it comes to publicizing its own expansion program. Has Mr. DeVoto conveniently forgotten the attempted National Park Service "land grab" involving the proposed Escalante National Monument of Utah? Several years ago an oil company map showing the proposed Escalante Monument came to the attention of the Governor of Utah. It was the first time he had ever heard of the proposal to set a vast area of his State aside as a new national monument, and this in a State which already has nine national monuments and two national parks. The public learned of it only after certain adverse publicity nipped the project in the bud. Now the proposed Escalante National Monument no longer appears on any map, and things in the State of Utah are serene.

Planning of the Bureau of Reclamation, for the most part, is a long-range program. It attempts to anticipate both power and water needs of the future. With the tremendous population growth of the United States of America, and its heavy westward migration, it is necessary to provide for these new demands. After what has happened in New York City, with its critical water shortage, a shortage so critical that you had to ask for a glass of water in a restaurant, it should no longer be difficult for an easterner to appreciate the need for conservation of water resources. These resources are far more limited in the West than they are in the East, so that our need for conservation is greater. Belated steps to augment its water supply are now being taken by New York City, but the full effect of this program may not be felt for another 10 years.

Archaeologists of some future day may find an abandoned city on the present site of New York, and ponder the question of why it was deserted. Poor planning and a cycle of dry years could make this more than fiction. From 1050 A. D. to 1300 A. D., a great civilization in our American Southwest abandoned the whole northern portion of the plateau region, left large cities with multistoried dwellings and vanished into the dimness of the past. This was the culture of classic pueblo time, referred to by archeologists as Pueblo III or the Great Pueblo period. It was the time when these people were at the height of their civilization and has been dscribed as "the stage of large communities, great development of the arts, and growth of intensive local specialization." It makes one stop and think how aptly this describes the civilization of our own time. Why did these great people vanish? No one knows all the answers, but the long droughts of this period are thought to have been the principal contributing factor to their mysterious disappearance.

The more widely scattered our power developments are the more secure will America be. During wartime, especially, is it disastrous to have industry centralized and present the enemy with a sitting-duck target which neutralizes our struggle for survival. Decentralization of industry is the accepted thing, not only as a war safety factor, but because it decentralizes populations as well, and makes for better living than can be enjoyed under crowded conditions. And how are we going to decentralize industry and population if we don't have the power and the water to support them?

Mr. DeVoto would have us cease building dams and generating electric power because atomic energy may make it obsolete in 25 years. He does not ask us to stop digging coal or drilling for oil, though it is well known that atomic energy has been proposed as substitutes for fuels. He only wants us to stop building dams. (They spoil his scenery.) But what about water? Even the wildest Buck Rogers scheme has never suggested that atomic energy was going to replace water for either domestic use or irrigation. The Atomic Age will still see the Bureau of Reclamation engaged in a needed construction program.

As a parting shot Mr. DeVoto cannot resist taking a last crack at his sister agency, in the Department of Interior, the Bureau of Reclamation, by again accusing it of destroying the national parks and making them so undesirable that neither he nor his grandchildren will any longer want them. (How bitter these family quarrels can become.) Does conservation mean setting an inaccessible area aside and keeping it that way? If no one can see these natural wonders, because they cannot be reached, then for whom are they being preserved?

Mr. DeVoto need have no fear. The West will always abound in vast areas where both he and his grandchildren can climb the dizzy heights and exclaim in breathless ecstasy, "Ah wilderness!"

Is GOP Strength Sign of Isolationism?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR V. WATKINS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Is GOP Strength Sign of Isolationism?" published in the Provo (Utah) Daily Herald, on November 28, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS GOP STRENGTH SIGN OF ISOLATIONISM?

All over Western Europe, the political pundits were getting wrinkles in their foreheads over what they thought was going to happen in the new United States Congress.

They weren't very sure what it would be, but they didn't think they'd like it.

And as they peered again at the election results, which by now are pretty much history, they kept seeing a nasty word: "Isolationism."

It's time they took another look.

While they were indulging in a little self-pity, the newly elected United States Republicans were saying things that made isolationism look as dead as the Bull Moose Party.

Said victorious Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, otherwise known as Mr. Republican:

"Anybody is an idiot who calls anybody else an isolationist. How can we be isolationists when we are involved in wars and treaties and every kind of international relationship?"

Said Senator-elect EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, of Illinois, when asked by the United States News and World Report if he saw any outcropping of isolationism in his State:

"I think people are beginning to think about their country and its survival and that they do want these (foreign aid) programs thoroughly explored and investigated. They want to see what we're getting for our money."

That seems to wrap up the sentiments of all the others, too.

Nobody (not even the men in the Kremlin, who would like to) can read the end of Marshall plan aid in such statements.

But they should be able to see that United States help is not going on and on, like an inheritance from a nice old uncle, while western Europe does nothing in return.

The French, for instance, are scared they won't get enough arms from that nice Uncle Sam to help them build up strength against another uncle, this one a villain named Joe. But the French won't go along with the nice uncle's idea that we ought to use the Germans as part of the defenses of western Europe.

The British are piqued because they think the nice uncle has no right to object if Marshall plan aid is used to promote nationalization of British industry.

And western Germany is so busy with a boom in civilian goods industrial production much more than anybody expected it would be when the Marshall plan was to end in 1952.

All over the Western World, as a matter of fact, the dollar famine seems to be over. We're buying more abroad than we're selling, and we're paying higher prices, too.

For a long time, the official name for Marshall plan has been the Economic Cooperation Administration. It now begins to look like the cooperation could work both ways. A lot of ECA countries are putting money in the bank which they could use for a little self-support. A lot of ECA countries have vital raw materials we need, which, it seems reasonable, we ought to be able to get in some way without handing out more dollars or, in some cases, gold.

As a result of the election, the nice uncle's Congress appears bent on looking into these points in a businesslike way.

If that be isolationism, let the pessimists make the most of it.

W. Stuart Symington, Chairman, National Security Resources Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH McKELLAR
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, two great magazines have recently published almost identical articles regarding the Honorable W. Stuart Symington, chairman of the National Security Resources Board, one of the finest and ablest and most efficient officers of our national government and one of the most perfect gentlemen I ever knew. He is courteous to the *n*th degree, honest, highly educated, and worthy. Mr. Symington was formerly Secretary of Air, and is now chairman of the National Security Resources Board. They are very fine articles about Mr. Symington. He deserves every word which may be said in his praise.

I ask unanimous consent to place one of those articles that appeared in the Reader's Digest of December 1950 in the Appendix of the RECORD. I think all of us know Mr. Symington. He is a grand man, and he is making us a grand chairman of the National Security Resources Board. He made a wonderful record as Secretary of Air.

I think the permanent RECORD ought to contain one of these articles, and I hope there will be no objection. I ask unanimous consent to put this article in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SYMINGTON: BOSS OF THE HOME FRONT

"There are three big jobs in the Government now, besides the President's," says Clark Clifford, former assistant to the President. "They are Acheson's, Marshall's, and Symington's." This being approximately so, it is pertinent to ask whether W. Stuart Symington is a good man for his job—that of mobilizing America's resources for an increasingly hot war. He is still more or less a stranger in national life.

Among the important things to know about the Chairman of our National Security Resources Board are what he is not. For instance, although he is known as a member of the President's "Missouri gang," he is no more from Missouri than, say, Ferenc Nagy, former premier of Hungary, is from the Virginia farm where he has lived recently. Likewise he is neither the socialite scion of a rich family nor a playboy. He does, however, have style. He is immensely handsome in a rugged way, and a superior athlete. He has a quick, searching, elastic mind, direct and logical. His social behavior is as effortless as his golf swing, and as effective. If he tells a story, dances the Charleston, or testifies before a committee, the action carries a certain innate air of distinction, as if this were, indeed, the right thing to do and the right way to do it.

Symington's job as Chairman of the National Security Resources Board can be defined in a general way as that of an assistant president in charge of coordinating the home front, its human and material resources. The Board, made up of the Secretaries of Defense, State, Interior, Agriculture, Commerce, Labor, and the Treasury, was created in 1947 at the time the Armed Forces were unified. It is not an operating agency but a staff agency: it plans and supervises. Thus, when Congress authorized a system of priorities, allocations of strategic materials, standby price and wage controls, and regulations of agricultural and power production, authority to operate the law was delegated to the Departments of Commerce, Interior, and Agriculture, which have the staff and facilities to do so. Their chiefs meet as NSRB board members to iron out any conflicts, and it is part of Symington's job to arbitrate such conflicts. In case of failure to agree, he makes the decision. His authority is subject to reversal only by the President.

Five years ago Symington was merely a successful manufacturer of electric fans and small electric motors. What put him where he is today?

W. (for William) Stuart Symington III was born on June 26, 1901, in Amherst, Mass., the second child and first son of William Stuart Symington II and Emily Harrison, both of whose southern families were ruined financially by the Civil War. Stuart's father was a professor of Romance languages at Amherst College. When children began to accumulate—six all told—W. Stuart II decided to give up teaching and study law at New York University law school. The necessities of life came from his tiny savings and the small amounts he could earn from doing translations. After the law degree the family moved to Baltimore, into a home which has been described by one member as "definitely on the wrong side of the tracks." Thereafter the older children often were farmed out to friends and relatives who could furnish some of the amenities lacking in their own household.

Stuart was a gifted child. His older sister Louise remembers, "Stuart did everything well from the beginning." At 10 he asked for and got the Encyclopedia Britannica for Christmas. And what he learned he liked to show off. "He wasn't a comfortable person to be around," says one of his contemporaries. "As a matter of fact," another recalls, "he was pure poison."

At the time Stuart was growing up, his father's six brothers, who also lived in Baltimore, were reestablishing the family fortunes in a substantial way. Stuart thus was exposed to wealth and the kind of life it bought. His cousins went to private schools. He and his brothers went to public school. "Sometimes we were poor," Stuart says today. "I mean poor. And I wanted to do the things the others could afford to do."

He set about effecting this in the most direct ways he knew. He had a paper route; one summer he sold bottled spring water from his coaster wagon; another year, when he was 15, he worked on a lathe turning shell casings for the Russians (it was 1916). The summers of his college years he worked as a cub reporter on the Baltimore Sun, covering sports and local politics, and he continued to read insatiably.

In 1918 he managed to get in the Army for a few months before the war ended. By then his father's law business had taken a turn for the better, and there was enough money to send him to Yale, where he played on the tennis team, reported for the News, got satisfactory grades, and was an all-round campus success. Then one holiday, while visiting his Yale roommate in Washington, he met Evelyn ("Eve") Wadsworth, whose father was Senator JAMES WADSWORTH, of New York. She was lovely, charming, and talented, but most important, as Stuart reported to his family, "She's a girl who can think." They were married in 1924.

Stuart's education in human values really began in his first post-college years. He had a job with an uncle's company in Rochester, N. Y., as an apprentice molder—heavy work at long hours. There in the murk and smoke of the foundry, as he grew to know the dust-caked figures who were his fellow workers and teachers, he began to realize something about the lives and aspirations of ordinary men.

His marriage, too, had complex effect on Stuart's life. In Eve he had a wife whose tact and intuition smoothed his impatience with people, and whose own patience endured even the long evenings of their early marriage when he was off at night school, studying higher mathematics, metallurgy, and electrical engineering. The marriage also brought him his first and lifelong hero, his father-in-law. James Wadsworth, a leading political figure in that Republican era, is a man of great wisdom and integrity, combined with humor and tolerance. Admiration for him and his concept of public service was important in shaping Symington into the kind of public servant he is.

But meantime Eve's parents and her assorted relatives and friends were rich. Symington's boyhood urge "to do what the others could afford to do" was not magnified a hundredfold. For 7 years, with his uncle's companies, he steadily widened his experience, at increasingly bigger salaries. But he was not getting rich.

"I realized early in life," he recalls, "that the only way to make real money is to get in on the ground floor of something and build an equity." His chance came in the radio business. Independently he had entered the radio-parts field, and soon he talked his uncles into a $500,000 investment in the Colonial Radio Corp. He merged his parts business with it, became president and a substantial stockholder, and proceeded to build it into one of the biggest companies of its kind. Thereby he made his first, and fairly large, fortune. Soon afterward he had a chance to do a similar job on the Rustless Iron & Steel Co., owned by his friend, Charles Payson. He took a stock option as part of his pay and so reinvigorated the company that when it was sold later his holdings made him really rich.

It was during this interval, when he was doing some of the hardest work of his life, that he acquired his reputation as a "playboy." He and Eve and their two small sons, William Stuart IV and James Wadsworth, had moved to New York in 1933. As handsome, well-off, personable young people, they were immediately in demand socially. Eve was naturally gay, and Stuart had long since mellowed. "We had a lot of fun," he recalls. "No one ever liked better than I did to spend an evening at El Morocco. We could be up all night and go right on to play tennis the next morning. Age has taken care of that."

Another thing that happened was that Eve suddenly became a celebrity. At a night-club charity party she had helped fill out the entertainment by singing a few songs. She was so good that shortly she was being booked into such places as the Waldorf's Sert Room, earning a reputed $1,000 a week as a "society singer." Stuart was a proud and devoted fan. "I suppose that added to the playboy idea," he says.

With his fortune now secure, Symington could have indulged any fancies he chose. But, as Clark Clifford has said of him, "inertia to Stu is like bubonic plague to other people. He can't stand still. He wants and needs a challenge at all times." Soon he was looking around for something to organize, and within the year came the job that indirectly was to land him in Washington.

The Emerson Electric Manufacturing Co., of St. Louis, manufacturers of electric fans and of small motors such as are used in fans and refrigerators, was a good company that needed a complete overhaul by a new management. Friends nominated Symington for the job, and in 1938 the family moved to St. Louis.

Symington by this time had worked out a standard procedure for curing sick businesses. His methods were all applied at Emerson Electric, with suitably electric results.

By 1940–41 the defense program was beginning to bite into the domestic economy, and Symington looked around for something of a military nature to which he could convert. He decided Emerson could build bomber turrets, and he bombarded Washington with requests for a contract. By the end of the war he was turning out turrets at a rate in excess of $100,000,000 a year.

Naturally there were many production problems, and at one point the situation was so muddled that the House "watchdog" committee under Andrew May started an investigation. Later, Senator Truman, head of the corresponding committee in the Senate, talked at length with Symington and was deeply impressed. He left Symington with the heartening and, as it turned out, accurate opinion that "it isn't you who ought to be investigated, it's the people who wanted you to be investigated."

In 1945 Secretary of the Treasury John Snyder suggested Symington as a good man to head the Surplus Property Board, and President Truman readily agreed. Surprised and flattered, Symington accepted. He has been in Washington ever since.

As Surplus Property Administrator, he was charged with disposing of many billions' worth of Government property, from GI toothpaste to huge manufacturing plants. The administrative machine had been clogged by frequent disagreement within its three-man board. At Symington's insistence, he was given sole executive responsibility, and the agency began to function smoothly.

Later the President offered him the post of Assistant Secretary of War for Air. Symington knew and liked many of the Air officers through his turret-building experience and he believed in air power. He took the job, and when Air was given its own identity under the Unification Act, he became the first Secretary of the Air Force.

He fought for Air Force objectives—especially the 70-group program and the B-36 superbomber—with all his characteristic energy and persuasiveness. But by last January he had come to feel that neither he nor the Air Force had much to gain under economy-bent Louis Johnson's rule, and was receptive, therefore, when the President offered him the chairmanship of the National Security Resources Board.

The post seemed tailored for him, and he for it. The chairmanship had been vacant 15 months. There was a big job of revitalizing and reorganizing to do. Symington spent 2½ weeks reading up on what the Board had done and should be doing. Then he started moving people around the checkerboard and began recruiting from the outside. He simplified office functions and procedures. By the time the Korean crisis came along, the NSRB was a going concern.

Korea suddenly lifted the NSRB's functions out of the area of theory into that of immediate and urgent fact. Symington's life since then has been practically a nonstop series of meetings to attend, committees to recruit, reports to read and listen to, surveys and plans and negotiations. Undoubtedly he enjoys it. "He's like a good horse," one of his friends has said, "always ready for the next fence. Of course, the best horses sometimes break their necks that way."

Probably Symington has a spill or two ahead of him in his present job. But he is a great executive, by almost universal acknowledgment one of the best in the administration. He has enthusiasm, intuition, persuasiveness, directness ("an instinct for the jugular," as one of his staff says)—and he has learned to be likable. "The thing I'm proud of," he said recently, "is the ability to get along with all kinds of people"—a justifiable pride, considering his early ability to antagonize people.

From two seasoned political philosophers, Wadsworth and the late O. Max Gardner—Symington has learned to understand the processes of practical democracy, to realize that it is fallible and often inefficient, and that such flaws go along with the idea of freedom. He has learned also that Congressmen and Senators are, on the whole, intelligent and sincere people whose views deserve honest respect, and that the way to earn their respect is to be direct and factual with them. As a result, Symington's relations with Congress are marked by an almost unheard-of mutual cordiality. Those relations will count during the next months, while the defense program, still new and ill-defined, gathers momentum and mass.

The central issue is whether we should rearm merely enough to make the Russians think twice before attacking us or enough to fight and win a war with them if it comes. There are many degrees of opinion as to what should be done. Symington's is: "We've got to get strong quick. If we don't, they're going to hit us when they have enough bombs." Until there is a decision, the size of Symington's job—how much mobilization? How many controls?—will remain indeterminate.

If there is all-out mobilization or something approaching it, the present system of delegating controls to the Cabinet departments probably will end, and special agencies such as the late WPB and CPA will be formed again, with someone at the top to coordinate them. "If that should happen," Symington says, "I don't know whether they would want me or somebody else to run it. That's unimportant." But if he were asked to stay, to face this highest jump in history, there is no doubt whatsoever what his answer would be.

Recapitulation of Past Speeches and a Backsight on AMA To Be Considered in the Light of Its Present-Day Preachments—Part 5

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, the following speech is the fifth in a series of broadcasts and was delivered over radio station WOW, on October 27, 1950, and is shockingly enlightening as to the contributions which the old AMA balking horse of true medical progress has practiced in the past which disagree so tremendously with its present-day mouthings. The speech is as follows:

In previous broadcasts I have explained many times that I favored President Truman's health plan as contained in one Senate and two House bills, except that I was against the provision requiring total payment of 2 percent on a $4,800 salary, and favored an amendment which would require a payment of 2 percent on a salary not to exceed $3,000 or $3,600. The reason I favor this amendment is because it would permit private insurance companies of every kind, fraternal and otherwise, to still stay in the health insurance field and continue to prosper. I am also against that part of chapter 7 of the President's health plan which provides for compulsory health insurance, because that would require a duplication of insurance programs for railroad, packinghouse, public power and utility workers, veterans of World War I and II, and many other employed persons who already have satisfactory health programs, and persons having private insurance policies to their own liking.

I want to repeat again that I have been opposed always to socialism, socialized medicine, and compulsory health insurance, and that there is no program pending in the Congress to establish socialized medicine. In this campaign I have learned that the minds of some doctors are like the pupil of the eye, the more light you throw on it the more it contracts. If those doctors who continue to diagnose S. 1679 as socialized medicine have no better diagnostic skill in their medical practice, then I say, God help their patients.

I called attention previously to the fact that my opponent permitted his free mail privilege, to the tune of 112,000 speeches, to be used by labor-baiting New York City interests, thus depriving the Post Office Department of at least $3,360 in revenue; that my opponent carried two sleepers on his congressional payroll who were Omaha lawyers, when they were supposed to be clerks in his Washington office and that these two men drew during the 6 years my opponent was in Congress a total sum of $5,904.89; that my opponent gave away to a member of the other body and to two Congressmen, one, an Iowan, all of the yearbooks and other books accumulated for the benefit of the Second Congressional District and also disposed of, to persons unknown, all of the farm bulletins, pamphlets, and other minor Government publications which were allocated to him for the people of the Second Congressional District; and that my opponent by this means made it difficult for me to fill orders for Government books and publications.

I also told my listeners about the antagonistic record which my opponent had as far as agriculture, labor, veterans, and the people, generally, of this district are concerned; that I had served the people of this district including agriculture, labor, and veterans fairly and well and did not vote against one law beneficial to agriculture, labor, and veterans, except the runaway, bankrupting, and fantastic veteran pension bill, which would have bankrupt the Nation; that I kept my promises to the people and also followed out the promises made in the Democratic platform; that I was not a rubber stamp for the administration or the President or anyone else, but in matters which were not covered by the Democratic platform, I felt duty-bound to exercise my own judgment and consequently voted for the Spanish-American War Veterans assistance bill and voted to pass it over President Truman's veto; that I supported S. 87, the bill which gave the postal workers who were veterans of World War II, an added increase in seniority salary and voted to pass it over the President's veto; that I voted for the communistic control bill and voted to pass it over the President's veto. I also voted against the Kerr natural gas bill and tidelands oil bill which would have syphoned money which the people of the State of Nebraska were concerned in, back to selfish interests.

I want to assure you that no one has ever tried harder to be fair to the masses of the people and endeavor to give them a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, instead of a Government of, by, and for selfish interests.

Since the AMA is spearheading the reactionary Republican Party all over the Nation, in this campaign, and the Republican Party is not running this year and seems to have gone into hiding or gone out of business entirely, I will address my remarks now to the American Medical Association's record on health legislation, because there is no one else left to fight this campaign against me.

The American Medical Association, in its multi-million-dollar advertising campaign, boasts it has convinced the American people that "no country on earth can surpass America's leadership in medical care and progress." It is generally true that American medicine leads the world, but four out of five Americans today need financial help to meet serious illness. One out of every two babies dying today could be saved; one out of every three mothers dying in childbirth dies needlessly; 25,000,000 lives are blighted by disability or physical impairment.

While public health has made great forward strides during the past several decades, practically every measure designed to bring the benefits of American medical progress to all Americans has been fought, and fought bitterly, by the American Medical Association. Here in brief, is the record of the American Medical Association as it pertains to the health and welfare of the average American.

1. A generation ago, the AMA opposed the requirement that all cases of tuberculosis be reported to a public authority—the foundation of all tuberculosis control methods. Reporting of tuberculosis is accepted today as a vital health and community safety measure. (See Is Your Health the Nation's Business (Army GI roundtable sessions).)

2. The AMA fought compulsory vaccinations for smallpox. (Malmberg, Carl, One Hundred and Forty Million Patients, p. 191; Rorty, James, American Medicine Mobilizes, p. 77, pp. 114–115; Dr. Michael M. Davis, American Organizes Medicine, p. 177.)

3. The AMA attacked provisions for immunization against diphtheria and other preventive measures against contagious diseases by public health agencies on the ground that it would hurt the economic interests of private physicians. (Dr. Ernst Boas, as quoted in Malmburg, One Hundred and Forty Million Patients; also additional sources cited in paragraph above.)

4. The AMA denounced workmen's compensation as "socialism." (Malmberg, One Hundred and Forty Million Patients, p. 209.)

5. Organized medicine's ruling body unanimously opposed the National Tuberculosis Act a week before Congress unanimously passed it. Is Your Health the Nation's Business? (Army GI roundtable sessions.)

6. The AMA opposed the first bills to grant Federal aid to the States to reduce infant and maternal mortalities. When Congress passed the Sheppard-Towner maternity welfare bill in 1921, the AMA house of delegates labeled the act "Federal bureaucratic interference with the sacred rights of the American home." Again, in 1930, the same body condemned the measure as "unsound in policy and tending to promote communism." (Journal of the American Medical Association, July 5, 1930; 67th Cong., hearings before the Committee for Interstate and Foreign Commerce on H. R. 2366, 1921. On opposition to all Federal grants: Journal of the American Medical Association, May 4, 1935, p. 1616.)

7. The AMA opposed the Social Security Act, passed in 1935. The Journal of the American Medical Association declared: "The Social Security Act is designed to work a revolution in the social and political relations of the people and of the several States to the Federal Government." In 1939, on behalf of the AMA board of trustees, Dr. Morris Fishbein condemned old-age and unemployment insurance as a "definite step toward either communism or totalitarianism." (Garceau Oliver, The Political Life of the American Medical Association, p. 139.)

8. Organized medicine opposed the creation of public venereal-disease clinics. Again it saw an invasion of private practice and an economic threat to doctors. (Reid, Louis, Health Insurance, p. 170; Health Inventory, January 1934 issue of Survey Graphic, p. 39; Index and Digest of Official Actions of the American Medical Association, statement by the judicial council, 1922.)

9. Organized medicine opposed—and still does—the creation of free diagnostic centers for tuberculosis and cancer. These are viewed as further steps to socialized medicine. (Dr. C. C. Little, Jackson Memorial Laboratory, Bar Harbor, Maine, as quoted by Albert Deutsch.)

10. Organized medicine fought the American Red Cross plan of 1947 to set up a Nation-wide reserve of civilian blood banks. The AMA castigated the Red Cross for "pushing socialized medicine." (Medical Economics, February 1949.)

11. The American Medical Association has displayed varying degrees of hostility to the development of medical research and knowledge by such great foundations as the Rockefeller Foundation, the Rosenwald Fund, the Commonwealth Fund, the Milbank Memorial Fund, the Twentieth Century Fund, and the American Foundation. It has termed these efforts, which resulted in tremendous health gains for the people, "lay interference" and "intrusion." (Rorty, James, American Medicine Mobilizes, p. 78, p. 111 ff.)

However, these obstructive tactics by the AMA over a period of several decades in opposition to the spreading of the benefits of American medicine to the average citizen are as nothing compared with its strong opposition to every major piece of health legislation introduced during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress.

12. Federal aid to medical education, passed unanimously by the Senate in August 1949, was the most important piece of health legislation before the House in 1950. In 1949, after Senate hearings on the bill, AMA representatives agreed the medical schools were in a dire financial emergency; they also agreed there was a serious shortage of doctors in this country.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

However, in 1950, the AMA opposed Federal aid to medical education and succeeded in bottling it up three times in the House. The AMA action was directly contrary to the stand of the majority of the country's medical school deans, the American Hospital Association, the American Dental Association, the Armed Forces, and a large number of the country's public health administrators. Dr. Joseph C. Hinsey, president of the Association of American Colleges, reported to the House that 47 of the 63 medical school deans who had answered an association questionnaire were solidly behind Federal aid to medical education. The deans pointed out that only 5,050 medical students were being trained each year, not enough to replace even the doctors who retired or died each year. Because of inadequate funds, they reported, they were rejecting 9 out of 10 applicants. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 13, 1950, p. 10116 ff.: August 30, p. 13904 ff.)

Despite all these protests, and despite the recent passage of medical draft in order to get enough doctors for the limited demands of the Korean conflict, the AMA continues its opposition to Federal aid to medical education.

13. In its advertising campaign, the AMA trumpets its support of voluntary health insurance as the American way. For 15 years, the AMA attacked voluntary plans as "socialism, communism—inciting to revolution"; Blue Cross was dismissed "as a half-baked scheme * * * the mechanization of medical practice"; restrictive laws against group health insurance were pushed through in 25 States by the AMA. (Restrictions on Free Enterprise in Medicine, the Committee on Research in Medical Economics, April 1949.)

Has the AMA attitude changed? In 1950, the AMA cut the heart out of a plan to assist the organization of voluntary insurance plans sponsored by unions, cooperatives, and other lay consumer bodies. It sticks to its old stand—all plans must be approved by the country or State medical societies, the selfsame societies which, for years, have blocked consumer-sponsored plans.

14. The AMA also opposed the school health services bill (S. 1411) passed by the Senate in 1949. AMA representatives testified that to treat sick children, without first subjecting their parents to a means test, would be unwise. The AMA's stand was taken in the fact of overwhelming testimony from sources of medical experts on the poor health of the Nation's children—500,000 have orthopedic or spastic defects, 500,000 have rheumatic fever, 175,000 have active tuberculosis, 1,000,000 have defective hearing, 4,000,000 have visual defects, 20,000,000 have dental defects, etc.

15. The AMA also opposed the permanent disability section contained in the social-security bill (H. R. 600) after it had been approved by the House. The AMA representative stated: "The program proposed in H. R. 6000 will adversely influence the patient's desire for recovery." Yet back in 1933, the AMA said exactly the reverse. It supported disability insurance "as it has distinct influence toward recovery and tends to reduce permanent disability."

16. Federal aid to local public-health units, title V of the Truman health program, was passed unanimously by the Senate in August 1949. It has since been condemned by AMA spokesmen because it would have permitted grants for work in chronic diseases and such other fields as might be considered necessary by the Surgeon General. This, AMA spokesmen said, might allow broadening of public-health services beyond limits the AMA considers acceptable. This testimony was given in the face of contrary testimony from many leading doctors and public-health officers which indicate alarming shortages in the public-health picture, one county in three in the United States does not have a full-time public health department, and 40,000,000 people live in these counties.

17. President Truman sought last year, and again this year, to make the Federal Security Administration a regular Government department, as recommended by the Hoover Commission. The AMA organized flying caravans of doctors who lobbied in Washington against the bill. The bill was defeated.

18. The Defense Department requested Congress to pass a bill to give Government medical care to dependents of men in the Armed Forces, with particular reference to the situation of the men fighting in Korea. The American Medical Association blasted the proposal as "impractical and harmful to national defense."

19. In a recent issue of Ripley's Believe It or Not (the $1,000 if it isn't true column), there appeared the statement that Dr. Agnaz Semmelweis (1819–65), of Vienna, was hounded into an insane asylum for suggesting that doctors should wash their hands.

I sincerely suggest at this time that Omaha doctors should not come into the forum of public opinion with a trumpeting of elephant lies but with clean hands and not hands stained with inordinate greed and piggish selfishness.

Are you people going to believe the leaders of the AMA now, in the light of their most reactionary record in the past? The present campaign is a spearhead and a cloak and shield for the reactionary selfish and greedy Republicans and Democrats who should be thrashed verbally by everyone and driven into the political woods for all time to come.

Their campaign is a campaign of lies. The authorities whom they cite and quote are liars. I am sure I have diagnosed their cases properly when I say that they are pathological and psychopathic liars.

Please help me to thwart the objectives of these evil men.

Combating Crime in 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 8 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a speech delivered by the Honorable deLesseps S. Morrison, mayor of New Orleans, before the American Municipal Congress in Washington, D. C., on December 4, 1950.

This address sets forth some of the progress that has been made combating organized crime in the United States during the last year. The noteworthy progress is the result of a combination of efforts of Federal agencies, State and local enforcement officers, and the United States Congress. It will be recalled that last year when Mr. Morrison was president of the American Municipal Association he first suggested the creation of a special committee in Congress to explore the interstate crime picture with the view of further Federal legislation to help with the problem.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In September of 1949, the American Municipal Association became the first governmental organization to express its interest and concern over the existence and problem of organized crime and gambling on a Nation-wide basis.

By direction of the AMA board, Carl H. Chatters, on September 20, 1949, petitioned the United States Department of Justice, setting forth the problem and asking for cooperative action by all levels of Government, with the Attorney General coordinating the proposed program. This was the kickoff for all that has happened since.

Shortly thereafter, we further advanced our plans at the AMA convention in Cleveland in December of 1949. Our delegates heard an expert description of syndicated rackets and crime by Virgil Peterson, executive director of the Chicago Crime Commission, and resolutions were adopted setting forth a course of action.

Not long afterward, in early 1950, Attorney General McGrath called the first conference of organized crime ever to be held in this country. Our president, Mayor Quigg Newton, of Denver, was elected temporary chairman and then chairman of the executive continuing committee. Other AMA representatives were Mayors Bowron, of Los Angeles, Cobo, of Detroit, Darst, of St. Louis, and myself.

The statement which I had the honor to present for AMA contained 10 concrete recommendations—incidentally, there were the only specific recommendations for action presented to the Attorney General's conference.

In the light of what has happened since, I wish to summarize briefly what AMA proposed: We asked for development of a coordinated master plan of action on the whole system of Nation-wide rackets at the Federal, State, and local levels. We strongly supported the Kefauver bill, then awaiting an appropriation. We proposed legislation to outlaw interstate transmission of race results for illegal purposes and to prohibit interstate shipment of slot machines and other gambling devices.

We suggested directives and legislation, if necessary, to permit the FBI to lend aid and information to State and local officials—beyond the cooperation that already existed. We asked for amendments to immigration laws to permit revocation of citizenship of naturalized aliens at any time after discovery of fraud or perjury in naturalization proceedings.

AMA also recommended complete and continuing tax investigations of income of known racketeers and hoodlums, and most important—we proposed that the hitherto closed income-tax records be opened to Federal and local investigators in the cases of known police characters and ex-convicts. And throughout it all, we offered the services of AMA as a coordinating agency for intercity exchange of information and action.

You all know the results of these recommendations. They certainly prove that we were on the right track. There were many at first who scoffed—who impugned our motives and who criticized this new venture into the field of fighting cooperatively against syndicated crime. But succeeding developments have proved our case. The bill to ban interstate shipment of slot machines, on which Mayors Bowron, Devin, Woolfarth, and I testified, is expected to be finally passed by Congress in the next few days. This is an important forward step.

Senate concurrence in a conference committee report and Presidential approval will make it a law. The companion bill—the most important one—interstate transmission of gambling information—already approved by the Senate Commerce Committee, is pending on the Senate calendar.

The Kefauver committee, established last May with a $150,000 appropriation, has been extremely effective and has accomplished a great deal already.

Out of the hearings of the Kefauver committee investigation there have emerged six vital facts:

1. The existence of wealthy, predatory, highly organized racketeering-gambling combinations controlled by a handful of bosses has been proved. So has their effect on local law-enforcement officials in certain areas.

2. For the first time, a highly organized effort at all levels of Government and with citizen support is being waged to contain and defeat the potent, organized forces of the underworld.

3. In addition to the proved existence of national operators, and their tie-ups with public officials for operating privileges, we see evidence of another key point: the investment by racketeers of money in legitimate business for the triple purpose of disguising illegal operations, attempting to obtain respectability, and provide sound investment nest eggs for their retirement from the rackets. This desire for respectability, with its attendant contributions to charitable and civic causes, in itself deserves a further study.

4. The problem of local law enforcement is complicated by the directing and financing of the racketeers behind the scenes and beyond the jurisdiction of local officials.

5. The public hearings, Presidential cooperation by opening income-tax records to the Kefauver committee, resignations, convictions, and focusing of public attention on these dramatic events—all this has caused a definite trend in national and local thinking. The people in cities and towns all over America are awakening. This revival or return to the old and true values on which this Nation was founded is indeed a healthy, wholesome, and wonderful thing. It is by far the single most important thing that has resulted from the long train of events set off by this association's first interest in the problem of interstate crime and its effect on government at all levels.

6. Today, when a citizen in any city places a bet with a local bookie or buys a lottery ticket, he knows that his transaction is more than a local matter. He knows that the local gambler is but an end product of a huge and efficient industry whose direction and financing extends far beyond his city limits. It is therefore imperative that all the people and their public officials appreciate this fact.

Here, let me reiterate what AMA has always stressed—that participating in this national, cooperative movement for good does not relieve the local official in any way of his duty to enforce the laws of his community.

However, for the first time, the honest, conscientious municipal official who is frustrated and handicapped by national gambling bosses or local satellites operating just beyond his jurisdiction—today has a powerful ally of his own. In small cities, as well as large, municipal officials must consider themselves partners in a national effort to expose and overcome those whose continued activities compound and make more difficult their local enforcement problem.

In conclusion, we have in 1 year come a long way in a significant and effective fight in our Nation's history for the establishment and maintenance of good government. I believe this association should be proud of its part in this fight.

But the fight is not yet won. The enemy is definitely damaged, and he is on the run. But he is accomplished at concealment and diversionary tactics. He no longer carries guns or talks out of the side of his mouth. He dresses well, is seen with the right people, is advised by high priced legal and public relations counsel; and he is a smart, resourceful, tenacious fighter who knows no rules. It is important to note that only one of the high echelon of his number has thus far been convicted—Frank Erikson, the national bookmaker.

The other major figures—the Costellos and Kastels, the Capone heirs, of Chicago, and Florida, the Dragnas and Cohens, of California, the Binaggio heirs, of Kansas City, and their associates and allies in half the States of this Nation must be exposed, punished and emasculated of their influence. Whenever possible, they should be deported, to join their associate, Luciano, in Italy.

This fight cannot be relaxed for one moment. It must be carried forward aggressively on every front. New Federal legislation, the continued activity of the Kefauver committee, strong law enforcement at all levels, and the maintenance of citizen interest can wipe out a monopolistic, antisocial, economically unhealthy, and undemocratic industry founded on greed, human frailty, terror, special privileges, and corruption.

I urge the American Municipal Association to give its continued support to this fight and to the magnificent work being achieved by the Kefauver committee.

The Omaha Doctors' First Newspaper Advertising Barrage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, on October 11, 1950, the so-called Healing Arts Committee, which it was represented, was made up of doctors, dentists, druggists, pharmacists, nurses, optometrists, chiropodists, and others, opened up their first newspaper barrage in the Omaha World-Herald by running almost a full page advertisement on page 16 of the evening issue. These advertisements were as follows:

Who runs America? the Congress? the President? or you and the man next door?

There then appears a drawing of an eagle on the wing with head turned to the right, which, according to Roman tradition, indicates honor, and underneath that head, indicating honor, three stars and five black squares appear. Just what the black squares are for I do not know, but as to the three stars that must be in honor of Three Star Hennessy, a truly fine, old brandy, which perhaps inspired the writing of the following advertisement:

Running America is the joint job of 150,000,000 people. It's the biggest job in the world today—keeping it running for liberty and for freedom. And the whole world's watching to see whether Americans can do it.

In much of the world today, the people have resigned from running their own countries. Others have been quick to step in—first with promises of security—and then with whips and guns—to run things their way. The evidence is on every front page in the world, every day.

FREEDOM COMES UNDER ATTACK

The reality of war has made every American think hard about the things he's willing to work and fight for—and freedom leads the list.

But that freedom has been attacked here recently—just as it has been attacked in other parts of the world. One of the most serious threats to individual freedom has been the threat of Government-dominated compulsory health insurance, falsely presented as a new guaranty of health security for everybody.

THE PEOPLE WEIGH THE FACTS

In the American manner, the people studied the case for socialized medicine—and the case against it.

They found that Government domination of the people's medical affairs under compulsory health insurance means lower standards of medical care, higher payroll taxes, loss of incentive, damage to research, penalties for the provident, rewards for the improvident.

They found that no country on earth can surpass America's leadership in medical care and progress. They found that able doctors, teachers, nurses, and scientists—working in laboratories where science, not politics, is master—are blazing dramatic new trails to health for Americans—and for the world.

THE GRASS ROOTS SIGNALS CONGRESS

In every community in the Nation, people stood up to be counted on this important issue. Thousands of local women's clubs, civic groups, farm, business, religious, taxpayer, medical, educational, and patriotic organizations spoke out—giving the great United States Congress its unmistakable grass-roots signal from home.

And ever watchful, ever sensitive to an alert people, the Congress saw that signal, and heard the people speak out, loud and plain. That's democracy in action. That's the American way.

Today among the 10,000 great organizations on militant public record against compulsory health insurance are: General Federation of Women's Clubs, American Farm Bureau Federation, National Grange, Veterans of Foreign wars, National Conference of Catholic Charities, American Protestant Hospital Association, American Legion, National Association of Small Business Men, United States Chamber of Commerce, National Association of Retail Grocers, National Retail Dry Goods Association, American Bar Association.

Doctors of this Nation are grateful that the people refused to be wooed by the fantastic promises of this un-American excursion into state socialism. Doctors of America are dedicated to serve their fellow citizens at home and their comrades in uniform, wherever service to this Nation may take them. And the thing they stand ready to fight for—to sacrifice for, to die for—is not the alien way of life of socialism, but the prideful security of a free and self-reliant people.

The voluntary way is the American way.

Throughout the Nation, free men and women, working and planning together, are finding the American answer to every question of medical service, care, and cost. Hundreds of voluntary health-insurance plans are in healthy competition—sponsored by doctors, insurance companies, hospitals, fraternal organizations—by industry, agriculture, and labor.

Today in America 70,000,000 people are protected by voluntary health insurance.

Throughout the Nation, families are insuring themselves against the major costs of illness at reasonable, budget-basis prices. Voluntary health insurance takes the economic shock out of illness. Protect your family now.

For information, ask your doctor or your insurance man.

An American's greatest heritage is the right to learn the facts and to speak his mind. Maintained with honor and used with sincerity that right will guarantee forever that—

You and your neighbor run America.

Then appears the sign of an ancient apothecary: the mortar, pestle, and RX.

Filling prescriptions is an important part of our business. But today, for a change, we are taking the liberty of writing one—after long and careful thought. Here it is:

Purchase voluntary health insurance.
Preserve the American medical system.
Protect freedom all along the line.

What's wrong with freedom?

Then appears a sitting eagle, head to the left, perched on a shield upon which are three stars and five black stripes like a polecat.

Our business is selling merchandise—the best we can buy—at the most economical price to you. It's a good business, and we like it.

But being in business in America is more than skillful buying and selling. It's the exercise of a fundamental right—freedom to venture, freedom to plan, freedom to succeed by serving best.

All freedoms stand or fall together. That's why we take our stand today, with the doctors of America, for the voluntary system. At home and abroad it's worth defending.

Healthy, wealthy, and why?

Next is a fiery torch held high in a good right hand.

America is the healthiest great nation in the world. Americans live more abundantly than any people in the world. Why?

Not because somebody passed a law. But because the founding fathers were wise. Because they turned away from dependence on Government. Because they believed that real security is based on individual initiative.

Americans today believe that, too. That is why America is the symbol of human freedom—the bulwark of world liberty.

The strength of America is the product of creative, free initiative. America's health is the best in the world. A free medical profession will keep it so.

Freely, without compulsion, over 70,000,000 Americans have secured the best medical care in the world through voluntary insurance, prepaying the major costs of illness.

We have faith in you, in ourselves, in America.

We believe that most Americans are capable of paying their own bills, planning their own budgets, and mapping their own futures; that most Americans prefer to solve their problems—medical or otherwise—by means of self-reliance, free choice, and voluntary methods; that most Americans will work and fight to preserve freedom, both at home and abroad.

To each of these advertisers I sent the following letter, which was never acknowledged or answered:

I saw your advertisement in the evening Omaha World-Herald of October 11, 1950, in which you stated approvingly, among other things, that "the voluntary way is the American way."

I wish to congratulate you for the stand which you have taken which is in accord with the position I have taken all of the time with reference to this matter, gross misrepresentations to the contrary, notwithstanding.

Like yourselves, I am now and have always been against socialism, socialized medicine, and compulsory health insurance, and even though there is no congressional legislation now pending in the Congress seeking to set up socialism or socialized medicine, I am against any such proposed changes in our form of government, and if there was only one vote cast in the House of Representatives against socialism and socialized medicine, it would be my vote.

I have been consistently opposed also to compulsory health insurance, not because some people seem to think it is a trend toward socialized medicine, but because in many instances it would be an unnecessary insurance duplication and would also, in other instances, be unfair to private insurance companies.

It would be an unnecessary insurance duplication, in my opinion, as far as the following groups are considered: The veterans' of World War I and II, the railroad workers, the packinghouse workers, the metropolitan utilities workers, the Omaha public power district workers, and also other workers having a worth-while company health program for workers.

It would be unfair also to private insurance companies by taking away from them perhaps, insured persons holding policies of insurance in the Blue Cross and Blue Shield, and policy holders in other insurance companies, fraternal and otherwise, who have satisfactory health and accident insurance coverage already.

I am and have been against compulsory health insurance and a supporter of a voluntary-health-insurance plan, erroneous statements to the contrary, notwithstanding. If there must be a Federal voluntary-health-insurance-plan to take care of those who might be regarded as too great a risk for private insurance companies to service, make it a voluntary and not a compulsory matter.

I also believe that in the cases last mentioned, voluntary insurance, payment by the worker and his employer should not be 2 percent of a maximum salary of $4,800, but perhaps 2 percent of a total not to exceed $3,000 to $3,600 in salary, so as to give private insurance companies a chance to continue in business after such a worker has become health-insurance conscious.

From the hearings before the congressional committee, no insurance company objected to such a plan and I believe that even the American Medical Association might favor such a plan.

I also think that every other fair-minded person will support voluntary health insurance and oppose all changes of our Government to a socialistic one, and will also oppose socialized medicine and compulsory health insurance.

Please pardon me for saying it, but to my way of thinking, the unfortunate thing about your expensive advertising program to stress a well-known and remembered truism, that "The American way is the best way," is that you did not use this money to build and aid local clinics, health centers and hospitals, and to fight arthritis, cancer, cerebral palsy, diabetes, epilepsy, heart diseases, multiple sclerosis, poliomyelitis, rheumatism and rheumatic fever, social diseases, tuberculosis, jungle rot, and many other human physical and mental ailments, some of which appear to have medical science completely baffled for the time being.

Once again congratulating you for the expressions contained in your aforementioned advertisement, I remain the only Democratic Congressman in the House of Representatives from Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota, Wyoming, Kansas, and Nebraska.

Yours very truly,

EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN.

Commitments to Foreign Nations Made by a President Without the Knowledge or Consent of the Senate Are Not Binding Upon the Nation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a reason for a reexamination of our foreign policy is convincingly set forth in an article by George Rothwell Brown in this morning's Washington Times-Herald. It follows:

THE POLITICAL PARADE

(By George Rothwell Brown)

America's most humiliating and bitter military disaster, the seeds of which were sown at Yalta by a President of the United States, in a secret betrayal of our ally China to Communist Russia, has left the fate of the United Nations hanging in the balance.

If this debacle continues to grow worse an aroused opinion at the Senate, where ranks without regard to party are closing in the interest of a stronger nationalism, the whole question of the withdrawal of American membership in the UN may be demanded at any time.

It must not be forgotten that the United States joined the United Nations, whose birth was presided over at the San Francisco conference in 1945 by Alger Hiss, the general secretary, when Congress and the people were ignorant of the deadly terms Stalin had dictated to Roosevelt at the Crimean conference earlier in that fateful year.

It is clear in the light of subsequent disclosures that the United States Congress was induced to subscribe to the UN charter by fraud and false pretenses.

The ratification of the UN charter ranks in magnitude of national tragedy with America's entrance into the European war in 1917, when it broke with the historic tradition of Washington and Jefferson, no entangling alliances.

Having ratified the charter in ignorance of the secret surrender Roosevelt had made at Yalta to Stalin, the Senate would be on firm moral and legal grounds in demanding the withdrawal of the United States from the United Nations.

It is necessary to go back into history less than 6 years to establish the fact of the fraud and trickery by which the American Congress was led into the morass with which Russian communism has now engulfed us.

On March 1, 1945, Roosevelt in a dying condition, addressed a joint session of House and Senate to give his report on the Yalta Conference from which he had just returned.

To disarm his audience in almost his opening sentence he assured them that he was speaking in all frankness. Those were his words. We now know he was not speaking frankly, but the contrary.

Towards the close of his address President Roosevelt uttered these misleading words about the Yalta meeting:

"Quite naturally, this conference concerned itself only with the European war and with the political problems of Europe and not with the Pacific war."

That statement was a falsehood, and constitutes the fraudulent basis upon which Congress was induced to join and finance the United Nations, which Roosevelt on this occasion explained briefly, saying that it would be organized a month later at San Francisco.

Roosevelt concealed from Congress the secret deal he had made with Stalin, by which he betrayed Nationalist China, and conceded to Communist Russia, our open enemy today in Asia, the southern half of Sakhalin island, the Kuriles, the nationalization of Dairen, the lease of Port Arthur, and a sell-out in Manchuria.

He began the Korean war.

James F. Byrnes was Roosevelt's principal adviser at Yalta.

But this treacherous agreement with Stalin was kept from him. Byrnes and Admiral King were ordered home.

Alger Hiss remained at Yalta, and stood at Roosevelt's side as the shameful bargain was sealed by the President.

Byrnes knew nothing of this deal until the secret papers were made available to him when he became Secretary of State in Truman's Cabinet after Roosevelt's death. He has since, in 1947, revealed it.

Alger Hiss knew that Roosevelt had been tricked by Stalin at Yalta—to use the least opprobrious word.

Congress did not.

It is entitled to a new look at Lake (God save the mark) Success.

The Significance of the Bicentennial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith the magnificent address of a great American, Thomas J. Tobias, president of congregation K. K. Beth Elohim, Charleston, S. C., and first chairman of the bicentennial planning committee, at the banquet celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the Jewish community in Charleston, Francis Marion Hotel, Charleston, S. C., November 20, 1950. The subject of Mr. Tobias' speech was the significance of the bicentennial.

Mr. Tobias and I have been lifelong friends. We attended high school and college together. His forebears are numbered among Charleston's aristocracy. He is truly the scion of one of America's great pioneering families, and I take genuine pleasure in submitting herewith, under leave to extend my remarks, the address of such a noble man for the benefit of future generations:

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE BICENTENNIAL

I have been asked to tell you something of the background of this bicentennial so that we might understand why we feel this celebration has significance, not alone for the Jewish community here, not alone for Charleston, but for all Americans.

You might well ask why the historical anniversary of a comparatively small Jewish community in a comparatively small southern city has meaning for the busy millions who make up America.

For one thing, you can count on the fingers of one hand the Jewish communities of this Nation which are as old as Charleston's. Just as surely as other groups date their beginnings from a comparative handful of original settlers, so can the American Jew, whatever the time of his arrival, look back to roots as deep as any who make up this land of immigrants.

This bicentennial dramatizes the long and continuous life of the Jew in America. It is also a salute to the American spirit which has made possible a long and fruitful life in this country of ours.

It can be said that the secret strength of America lies in the unique manner in which peoples of many origins who have come to these shores early or late have had the freedom and opportunity to contribute physically, intellectually, and spiritually without being crushed into a mold of uniformity. E pluribus unum (one from many) is an appropriate motto for America. The content of our national heritage is fed from many springs and not dependent on a single source for its power and destiny.

The local events of this bicentennial celebration are the culmination of a lot of planning and a lot of work by a lot of people.

With a restraint unusual in the celebration of such historic anniversaries, the Charleston Jewish community has chosen to date its beginnings not from the first mention of a Jew in this city in 1695, but rather from the founding of the first Jewish organization in Charleston, in this case, the Hassell Street congregation, Kahal Kadosh Beth Elohim, in 1750.

There were those who saw in this bicentennial a broader concept than the commemoration of this historic anniversary of a single institution. They recognized that the founding of Beth Elohim some twoscore years before the birth of the United States itself marked the beginning of organized Jewish life here. So this bicentennial has the unique quality of being celebrated as the jubilee of an American Jewish community and not alone as the historic milestone of one congregation.

I might say that in joining hands to bring this concept to life, the Jews of Charleston have themselves achieved something historic. Here the traditional individualism of the Jew everywhere is linked to the traditional individualism of the Charlestonian. There is the well-known maxim that the only thing two Jews ever agree on is what a third Jew should give to charity. Often we Jews of Charleston cannot agree on that.

Another notable feature of this celebration is the cooperation and help volunteered by so many non-Jewish individuals and organizations. It is a tribute to the friendly relations which have existed so long in this city of ours, and will be remembered with appreciation and pride. Charleston Jews have never lived isolated or in a vacuum but have been part and parcel of their city—sharing in civic activities and responsibilities from early times. Charleston has always welcomed the participation of its Jewish citizens and aided their causes.

The spirit of the bicentennial is symbolized in the various events which climax this week.

We have seen the publication of the Jews of Charleston, by Charles Reznikoff and Dr. U. Z. Engelman, which tells in its 343 pages the long and honorable story of the Charleston Jewish community set in the background of the general community. At a public book review held last week at the Free Library, a distinguished panel of reviewers declared it to be both an interesting and a valuable contribution to the history of Charleston and America.

Many of you saw this afternoon the impressive dedication of a plaque in city hall park to the brilliant young Revolutionary patriot, Francis Salvador, who served in the Provincial Congress which set up this State, and was the first Jew in the Western World to hold important public office and the first to die for American independence. He stands as a fitting symbol of Jewish participation in the creation of this State and Nation. The cooperation of city officials, patriotic organizations, and our own General Summerall, the speaker, in placing this memorial to Salvador beside other historic monuments in city hall park is dramatic evidence of Charleston's recognition of the contribution of this gallant young American patriot, who was also a Jew.

Tomorrow night there will open at the Dock Street Theater for a series of performances an original play with music, written and produced by Sam Byrd. It is an absorbing dramatization of Charleston's history and its Jewish community. Its mood is gay and amusing and brings history to life in an amazing way. For Those Who Live in the Sun is a play which every Charlestonian should see.

On Friday night, the religious aspect of this celebration will be observed with a joint service of the four Jewish congregations of the city to be held at Beth Elohim synagogue, with the noted Dr. Alla Hillel Silver, as speaker.

During the week exhibits of paintings, ceremonial objects, books, and documents are being shown at the Gibbes Art Gallery, the Charleston Museum, and the two libraries of the city.

National attention has been attracted by this celebration. Yesterday, the Church of the Air featured the bicentennial on its national CBS program, with Mayor Morrison and Rabbi Tarshish as speakers. Numerous articles have appeared in publications throughout the country.

While the visible events of this celebration symbolize much of its meaning, a brief glance at some of the things which help make up the heritage and tradition of the Jew in Charleston, and his relations with his neighbors, further points up the significance of this historic anniversary.

I first want to pay tribute to a man who had most to do with establishing here the climate of religious freedom which early attracted Jewish settlers, as well as French Hugenots, and others seeking that basic human right. He was John Locke, the great English liberal philosopher, who as friend and adviser to Lord Ashley Cooper, chief of the Lords Proprietors, drafted the original constitution of this colony. While Locke's draft never became the law of the land because of provisions which ran contrary to frontier conditions, its spirit of liberty and tolerance became a tradition which has endured until today. We have too long neglected to honor John Locke. I salute his memory at this bicentennial banquet. He helped start Charleston off right.

In the year 1695, just 25 years after Charleston was settled, and 15 years after the tiny settlement moved from across the Ashley to its present location, Governor Archdale tells us of the first Jew here of whom we have written knowledge. We do not know his name. We only know the service he performed. When some captive Spanish-speaking Florida Indians were brought before the Governor, he writes: "I had a Jew as an interpreter." So through the aid of this unknown early Charleston Jewish citizen who spoke Spanish the Governor was able to gather information from these Indians. The Jews of Charleston, through the dim curtain of history, had begun to play their part in the life of the community.

Let us skip now to the year 1756, when there came to Charles Town from London aboard the Charming Nancy, a Jewish merchant of indigo, no longer young but filled with ability, energy, and courage. His name was Moses Lindo and he carved an honorable niche for himself through his contributions to our colonial prosperity. Indigo, planted with success by that remarkable woman, Eliza Lucas, was, next to rice, the greatest source of revenue in the colony. It was Lindo who, through his knowledge and skill, helped make the Carolina dyestuff acceptable in world markets through proper sorting and grading and setting of standards. Carolina indigo brought more money in world markets after Lindo graded and placed his stamp upon it. He was appointed by the Governor surveyor and inspector general of indigo for the province upon recommendation of the leading planters and merchants. Lindo himself profited little from his great service. His estate was appraised at only £1,200 at his death in 1774.

If we look at the period of the American Revolution, we find that the Jews of Charleston gave their lives and their property to the fight for liberty along with their fellow citizens. Francis Salvador was most conspicuous, but there were many others.

One Revolutionary soldier exemplifies the words of the World War II song, Praise the Lord and Pass the Ammunition. Abraham Alexander had been serving for some years as rabbi of Congregation Beth Elohim when the Revolution came. He promptly volunteered and was commissioned a lieutenant of dragoons, serving with distinction in Sumter's brigade, one of the most active in the Revolution. He successfully combined the talents of a minister and a soldier.

We find a touch of humor in an eighteenth-century advertisement which shows one of the early Jewish settlers here as proprietor of the "Irish Coffee Shop in Broad Street." Some say this laid the foundations of the intimate fellowship between the Irish and the Jews of Charleston, reflected today in the roster of the Hibernian Society, which lists about as many Cohens as Connolleys.

An incident in the year 1790, small in itself, is not without significance as an item in the heritage of the Jews of Charleston. Christopher Knight, a delegate to the State constitutional convention, grateful for the support of some Jews of this city, sent Beth Elohim congregation 50 guineas to "serve the poor or be of any use in respect to the congregation." The trustees wrote Knight expressing the congregation's appreciation of his good intentions, but returning the gift, which, they said, could not be accepted "as it may be suggested at some future period that the members of our community were to be bought."

This incident might well be placed alongside another. The Charleston Courier of October 1, 1832, contained a letter signed by 84 Jews of the city taking exception to charges that the Jews sought representation as such in the State legislature and were united for a particular candidate.

"We will not support any man for office," the letter said, "who is not selected by the public for himself, his character, and his talents. * * * We discountenance the idea of selecting an individual for office, either of profit or honor, upon the grounds that such individual belongs to a particular sect, with the view of securing or influencing the suffrage of such sect."

In this day when the practice of bloc voting in many parts of the country offers a threat to democratic suffrage, these incidents seem to have a significance which extends beyond the borders of Charleston.

In 1794, at the consecration of the Hasell Street synagogue (later destroyed by fire to be replaced by the present building in 1840) the ceremonies were attended by General Moultrie, the Revolutionary hero, then Governor, together with civil and military leaders of the State and city, and the occasion was saluted as evidence that the prejudices and weaknesses that have for ages disgraced the human character were here wearing off and that the Jews of Charleston bid fair to flourish and be happy.

Only a few years later Gen. Christopher Gadsden presented the congregation with some rare Hebrew books from his library. In 1843, Christopher G. Memminger, the distinguished Charleston lawyer who later became Secretary of the Treasury of the Confederacy, when retained in a congregational lawsuit, refused any fee for his services since all served the same God.

In 1842 there occurred another interesting episode of interreligicus fellowship. Just before Christmas a collection was made among the members of Beth Elohim in aid of the Protestant Methodist Church on Pitt Street. The letter in acknowledgment read in part:

"We shall ever retain a lively recollection of the friendly interest shown by our fellow citizens for our welfare, to none of whom do we more cheerfully acknowledge our indebtedness than to the descendants of the ancient worthies from whom we received the light of revelation and the oracles of God."

Masonry, with its emphasis on the brotherhood of man, strongly appealed to the Jews who elsewhere were so long excluded from the general brotherhood. The Supreme Council of Scottish Rite Masonry was founded in Charleston in 1801 and four of the nine founders were Jews. They were members of local lodges as early as 1753.

I wish to cite an instance of what might be called an inherited habit of philanthropy. Mordecai Cohen was one of Charleston's great philanthropists of the early nineteenth century, whose contributions to the Charleston Orphan House over a period of 45 years are memorialized with a plaque in the orphan house. Only a few years ago Mrs. Isabel Cohen Doud, Mordecai Cohen's granddaughter, willed to the College of Charleston some $200,000, its largest single bequest.

We can instance many other individuals, episodes of civic and patriotic service and actions of honor and fellowship in the long intertwined history of Charleston and its Jewish citizens.

The parade of incidents from the past is not given to exalt the role of the Jew in the history of Charleston above the contribution of its many other groups. Even in the year 1800 when Charleston had the largest Jewish population of any American city of the time, there were only 500 Jews living here. They have always been a comparatively small group in the general community. It has taken 200 years to achieve this bicentennial. The Jews of Charleston have the right and the obligation to tell of their experience both as Jews and as Americans.

In bringing these remarks to a close, I think it appropriate to read from a historic letter. When George Washington was inaugurated as the first President of the United States in 1790 the Jews of Charleston wrote him a letter of congratulations. In his reply, Washington said in part:

"The liberality of sentiment toward each other which marks every political and religious denomination of man in this country stands unparalleled in the history of nations. May the same temporal and eternal blessings which you implore for me rest upon your congregation."

The spirit expressed in Washington's letter to the Jews of Charleston has endured. Jews have lived here in peace and security for more than 200 years, in harmony with their neighbors, and in full and active participation in the life of their city, their State, and their country.

Today, when men of good will are seeking ways and techniques for peoples everywhere to live together in justice and in peace, Charleston stands as a living demonstration that this can be done. The bicentennial of the Jewish community of Charleston celebrates the working of the American heritage over a period of two centuries in one American city. It has value and meaning to all of us here in Charleston and for all America.

The Importance of Standards

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of the two hundredth anniversary of the Jewish community of Charleston, S. C., there assembled a group which had the distinguished privilege of hearing one of America's great naval officers and statesmen—Admiral Lewis Strauss.

It is unnecessary to gild the lily. Nevertheless, I want the records of the Congress of the United States to contain for future generations what this great American said at that time.

The subject of Admiral Strauss' address was on the importance of standards.

This outstanding American has held important positions in the Department of the Navy during World War II under the late illustrious James Forrestal. Because of his great mind and tremendous capacity for leadership and his extraordinary vision, he quickly was elevated from the position of commander to the rank of rear admiral—a feat almost without precedent. Subsequent to the cessation of hostilities he served with great distinction on the Atomic Energy Commission. At the present time he is head of the Rockefeller Foundation.

I consider it an honor to know this great American. I consider it a privilege to be his personal friend. My people are grateful that they were able to listen to his words of wisdom.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith the address of Admiral Strauss. It follows:

ON THE IMPORTANCE OF STANDARDS

"Man doth not live by bread only." (Deuteronomy viii: 3.)

"Those who would treat politics and morality apart will never understand the one or the other." (Viscount John Morley.)

"Men of character," wrote Emerson, "are the conscience of the society to which they belong." From which it easily follows that a community of character may become the conscience of the Nation of which it is a part.

These are days of astonishing material progress. We have everything—and too much of a great deal of it, except peace of mind. We have new drugs and antibiotics, new vehicles, new weapons, and a new source of energy. The catalog of novelties is a long one. When we lay aside our newspapers, hover, and switch off the radio and television, then in the few remaining minutes between prayer and sleep—a good many of us wonder why we are not supremely and sublimely happy. It could be because we have everything material yet fear that we are losing the nonmaterial—the nonmaterial and most essential ingredient of the good life—a good conscience.

A good conscience, individually and communally, is bound up with the maintenance of standards. South Carolina's great statesman, John C. Calhoun, put it thus: "In estimating the power of a community, moral as well as physical causes must be calculated." What are the moral causes, the standards, that are important? The answer to that question is appropriate to the occasion which we are celebrating this evening because an examination of them can be made "in vivo" as the biologist would say, within the life and history of the proud and vigorous 200-year-old Jewish community of this historic city.

The value of physical standards is debated by no one. They are so much a part of our daily lives that we take them for granted. Civilized communities could not exist for very long without them. Business could not be conducted without fixed, and reliable, and recognized standards of weight and measurement. These cannot be permitted to vary from region to region within the country. The inch, the acre, and the pound and all the rest must not only be the same everywhere but must be the same, tomorrow and the next day, as they were yesterday. We go to great lengths to insure this. Standards are not left to the judgment of an individual or to custom. They are the subject of international agreement to which the civilized people of the earth subscribe and in vaults in the capital of this Nation rest our jealously guarded bars of metal and other shapes which are the standard originals of the duplicates that every man may possess and use.

Now, as it happens, no one may handle or even touch these physical standards. By so little as the heat of the body or the moisture of a fingertip, they would alter their accuracy and no longer be what they were.

In this respect only, they resemble the nonmaterial and far more important standards upon which civilization largely depends and without which a government of free men is impossible. But no vault can contain our standards of probity in political life—of responsibility in communal affairs—of integrity in private careers—of philanthropy—or of patriotism. And these standards, also, cannot be touched, handled, weighed or measured.

We know one other thing about them. They cannot exist in the abstract—in the cold stratosphere of pure ethic. They require a living belief by men in a Supreme Being—religion if you will. As George Washington said, " * * * reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle."

Religious principle derives from the Bible, which was the inspiration for American democracy, and those Jews, who helped settle what were these bare shores more than two centuries ago as well as those who followed in later years brought the Bible with them as did the other colonists. Engraved upon their hearts among its other precepts were the words of the Prophet Jeremiah who defined the duties and responsibilities of citizenship in these classic sentences: "Build ye houses and dwell in them, and plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them, take ye wives and beget sons and daughters * * * and seek the peace of the city whither I have caused you to go * * * and pray unto the Lord for it; for in the peace thereof, ye shall have peace."

There is no better testimony of the adherence to such standard than the devotion of this community to the interests of the State and of the Nation. From the yellowed and aging documents of colonial history springs afresh the gallant figure of Francis Salvador whose memory we honored this afternoon when General Summerall, a great patriot and soldier of our own day dedicated the tablet which commemorated Salvador's service in the First and Second Provincial Congresses and his heroic death in 1776. The first Jewish soldier to give his life for American liberty, Salvador was the spiritual progenitor of a long list of sons of this community who fought, and who died in the Revolution, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the War Between the States, the war with Spain, and in the World Wars. There were Maj. Raphael Moses, of the staff of General Longstreet—but one cannot name them all and one should not single them out. The list is too long for recital and the most recent names upon it would touch wounds as yet fresh and unhealed. But their names are not forgotten—the memory of the brave and the good is "like honey in the mouth."

In times of war and national emergency, the flame of patriotism naturally burns brightest. What of the conduct of this community in the day-to-day traffic of national and local affairs? Is the standard of political probity consonant with the standard of patriotic fervor? I give you an example. In 1832 it was rumored that the Jewish community of Charleston wished to be represented as a religious sect in the Legislature of South Carolina. Upon hearing this, a committee, styling themselves Eighty-four Israelites, and possibly comprising most of the heads of families in the city, issued a statement from which I now quote: "We discountenance the idea of selecting any individual for office, either of profit or honor, upon the ground that such individual belongs to a particular sect, with a view of securing or of influencing the suffrages of such sect. * * * While we are sensible that there are gentleman among us who would do no discredit to any station, public or private, we will not support any man for office who is not selected by the public for himself, his character, and his talents."

A repudiation of improper politics has perhaps never been stated more vigorously, courageously, and succinctly. Let us now examine another standard.

The civic standard of philanthropy needs no exemplification in a community known for its generosity. The ancient precept "separate not thyself from the community" has been the touchstone of this standard, and time and again the congregations that comprise this community have engaged in the Lord's work of aiding the less fortunate of every sect and race. This standard has been more handsomely observed as the community has grown and prospered but it is of venerable precedent, and while the fact is primarily of historic interest, I note that on the wall of the Charleston Orphan House which adjoins this building a tablet memorializes one Mordecai Cohen who departed this life in 1848 and of whom it is recorded that for 10 years he faithfully fulfilled the duties of commissioner of that institution and for 45 years (he must have begun in 1803), contributed annual donations to the comfort of the orphan inmates. Congregation Beth Elohim also contributed liberally as an institution toward the maintenance of that nonsectarian home.

I have cited the foregoing details, not out of an antiquarian interest, but to recall our minds to, and refresh them with, the virtues and standards that make this democracy great. It is because such examples are neither rare nor unique that we have flourished—are what we are. Let us not confuse standards, however, with standardization.

In years gone by it was in vogue to describe the United States as a melting pot—a great cauldron into which people of every nation, creed, and race were poured. The fused product was supposed to be a new breed of man—the American—combining all the best features of all the raw material.

The fallacy of this doctrine of the melting pot is that it suggests the standardization of all Americans. Such uniformity is not obtainable and would be undesirable even if it could be achieved. There is no typical American. Thomas Jefferson, Roger Williams, Robert E. Lee, Judah P. Benjamin, Woodrow Wilson, and Louis Brandeis, for examples, were unalike and all were great Americans. Each was a member of some different religious or cultural group. From the diversity of talents and traditions springs our national vigor. And the unifying and cementing force is the common respect for the standards which lift men above themselves. Jefferson is identified with public enlightenment and science, Williams with religious liberty, Lee with duty, Brandeis with justice—who can say that one is more important than another. The list could go on and on.

A word in conclusion. This community of Jews was fortunate in the site of their settlement. South Carolina was unique among the British provinces. Under Locke's constitution for this colony, not only was freedom of worship guaranteed but no slightest civil or religious disability was inflicted upon minorities—or has ever been. Thus the first Jewish congregation was freely organized here in 1750, 200 years ago. It was already more than a quarter of a century old when it addressed its famous letter to Gen. George Washington in these significant words: "Various extensive and invaluable are the benefits which your fellow citizens have derived from the glorious Revolution, which, under Providence, you have been the principal instrument in effecting. [To us] it has secured the inalienable rights of human nature—all the privileges and immunities of freedom, and has placed within [our] reach, peace, plenty, and the other blessings of good government. To the equal participation and enjoyment of all these, it has raised us from the state of political degradation and grievous oppression, to which partial, narrow and illiberal policy and intolerant bigotry has reduced us in almost every other part of the world. Peculiar and extraordinary reason have we, therefore, to be attached to the free and generous constitution of our respective states."

And here each succeeding generation in their houses of worship has reaffirmed that attachment—a dedication to the principles and standards that have become the spring and the source, the focus and the pattern for communities throughout the length and breadth of this land.

Our American Duty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and an editorial from the Detroit Times of December 5, 1950:

DETROIT TIMES, December 8, 1950.

Hon. ROY O. WOODRUFF,
House of Representatives,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WOODRUFF: Here is an editorial which appeared on page one of the December 5 issue of the Detroit Times. I am sending it to you in the event that you might not have seen that issue of our newspaper.

Mr. Hearst directed all his editors to print the editorial. It reflects his opinion and, he said, he believes it reflects also the opinion of most Americans.

I thought you would be interested in knowing that this editorial caused more comment among Detroit Times readers than any other article we have printed since the outbreak of the Korean war.

The reaction was unanimously favorable. We were besieged by congratulatory telephone calls for 2 days.

We received more letters than we have been able thus far to tabulate and—what is unique in newspaper experience—the deluge of comment contained not a single adverse criticism.

I am,
Respectfully,
JOHN C. MANNING,
Editor.

[From the Detroit Times of December 5, 1950]

OUR AMERICAN DUTY

The blundering and disloyal foreign policies of the New Deal are taking this country into complete disaster—both military and economic.

Our sovereignty has been impaired by making us a virtual vassal of the United Nations, which disrupts our councils, and seeks to fly its mongrel flag over our public buildings.

Our wealth is dissipated to support socialism abroad and to defend alien peoples who are not willing to defend themselves.

The lives of our young men are being sacrificed in a desperate war which our purported allies are not trying to help us win on the battlefields and are conspiring to make us lose in the mazes of diplomacy—and duplicity.

For our own survival, it is imperative that we extricate ourselves from these destroying situations at once.

Without even inadequate support from others in the United Nations, we are fighting almost alone against massed hordes on the Asian Continent.

Continuing the war means only the slaughter of millions in a quixotic American attempt to conquer a vast and distant population.

First and foremost, therefore, this country should withdraw its Armed Forces from the invasion areas.

We should get our troops out of Korea as quickly as possible.

We should come home to our own country, reconstruct our defenses, and give heed to our own security and welfare.

This might be a defeat for the New Deal, which is responsible for our dismal plight.

It would not be a defeat for the United States, but merely an act of self-preservation.

Secondly, we should get out of the United Nations.

That organization has not sustained us in the war that we undertook in its behalf.

Instead, it has interfered with our operations.

Furthermore, it is conniving to admit the enemy into a privileged membership where the enemy could dictate peace terms.

Accordingly, the United Nations should let Red China in—and leave the United States out.

Then let the United Nations see how it gets along.

This country has maintained the United Nations since its inception, with no return in loyalty or gratitude.

So let those who run the United Nations pay for the United Nations—and fight its wars.

Finally, we should end our unrequited efforts to support and supply an ingrate Europe.

Even England, our supposedly stanch ally, has not genuinely backed us in our solitary United Nations war, nor assisted us elsewhere.

On the contrary, Marxist England formally recognized the Chinese Communist Government, and collaborates with Marxist France in preventing a European rearmament.

Europe has intimated it no longer wants our martial help.

This is Europe's attitude. Let Europe look out for itself, and see how Europe gets along.

Since, obviously, we stand alone, we should have the wisdom and the courage to act alone.

For our duty is to protect our own people and to foster our own Nation.

Will Samsons of the GOP Pull the Temple Down?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL D. PERKINS
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Louisville Courier-Journal for December 9, 1950:

WILL SAMSONS OF THE GOP PULL THE TEMPLE DOWN?

The Republican Party is on the very brink of a dangerous action. Next Tuesday is the deadline. On that day all GOP Members of the Senate will meet to decide if they should demand the dismissal of Secretary Acheson as an official act of party policy.

The threat of such a move is most serious. The proposal has been considered by the Republican Policy Committee of the Senate, but the 11 members could not quite decide to take the leap. They referred final decision to the full GOP Senate membership. Meanwhile, even Republicans who have been less hostile to State Department policy are showing a tendency to jump aboard the tumbril. Representative HUGH SCOTT, of Pennsylvania, a former Republican national chairman who tried to lead his party along the middle of the road on foreign policy, has introduced a resolution in the House demanding the ouster of Acheson. Senator IVES, of New York, has suddenly gone into a war dance, screaming for the Secretary's scalp.

This hysteria can do infinite harm. The Republican New York Herald Tribune warns of the shocking effect such an action would have on world opinion at a moment when "the Secretary is in the midst of negotiations of the most delicate and far-reaching kind." The paper calls attention to "the single-mindedness with which the British Nation has backed its own envoy," Clement Attlee, in his mission to Washington. Think of the impact on American opinion of Winston Churchill, who vigorously opposes the Labor Party on domestic issues, led a Conservative Party movement to denounce and destroy

Attlee at the moment when he is negotiating on the gravest issues in Washington.

The Courier-Journal has supported Dean Acheson as a man of courage, character, and ability. Even if we did not have faith in him, however, we would regard an official Republican effort to blackjack man out of office at such a moment as an act of shocking and dangerous irresponsibility.

The drive against Acheson is completely negative. What other man would Republican critics put in his place at this juncture, who could command unified national support? What foreign policy would the destroyers of Acheson have the Nation pursue? Many of them who were candidates in November stormed for a "tougher" policy of dealing with the Soviets, while insisting that they represented the party that would certainly keep us out of war. There is no unity of thought on a constructive foreign policy within the Republican Party today. It bids fair to unite only on a course of pure destruction.

Republican strong men seem bent on pulling down the temple of foreign policy over our heads in order to crush one individual, Dean Acheson. Surely there are sober Republican leaders who have not been stampeded by bad news from Korea. Surely such leaders realize that the course of events in Asia and the rest of the world cannot be magically changed by the removal of one Democrat from office. Surely such leaders see that official Republican repudiation of Acheson would leave America standing naked before the world as a nation at war with itself in a moment of infinite danger. Governor Dewey has taken a lead in his statement that "this is not the time for further criticism" of the administration's far eastern policies, with which he has vigorously disagreed in more normal times. It is to be fervently hoped that other Republican leaders will make their voices heard in the wilderness before Tuesday.

The Right To Know—Tell Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Detroit Free Press of December 8, 1950:

THE RIGHT TO KNOW—TELL CONGRESS

The Senators who demand that President Truman obtain the Senate's "advice and consent" before making any agreements or understandings with Prime Minister Attlee are looking out for their country's interests.

They don't want any more Munichs or Yaltas—any more hole-in-the-wall, secret agreements for which American boys must later die on foreign soil.

They want to know in advance what further commitments are proposed—and so do the American people, already paying a high price in blood and treasure for decisions by "heads of states," without consent of the governed.

An end must be put to the assumption that the prerogative of the President to initiate foreign policy includes ignoring Congress in concluding binding agreements that this Nation subsequently must carry out at whatever cost to it.

The trend of the Attlee-Truman "talks" is lost in double talk.

Attlee's "blood - is - thicker - than - water" speech to the National Press Club was a masterpiece of diplomatic obfuscation.

Great Britain and the United States, Attlee says, are united in a determination to stop Communist aggression but differ as to the place where "emphasis" is to be put.

The leader of a nation only now emerging from the tragic consequences of Munich ought to have learned there is only one way to stop aggression. That is to stop it. Appeasement won't do it.

The British, for mercenary reasons, were willing to shake the bloody hand of Mao Tze-tung, as soon as he gained military control of China. The American people were not.

Attlee now defends his course in Peiping as facing reality. The reality was a heavy British investment in China, and the Crown Colony of Hong Kong, where British subjects have been doing a whale of a business importing and transshipping vital materials for Red China and Russia. At one time Russia was getting more Malayan rubber by this route than the United States was obtaining.

Yet in order to protect its commercial interests Great Britain has been trying to get China's seat in the UN Security Council for the Commies and now wants to sell out the UN by dickering with the Chinese Reds, while they are pressing their aggression in Korea and the UN forces are being pushed back.

The British frame of mind has been clearly revealed in recent statements by British statesmen at home and in last week's debate in the Commons. What it amounts to is this:

Give the Communists all of Asia if they want it, if by so doing they can be persuaded to go on buying and selling with Great Britain.

Attlee says geographical facts must be considered. That's true. Great Britain faces the enemy in only one direction. At its back is the Atlantic Ocean and the might of America.

The United States faces two oceans, with an enemy glowering at it across both of them.

Yet the British—Churchill and his followers, as well as Attlee and his—are determined to convince the United States that its salvation lies in putting all its eggs in the European basket.

The Chinese Communist regime is now fighting in Korea to destroy a state set up as a UN protectorate. That's aggression in any man's dictionary. The Reds have flouted every principle of the UN Charter.

Yet the British Government, while professing to be of one mind with the United States is opposing aggression everywhere, actually condones and abets it in Korea.

Where does that leave the UN? Where does it leave the United States?

The British have talked about our responsibility to assume world leadership. When they get a taste of it, and it doesn't follow the line of their self-interest, they denounce it and seek to depart from it.

Any compromise with Stalin and Mao while the Commies have us on the run in Korea means the end of the United Nations for any useful purpose.

Aggression will have been rewarded.

The fate of Europe at the hands of a vastly strengthened Stalin will then have passed beyond our power to save it.

The American people have a right to know if this is what is being cooked up for them and their children and their children's children before it is signed, sealed, and delivered.

"Truman Doctrine Has Failed"—Lippmann

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, friends of the President will not say that Walter Lippmann is an isolationist. However, in an article today he calls the Truman doctrine a failure and a great mistake, which it is, of course. As part of my remarks, I am including the Lippmann article:

WITHDRAWAL AND REEXAMINATION

(By Walter Lippmann)

Mr. Attlee's talks with Mr. Truman will have achieved all that is possible at the present moment if they have averted any of those irreversible decisions which are threatening to break up the Atlantic alliance in Europe and the United Nations front in Asia.

Mr. Attlee came to Washington not only as the Prime Minister of Britain, but as the spokesman of the Commonwealth and of our allies in continental Europe. The reason he came so suddenly is that throughout the world our friends are afraid that to the defeat in Korea we might react blindly and impulsively rather than with foresight and deliberation.

Mr. Attlee came because our allies were afraid, not without provocation from here, that we might jump out of the North Korean frying pan into the fire of a far-eastern war. Were we to do that, the governments which might feel in honor bound to follow us would not be able to carry their peoples with them. Our only ardent ally would be Chiang Kai-shek. The great objective of Soviet diplomacy would then be achieved. The United States would be isolated from its allies and all its power and influence diverted up the bloody blind alley of a far-eastern war.

While the armies are retreating in Korea, the right thing to do and the best thing to do about all the larger questions of policy is to make no irreparable decisions—no far-reaching promises and no wide-ranging threats—under the stress of emotion and in order to relieve, not our hard-pressed army, but our own feelings. Until the military position in Korea is settled one way or another, we cannot reasonably, and in prudence we should not tie our hands by making concessions or by making threats. The time for critical decisions about a larger war or a larger settlement will not come until General MacArthur has consolidated a line inside Korea or has evacuated his forces from Korea.

It cannot possibly help General MacArthur and his troops to enlarge the war. They will not be better off if in addition to the Chinese ground armies they also have to contend with large elements of the Soviet air force and of the Soviet navy. Nor can the military position be retrieved or much improved by conceding now things which would be elements in any general negotiation.

My own view is that our paramount and immediate preoccupation should be the preservation of our forces, and that our aim should be to effect an orderly withdrawal to Japan. Then, with salt water between us and the Chinese-Soviet masses, there will again be a military equilibrium between the infantry of the Asian mainland and the naval and air power of the United States.

Then, and only then, it seems to me, will it be possible to carry out that reexamination and revision of our global policy which is imperative if we are to avert the disruption of our alliances and the disintegration of the Atlantic community. The defeat in Korea is a warning which, if we heed it, may yet prove to have been our salvation, that the course which we took with the Truman doctrine is based on a fatally wrong estimate of our adversaries, and of our friends, and of ourselves.

Then, too, and only then, I fear, can we repair and restore the fearful damage which our institutions have suffered as a consequence of that great mistake. For our inability to make good the global promises of the Truman doctrine precipitated the fearful quarrel within the Nation and between the parties over where our limited forces should be committed.

In the course of that quarrel the constitutional system for the conduct of United States foreign policy has been so seriously shaken that it is no longer clear where, if anywhere, resides the authority to conduct the foreign relations of the United States. This has caused a profound crisis of confidence, as it would in any nation where the people no longer knew where to look for leadership in time of trouble.

Be Alert—Red Sabotage Threat and Double Talk

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix to the RECORD, I wish to submit an article by Fendall Yerxa and Odgen R. Reid, written for the New York Herald Tribune, Inc., and published in the New Orleans, La., Item of December 7, 1950, as follows:

RED SABOTAGE THREAT—REDS AIM TO INFILTRATE STRATEGIC INDUSTRIES

(By Fendall Yerxa and Odgen R. Reid)

The national committee of the Communist Party recently ordered all State party committees to conduct an intensive concentration drive to place party members in heavy industry.

Subversive infiltration of key labor unions is now a top priority.

The national order directed, for example, Communists in New York to join the auto and machine tool unions, those in Ohio to concentrate on the rubber workers, those in California to infiltrate the steel and auto unions.

Communist influence in these and other unions had been beaten down in the last 3 years.

SECRET SQUAD

At about the same time a secret squad of 25 men, known only to the party organizers of the machine-tool industry, was sent into the Midwest to strengthen the grip on this industry.

Earlier, the top leadership of the California district of the party met to study the status of the sabotage concentrations throughout the State.

It was decided that these concentrations must be in areas where they could carry out effective work.

DISCUSSED STRIKES

The meeting discussed the best means for the promulgation and prolonging of strikes and work stoppages, how best to agitate labor disturbances, and finally the ability of their activitists to conduct wide-scale sabotage "should the international position call for it."

Due to the mounting public awareness of the Communist conspiracy, top functionaries on the west coast met within the last 2 weeks to caution members within the ranks of labor above all else not do anything overtly that could bring charges of sabotage against them.

The leaders reiterated, however, that the situation might be drastically changed in the near future and through acts of direct sabotage "we Communists then will have to stand up and be counted."

During the last week at a west coast party meeting a Communist waterfront leader outlined what United States labor could expect from the Russians.

He said "The Soviet Union plans to continue warfare of the Korean type in order to drain United States manpower," adding optimistically that this tactic will eventually turn the people against the Government and they will then be ready to accept the opposition program of the party."

The party is unrelenting in its fight against the opposition of labor leaders in the AFL and CIO. The CIO United Steelworkers of America, one of the bitterest and most successful foes of communism in the labor movement, staged a steel strike last year.

Just before the strike was scheduled to start, the Communirt Party chairman in an eastern State steel region met with units and clubs in the industry.

"Our job," he told them, "is to start a real militant Marxist strike, and begin taking the strike out of the hands of the incompetent labor leaders."

Communist persistence in labor infiltration is based on precise tactics. Orders issued to a Communist club in one of the Nation's largest steel mills in Pittsburgh at one time demonstrated how Communist "fractions" fervently espouse the progressive aims of the union itself, and use them to hoist the political and economic doctrines of communism.

They called for a course of action to achieve greater unity, centering upon the steelworkers union and the CIO.

They urged full support to the 14-point program of demands adopted by the wage policy committee of the steel union, and for backing of the CIO legislative program on housing, rent control, veterans' needs, health program, FEPC.

USED AS BASE

Using the union's program as a base, the club was ordered to campaign to increase Communist Party membership among the most advanced workers in the mill itself, and among the most advanced workers and other section of the people in the community.

To this end, the directive said, each comrade in the club should cultivate a group of the most active, intelligent, and disciplined workers from his shop, department, or union for party building.

The club was ordered to hold frequent Sunday house affairs and forums for propaganda purposes, and to work out with the concentration clubs the issuance and distribution of leaflets at the gates where comrades work.

Regular club meetings were called for every Friday evening, with the executive of three members to meet on alternate Fridays.

By these and other tactics entire unions or their locals have in the past succumbed to Communist control. How effective they can be was revealed with startling effect in 1941, when the Hitler-Stalin pact was in effect, and Communists were engaged in a program of labor sabotage to slow down America's defense program of aid to the enemies of nazism.

The most notable example was the 76-day strike of a CIO United Auto Workers' unit, local 248, under Communist leadership at the Allis-Chalmers Corp. plant at West Allis, Wis., which started on January 22, 1941.

STRIKE PROLONGED

This one carefully planned strike, engineered on the flimsiest excuse, agitated by a nucleus of 50 Communist Party members in the local, was prolonged through rioting, bloodshed, fogging of issues, and threat of personal violence until shortly before Hitler's march into Russia.

The 150-member Communist Party flying squadron in the plant threatened to wreak personal violence on anyone who opposed their designs. Through these tactics, the Communists succeeded in:

Tying up $45,000,000 of defense contracts.

Stopping production on 25 badly needed new destroyers by holding up delivery of their turbines.

Crippling the Ford Motor Co.'s aircraft-engine plant, just then completed, by stalling delivery of essential turbines.

Delaying production of aircraft and parts at Bendix Aviation Corp. and Ingersoll-Rand Co. plants by withholding delivery of Allis-Chalmers vacuum pumps and electrical equipment.

Holding up aircraft-testing operations at Wright and Langley Fields, dependent on Allis-Chalmers for compressors and switch gear units.

Stopping the expansion of aluminum production at the Aluminum Corp. of America and Reynolds Metals Co., which had orders with Allis-Chalmers for production equipment.

The weapon of labor sabotage—the crippling of production in vital industries by fomenting disturbances—has been blunted in recent years by organized labor's vigilant house cleaning.

"There is no question but what the Allis-Chalmers strike was a Communist blow at national defense," says Walter P. Reuther, present president of the UAW.

GONE NOW

But, he adds, "Those people are gone. There could never again be another Allis-Chalmers case. Labor itself has driven the Communists out of most of their power centers in the unions."

But despite the victories of anti-Communist forces, there are still at least three national unions capable of causing major damage through strikes and slow-downs.

Expelled from the CIO for cleavage to Communist Party policies, they still have strong influence in the electrical industry, control of much of the mining of important nonferrous metals, and they dominate a large part of the shipping industry on the west coast and in Hawaii.

FIVE OTHERS

Five other international unions, also expelled from the CIO, are potential trouble spots, though in lesser degree.

One of the three unions with major sabotage potential is the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. Charged by the CIO with taking direct orders from the Communist Party's top leaders, the union today holds approximately 240 contracts representing workers in the mining, smelting and fabrication of copper and nonferrous metals produced in the United States.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Major companies involved are the Anaconda Copper Co., International Nickel, and the American Smelting & Refining Co.

SHIPPING INDUSTRY

Another potential danger spot is in the west coast shipping industry. Here, Harry Bridges' International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, combined with the International Fishermen and Allied Workers of America, was driven out of the CIO in 1950 for Communist adherence.

The ILWU, an affiliate of the Moscow-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions, claims 85,000 members, covering almost all west coast longshoremen and warehousemen in large cities.

This union could, by a general strike, stop almost all west coast shipping. In combination with WFTU, it could cripple much of the shipping of the Atlantic Pact nations.

In time of war, or intensive defense preparation, shipments of war materials may be handled in this country as they have in the past, by Army troops.

Furthermore, in addition to the pressure of public opinion, such a strike would again face opposition from other strong anti-Communist unions, such as the AFL Teamsters and the Seafarers' International Union.

Also strong on the west coast is the National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards, its 6,500 members found by a CIO investigating committee to be Communist dominated.

This union is faced by the threat of a "raid" by Seafarers in event of a dangerous strike. Its membership is subjected to Coast Guard screening under the new Port Security Act before they can be assigned to ships.

ELECTRICAL UNION

Strong Communist influence in the critical electrical and electronics industry has been whittled down. Last fall the CIO expelled as Communist dominated its United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America.

It was replaced with the International Union of Electrical Workers.

In subsequent representation elections, the IUE defeated the ousted UE by more than two to one in major plants.

However, the latter still represents about half of the production workers in some 40 General Electric Co. plants, and about 17,000 members in 20 Westinghouse Electrical Corp. plants where the IUE has 44,000.

STRONG POSITION

This strength in the anti-Communist IUE would make it more difficult for the UE to stir up a successful political or sabotage strike in these industries.

But it is in the position to substantially hurt the defense effort through the use of the sabotage strike weapon.

One other ousted union, the American Communications Association, represents 9,000 to 10,000 communications workers. Their ability to run off a sabotage strike in wartime is problematical because much of their crucial work can be carried out by supervisory workers.

TWENTY-EIGHT THOUSAND SCATTERED

There are approximately 28,000 Communist Party members well-scattered among American trade-unions, including those under right-wing leadership.

Many of them, single-handed, could try to precipitate "economic" or "grievance" issues which could lead to a strike, and are in the position to carry out physical sabotage on vital machinery within their shops, or to wreak damage on large war plants by arson or explosives.

Weeding such suspects out of their jobs, even when they are known and their outright discharge is desirable, can be a problem for company officials.

An attempt to discharge a worker on the charge that he is untrustworthy is apt to meet resistance even by loyal union leaders.

Seldom are union officials in on the loyalty investigations, and they demand to be convinced that a suspect's discharge is really sought for loyalty reasons—that such a charge is not being used as a mask to get rid of a worker for legitimate union activities.

OFFERS ANSWER

To this problem, Walter Reuther, out of his long experience in fighting communism, furnishes a possible solution.

The UAW president believes an answer might be found in a regional organization of review boards, made up of management, public representatives, and, most important of all, a representative from labor itself.

These boards, he believes, could review individual cases in closed session if necessary, and recommend that persons be removed from critical areas and placed elsewhere.

RIGHTS PROTECTED

"By this method," Mr. Reuther says, "qualified labor representatives could go before the union membership and say quite frankly, 'we have reviewed all the aspects of this case, and we are satisfied that this man should be removed, not because of his union activities, but because he constitutes a threat to security.'

"With labor itself supporting the move, it would be more difficult for the Communists to stir up dissension over side issues, and furthermore civil liberties and the rights of the affected person to make his living in a less critical post would be protected."

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to include another article from the New Orleans Item, of December 7, 1950, giving a partial list of Red double talk, as follows:

HERE IS PARTIAL LIST OF RED DOUBLE TALK

"Aesopian language" is ideological double talk in which Communist communications are written.

The name derives from the method devised from Aesop, the Greek slave, to criticize his masters without appearing to be disrespectful.

With Aesopian language of confusion, Communists can issue orders and policy statements without disclosing their traitorous meaning to anyone but indoctrinated Communists, who clearly understand them.

Aesopian language does not lend itself to literal translation of words and phrases. Nevertheless there are a few expressions that can be interpreted.

Mass organization—front organization established by Communists to further their own ends, or non-Communist organizations undermined and usurped by Communists.

Trotskyism—ultra-radical communism, an epithet often used against party heretics of any hue.

Chauvinism—loyalty to any creed other than communism.

Right deviationism—Belief in nonviolent development toward socialism.

Socialism—Sovietization.

Historic mission—revolution.

Dropped out of the party—sent on a secret mission.

Visitors—Russian officials.

Members at large—members who do not belong to any unit organization.

Activists—rank and file members.

Functionaries—leaders.

Fraction—unit for infiltration of a mass organization or union.

Concentration work—mobilization for sabotage or subversive missions.

Friends—a broad term often used in speaking of Soviet secret police.

Pulaski Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD a speech which I delivered at a most impressive meeting at Ware, Mass., on Pulaski Day when many leading Polish-American organizations and citizenry in general in Massachusetts joined in a magnificent tribute to General Pulaski and the Polish cause.

It should be clear to every thoughtful person that a large number of splendid, good, and loyal Americans are deeply aroused about the continued suppression of the Polish people. Other nations also have been and are being oppressed and overrun by the puppet forces of the Soviet Union. Other nations are the victims of subtle, or not so subtle, penetration and infiltration. Freedom itself is in grave jeopardy. These issues can never be compromised. They must be fearlessly met. They must be met now if we are not, by appeasement and Fabian delay, to suffer the destruction of our liberties and the emasculation of the free world.

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, members of various Polish-American organizations, and fellow citizens and friends of the radio audience, it is a high privilege indeed for me as your Representative in the Congress of the United States to join you in this most impressive celebration of Pulaski Day.

It is fitting that we should join together here this afternoon in such large numbers to pay our heartfelt tribute of respect and affection to such a great Polish patriot and such a great friend of our own country, and also by our presence and declarations rededicate ourselves with high courage and unyielding resolution to the exalted principles and the lofty purposes by which he lived and died.

Let me heartily congratulate all those who are responsible for these noteworthy exercises. There has never been a time in the history of our country when the need for stalwart Americanism, high ideals, and dauntless spirit was greater than it is today. Everywhere liberty is under challenge by ruthless dictators. Everywhere freedom is being assailed and attacked by power-crazed tyrants. Everywhere conspiracies are being carried out against democracy and justice, and unless we move quickly in defense of our priceless free institutions everything will be lost.

How inspiring it has been to me to observe the reactions of our Polish-American friends to the dangers of the present. On every hand, through the Polish-American Congress, through many organizations of persons of Polish blood, through countless leaders, you have taken up the battle against totalitarian dictatorship and in defense of the principles of America.

I cannot find words adequately to compliment you upon the sterling patriotism and tireless unselfish devotion which you have displayed in fighting against the great menace of human slavery which is presently overshadowing the world. It has been a high privilege for me to have taken part in this campaign to preserve the American way of life and to redeem the cause of freedom throughout the world.

Not long ago, on the eleventh anniversary of the iniquitous attack upon Poland, I spoke in the House of Representatives to remind the American people of the tragic events which led up to the betrayal of Poland, and to serve notice upon the Soviet Union that true Americans would not cease to agitate the sacred cause of Poland until Poland had again taken its place as a self-respecting member of the world community of nations.

We cannot possibly measure the unspeakable infamy by which the noble Polish people have become enslaved, the first in the then free world to feel the bitter sting of the tyrant's lash in World War II. At the time Poland was a brave, free nation embracing a peace-seeking, liberty-loving, devoted Christian people with the rich tradition of loyalty to human freedom. It was brutally assaulted by international brigands and racketeers who disregarded all the laws of God and man and broke all the express terms of existing and valid nonaggression treaties in order to encompass the liquidation of a democratic Poland and ruthlessly confine its people behind the iron curtain.

There was no color of legality to this shameful act. Poland at the time was a member in good standing of the League of Nations and a faithful ally of France and Great Britain. Her people had struggled long and sacrificed bitterly to establish their free government. Yet without provocation and without warning Hitler's bestial hordes attacked defenseless Poland on September 1, 1939, just as the Soviet-led, Moscow-directed forces of North Korea attacked the helpless democratic-minded people of South Korea about 3 months ago.

As I said in my speech on the floor of the House, the duplicity and treachery behind this savage attack on Poland constitutes one of the blackest pages in world history. As a result Poland was put on the carving block and cut up between Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia. Instead of protesting and nullifying this unconscionable act as all decent-minded nations should have done, it was ratified and approved virtually in its entirety at the Yalta conference. Thus our own country became a party, at least so far as the Russian Government and the rest of the world was concerned, to the dismemberment of Poland and the enslavement of her people by the Soviets.

But I have taken the position, and I will continue inflexibly to take the position that this action which is deprecated by all real freedom-loving Americans never had the official or legal sanction of this Government. It was a mere executive agreement never ratified by the United States Senate. As such it is illegal, unconstitutional, and not binding upon the United States. No American official was authorized to agree to the shameful abandonment to a cruel enslavement by the Soviets of our warm friends, faithful allies, and noble people of Poland. We must never cease our activities until we have canceled and annulled the provisions of that incredible and unconscionable document.

You are fully aware of the current world situation. One great aggressor against freedom has been despatched by force of arms and in that glorious victory boys of Polish blood rendered a magnificent service second to none. But has that fact stopped aggression in the world. It has not. Hitler is gone but a new and more widely spread and subtly organized aggressor lifts his ugly head and casts a cloud upon freedom-loving peoples throughout the world. Hitler has been liquidated, but Stalin has taken his place preaching the gospel of hate against his fellowman and carrying the torch of rebellion, insurrection, and conspiracy to the far corners of the earth.

It is the everlasting credit and glory of the Polish people that they have never willingly surrendered their rights, they have never forfeited their freedom, they have never bowed to enslavement, they have never ceased their resistance to tyranny. To the contrary, this brave, courageous people is still asserting the sovereignty of their nation, still working for liberation from Russian bondage, still ready to sacrifice to recover the liberties which were stolen away from them by a shameless perfidy and ruthless armed might. The united nation of Poland stands today before the whole world proclaiming its independence to all, reiterating its determination to strive and fight until its freedom has been regained.

We welcomed our Polish allies during the war, we are proud of their loyal, unswerving allegiance to the ideals of democracy and freedom which we ourselves profess. We are grateful for their loyal support of our cause and for the association which we have had with them in fighting against the common enemies of freedom.

So today, in the name of that freedom, in the name of our American democracy, in the name of the justice of the living God whom we revere, in the name of our Nation and in the name of every decent principle of civilized man, let us reiterate our loyalty to Poland and her sacred cause of liberty. Let us express our determination that she will soon be liberated from the oppressor and be restored to her place among free nations.

Let us renounce and reject once and forever the unconscionable agreements by which she was consigned to Soviet domination. On this great anniversary of one of her immortal heroes, let all true Americans rally to her side, encouraging her leaders and her sons and daughters who are still fighting to recapture their liberty, pledging our assistance to them in their struggle for independence, offering our friendship, our support, our help to them in this hour of their great trial.

And so, my friends, let us accept this mighty challenge that has been flung from the Kremlin against the very existence of the democratic way of life. Let us maintain an armed strength here in our Nation that will keep our country secure and that will enable us through union with other freedom-loving nations in the United Nations and elsewhere to move speedily to the protection of democracy and freedom and justice and human liberty.

And may the day soon come, pray God, when peace may dawn upon this sorry world. When the evils of totalitarianism shall be removed forever. When Poland is freed from the chains of slavery and restored to her rightful status as a free and independent nation.

With courage in our hearts let us be rededicated today to the great and noble purposes of Pulaski and go forward fearlessly to establish a genuine lasting just peace on this earth.

Address at Dinner in Honor of Dr. Myrtle Cheney Murdock

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address at dinner in honor of Dr. Myrtle Cheney Murdock:

Dr. Murdock, Madam Chairman, and ladies, we are gathered together tonight in honor of Myrtle Cheney Murdock, wife of JOHN MURDOCK, Representative from Arizona in the Congress of the United States, who has made one of the most outstanding contributions of recent years to the recorded history of this great country of ours. This she has done with a devotion, a consecration, which adds a quality to the work itself as rare as it is beautiful.

Myrtle Cheney Murdock, we who are gathered here, thank you with all our hearts for your beautiful book which will preserve for our children and their children's children the story of a simple man of Italy—a man of great genius, who considered it the supreme privilege of his life to give himself for 25 years to the beautifying of the great Capitol Building of his adopted country.

Many books have been written presenting the lives of the world's leaders, artists, legislators, revolutionists, patriots. Few authors have been able to make the intangibles of a life so positive, so real, so precious as you have done in your beautiful book. In these pages Constantino Brumidi, forgotten artist, passionate seeker after freedom, loyal citizen of the country he sought in his great need, lives once again.

This has not been a simple task. It is one that has required the same quality of consecration and service that were his. You have had to seep yourself in Constantino Brumidi. You have had to immerse yourself in the material made available to you about his life and works. This you have done with a truly beautiful and receptive spirit few of us know.

How magnificent has been your reaction to the challenge of your own artist's soul to paint a true and ardent picture of the man to whom we as Americans owe so much. Thanks to your eagerness to have justice done, recognition is at last being given the great artist who refused work which would have brought him national acclaim and financial ease, saying: "I have no longer any desire for fame and fortune. My one ambition and my daily prayer is that I may live long enough to make beautiful the Capitol of the one country on earth in which there is liberty." You have used consummate skill and deep humanity in the doing.

As one of those privileged to serve the people of this country where liberty still lives as a Representative in the Congress, I thank you from my heart. Today's children and their children's children have been given a priceless gift by your long years of consecration.

Those who come to the Capitol will no longer ask unanswerable questions. They will be told, possibly before they even come, of the political refugee, a man who, at the age of 50, began the work of translating the principles upon which these States became a Nation into visible symbols of rare beauty, for all the world to see.

They, too, will be grateful.

I cannot refrain from my own heaviness of heart that one of Mr. Brumidi's most accessible murals is no longer in the place where he painted it. Upon orders of the then superintendent of construction, in the all-too-short period of 6 weeks the Cornwallis-Washington scene became a part of the then new "Hall of the House of Representatives." For nearly a century it has been in the House Chamber. Now it is gone. I have not had opportunity since our return to ascertain what has been done with it. I trust that the information given me by the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. Lynn, before the Congress recessed in September, that it was to be rebacked and transferred to a suitable spot was accurate.

Ladies, this beautiful book of Mrs. Murdock's is very timely indeed, for there is a spirit abroad which has no regard for tradition, no consideration for the fact that the farther out the branches of a tree reach the more secure, the deeper must go the roots.

To me, the complete remodeling of the two Chambers in the Capitol because the roofs above had become unsafe have a tragic significance. For over 90 years, the laws of our great Nation have been made in those two Halls. Perhaps they were not beautiful in modern eyes. Perhaps those comfortable chairs were needed both in the gallery and on the floor. Perhaps the beautiful stained-glass seals built into the old ceiling interfered with the House acoustics. Yet—I would have you go to that Chamber and see its present ceiling with what has been called an NRA eagle in the center and its glaring hidden lights. The excuse for it all was, first of all, the insecurity of the roof above, and then the poor acoustics.

I am informed that the material of which this new ceiling has been constructed is one of the modern sound improving products full of holes that absorb sound. But even these holes are lost under eight coats of paint.

And the beautiful old stained-glass seals? They are boxed up somewhere, awaiting the designation of State delegations as to their disposal.

Oh—there are State seals in the present ceiling—plaster seals, painted in crude colors, quite unrecognizable as cheap in appearance as the new ceiling lights—rosettes that you can find duplicated in almost any new motion-picture house.

Yes; I feel bitterly about this whole remodeling business which was brought to the House for action as a rider on an appropriation bill. With two or three others from both sides of the aisle I protested it as strongly as I could. But it was of no use. I continued the battle to retain the lighted stained glass seals—I pressed for the preservation of the Brumidi mural and did not accept defeat even when the workmen took over in 1949. Later I was forced to.

Yes; there will be a certain dignity in the remodeled hall, even though the gallery and the ceiling cannot but reflect a confused atmosphere of both boudoir and cinema.

Let us hope the glare of the lights will be corrected, for I can assure you we found it quite intolerable last session. Let us hope also that the eight coats of paint on the sound-absorbent ceiling will not defeat the entire acoustical purpose of the change.

I can assure you that I shall salute the ghost of the Cornwallis-Washington mural each day that I am privileged to serve the people of our beloved country as a Member of the House of Representatives.

Tonight it is my privilege to express my gratitude and that of thousands upon thousands to this lovely woman who is our honored guest. Thanks to her one thing is certain: If by another grave error of judgment of the importance and the value to our future are the visible evidences of our past, congressional committees should take steps that would cover up or destroy the beauty that exists in the Capitol because a humble refugee consecrated the last 25 years of his gifted life to filling the building with beauty, there is a poignant record of the man and his work, wrought by one who has written in the preface of her book:

"I am simply the wife of a western Congressman who has been stirred by the patriotism of the Italian refugee-artist, Brumidi; by his exquisite decorations on the walls and ceilings of our Capitol Building of the United States; by his persistent effort in the face of blinding criticism; and finally by the lack of recognition characterized by his unmarked burial place."

Yes; Myrtle Cheney Murdock, you are indeed all that your response to these things indicates. Yours is a beauty-loving soul with a deep reverence for man's capacity for—and his need of beauty in his long trek from unconscious perfection to perfected consciousness.

Was it perhaps out of the deep anguish of those days in 1943 that your heart learned beyond all shadow of possible doubt that life is an endless stream of beauty if we but make it so?

Was it this knowledge that challenged your gallant heart to search out the life and works of this man from Italy—and give to the people of this our country an unforgettable, indestructible account of beauty?

Whatever the source of your desire, whatever the urge of soul that inspired you, we, and all who come after, do most earnestly thank you.

Tighter Censorship Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. NOLAND
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. NOLAND. Mr. Speaker, in reading the partisan press it is often coincidental how a question asked on one page of a newspaper is well answered on another page. Following are two articles from a Washington newspaper:

TIGHTER CENSORSHIP NEEDED
(By Peter Edson)

Events in Korea are creating demands for a tighter code of military censorship. There never was a war in which one side told so much about what it was doing while the other side was so secretive.

United States communiqués have revealed troop movements and troop positions. Result has been that the Communist forces haven't needed an intelligence service. One agent, sitting in New York or Washington and reading the papers, could easily have cabled back to Manchuria or Moscow all the Red generals might want to know.

Every American punch has been telegraphed ahead to the enemy. Advance notices were put out when the United Nations forces crossed the thirty-eighth parallel and when the last offensive was started—the one that was to win the war. Except possibly for the handling of the Inchon invasion, the element of surprise has been almost completely lacking in American major operations.

Contrast that with the Communist operations. They have told nothing. Even the Chinese Communist troops have not been told the truth about whom they were fighting, nor what for. While there is no desire to establish this kind of iron-clad censorship over UN operations, it has given the Reds tremendous advantage.

Press and radio correspondents at the front and at General MacArthur's headquarters in Tokyo have operated under what has been called voluntary censorship. The code of instructions, as issued at Eighth Army headquarters in Korea, contained this key paragraph:

"This is not an uncensored war any more than the last war was uncensored. The only difference is there is no military censorship. The Supreme Commander expects the correspondents to impose self-censorship and to refrain from publishing matter that violates security, endangers operations, gives aid and comfort to the enemy, and weakens our war effort."

Before his departure from office, Defense Secretary Louis Johnson sent a cable to General MacArthur's headquarters, directing him to establish military censorship at Tokyo and in the field. Then at the end of the directive was a sentence to the effect of, "Your opinions on the foregoing are requested."

The request took all the punch out of the directive. Word came back to the Pentagon that its censorship suggestion was very interesting, but that Tokyo thought the present system was working out very well as it was. So nothing was done.

In final analysis, any directive to establish tighter censorship must come from President Truman. In World War II, the Office of Censorship under Byron Price was set up just 5 days after Pearl Harbor. It provided for voluntary press and radio censorship, too, but there were much stricter rules for the military to follow.

Also, there was censorship of mail and all telecommunications. Preliminary planning for reestablishing this type of censorship has begun. There has been reluctance to impose these controls. Realization that this is a war, and not a simple police action, will make tighter censorship necessary.

WHITE HOUSE ORDER REPORTED MACARTHUR GAGGED

The White House was reported today to have called upon Gen. Douglas MacArthur and the entire Far East command to make no further comments on the progress of the Korean war.

It was reported the message was phrased as a request and addressed to all military commanders in the United States and overseas. But it was reported to have been so worded that General MacArthur, or anybody else receiving it, would interpret it as an order.

No official reason was given for the cease-talk directive, but it was assumed to be an outgrowth of resentment expressed by the British and the French at statements which General MacArthur has made to the public of this country and Europe through newspaper correspondents.

In particular, General MacArthur has irked Europeans by his statements that the war in Korea is global in nature and that if the free world fails to meet the challenge of communism there, it must fight it out on the battlefields of Europe.

The directive had not been confirmed as of noon today by the White House.

Our Enemy Isn't China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD an article by William Philip Simms taken from the Washington Daily News, which analyzes the Chinese situation very well. It follows:

OUR ENEMY ISN'T CHINA
(By William Philip Simms)

(NOTE.—For 40 years William Philip Simms covered world affairs, the last 30 of them as foreign editor of the Scripps-Howard newspapers. Now in semiretirement, he writes only when he feels the urge. The worsening situation in Asia has drawn him back to the typewriter to produce the liveliest, most penetrating analysis we have seen of the political and military crisis now facing us.)

Under no circumstances should the United States let itself be sucked into an all-out war with Communist China.

China is not our enemy. China, as such, is not attacking the United States. Soviet Russia is.

Russia is using China as a weapon against us, just as she used Red Korea. Her aim is to wear us down until she can wade in and finish us off.

We should not fall for so transparent a trick.

Through the United Nations if we can, but directly if we must, we should tell Stalin once and for all that we won't be played for a sucker.

We are already in a shooting war with Russia. It is foolish and dangerous to pretend otherwise.

The war is global and we are everywhere on the defensive. Russia is on the offensive.

SEVENTY BILLION DOLLARS ONLY A STARTER

Already, since VJ-day, this war has cost us $70,000,000,000, for Greece, Turkey, Korea, the Marshall plan, armaments and whatnot, and that seems only a starter.

From now on our own defense program may cost us almost that much each year. The annual bill will be far bigger if we get involved in a real war with China.

And having won such a war—if we won it—we would still be confronted by Soviet Russia and her other stooges. Beating China would be like cutting off one tentacle in a battle with a monstrous octopus.

Russia is the real instigator of the world-wide plot against America and other democratic nations. Until we have an understanding with Russia—not with Red Korea, Red China, or any other mere Soviet agent—this disastrous business will go on and on.

I am not talking of a preventive war. I am talking of a genuine understanding, one way or the other, with the world's prime trouble maker, Russia.

We should stop pretending—as we have been, in and out of the UN—that we don't know what Russia is up to. We should make it absolutely plain that we do know, and that we won't tolerate it forever.

RUSSIA HAS STARTED WORLD WAR III

Let's quit kidding ourselves. Russia has started world war III. The question is whether we can stop it before its flames consume everything. And that question's answer can't be found in Korea, China, Indochina, India, Greece, Turkey, or anywhere else but Moscow.

The fact that Russia is directing Koreans, Chinese, and others to do her dirty work only makes her own guilt greater.

That's why we should tell Russia bluntly that, if she forces us into a major armed conflict, we will carry the fight direct to her instead of slaughtering her poor dupes, the Chinese coolies.

Russia, of course, doesn't care how many Chinese might be killed. Lenin and Stalin murdered millions of Russians to build their own power.

The Kremlin probably would be glad to see American forces killing millions of Chinese and dropping atomic bombs on Chinese cities. That would weaken China, make her more amenable to Moscow, and deplete our stock of bombs.

VICTORY WOULD BE WORSE THAN WORTHLESS

So a successful war against China would not advance the free world's cause 1 inch. And who can guarantee that it would be successful? All-out war with China—a country of 450,000,000 people—could last for many years, cost us tens of thousands of lives and hundreds of billions of dollars. And when we won it, if we ever did, the victory would be worse than worthless.

Red Russia's aim today, as always, is to foment wars, revolutions, and civil strife in all non-Communist countries, meanwhile staying clear herself and husbanding her own strength.

That's why Stalin gave Hitler the green light in 1939. He hoped that Germany, Italy, and Japan would fight England, France, and America until both sides were exhausted, leaving Russia to take over the world.

And that scheme might have worked, if the Nazi and Communist rogues had not fallen out.

Today, save for Russia, America is the only really great world power. Only America blocks the Kremlin's way to world domination.

So Stalin is sicking everybody he can on to America, bent on wearing us down while Russia, safe on the sidelines with 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 fresh troops active and in reserve, awaits the hour for striking at us with almost complete assurance of success.

WHAT WE SHOULD TELL RUSSIA

These are the facts that America and other free nations need to face. And they should face them boldly in the UN and lay them on the table in the Kremlin. If Russia forces us to choose between the peace we want and a war we do not seek, we should tell Russia:

"We will not fight your puppet China. We will use all the strength we have, and all the added strength we can build, against the Russian source and center of this conspiracy against the world."

Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN DAVIS LODGE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a radio talk made recently at the invitation of the Polish-American Congress. It follows:

Thank you, ladies and gentlemen. I bring warm personal greetings to my American friends of Polish descent in Connecticut and throughout the country.

At the same time I speak to all other citizens who perhaps do not realize what a huge wrong has been done to a country and to a people who were our staunch allies in the last great conflict and with whom we in America have had an historic tradition of friendship and mutual help.

In this trembling hour when America and the free nations of the world stand in mortal peril, in this critical period when international conditions threaten another world conflict every American should be made aware of what happens when millions of free people are handed over to the miseries of a police state.

First, let me tell our fellow Americans briefly the tragic facts in the recent history of Poland. Five years ago last February a conference among President Roosevelt, Winston Churchill, and Josef Stalin was held in the Crimea.

This conference resulted in what we call the Yalta agreement. This agreement was not a treaty. It was never presented to our Senate for ratification. It was only an agreement between the three heads of the participating Governments of the United States, Great Britain, and Soviet Russia.

Here is what the Yalta agreement did to Poland:

It made Stalin a gift of more than 47 percent of that unhappy country. It enabled Stalin to change what remained of helpless Poland into what is virtually a province of Soviet Russia. Soviet officials, parading in the guise of Poles, now govern Poland in accordance with Moscow's instructions.

The Yalta agreement contained some pious statements to the effect that "free and unfettered elections" should be held in Poland as soon as possible. Stalin has made only scant pretense of living up to the Yalta terms. Moving into a country of 35,000,000 people who were betrayed with the help of the United States, Stalin has never acted in Poland except to the advantage of the Soviet Union. It is quite obvious now that his motives at Yalta were simply to acquire possession of Poland for military, political, and economic purposes. Poland is the "keystone of the European arch." The Kremlin was determined to possess that keystone. To our shame we cooperated in giving him his wish.

To make Yalta possible we abandoned the Atlantic Charter. We ourselves acquiesced in an act of aggression against our historic friends. Now in 1950 we need as never before to restore the confidence and friendship that has for so long existed between the Polish and American peoples.

Among the nations which Russia was permitted to subjugate none contains a more proud and a more independent and spirited people than Poland. To the eternal credit of the Polish people they have refused to bow to the will of the Kremlin. Only recently we heard that the Polish Army was still defiantly marching to mass on Sunday morning in military formation as part of its regular exercises. Poles have never been submissive. The flame of freedom burns as fiercely in the Polish breast as in the American.

During World War II Poland suffered greater devastation than any other country. Out of a prewar population of 35,000,000, Poland lost 6,000,000 which is more than the combined battle casualties of Great Britain, Russia, and the United States. How ironic it is that Poland which was the first nation to fight Hitler and which suffered the most in the war that followed should have been denied even a part in the postwar settlement which determined its territorial status.

How tragic that Polish schools and colleges and the Polish legal system are being so ruthlessly transformed to suit the Soviet pattern. The traditional freedom of thought which bred one of the world's finest cultures is being threatened every day. How long can even the great vitality of the Polish spirit continue to stand up against the Kremlin's steady policy of repression and terrorization? This question is of particular significance to us in America because many fine citizens of Poland have, through the years, come to our country to lend their talents, their industry and their loyalty to the development of this great Nation and to become a precious part of the social fabric of America. It has a particular significance because, through the years, there have existed strong cultural and political ties between the people of America and the people of Poland. It has a particular significance because during World War II the members of the Polish armed forces fought with heroic determination to vanquish the common enemy. They fought with conspicuous valor in the skies over England. They fought at Narvik. They fought on the Maginot line. They fought with stubborn fortitude in Tobruk. They fought in the terrible hell of Monte Cassino. On the slopes of this Italian town alone 3,600 of these brave men gave their lives. They gave their lives and in so doing they saved the lives of many of the Britishers, in the Eighth Army of General Alexander; they saved the lives of many Frenchmen in the army of General Juin. The gave their lives in a common cause. But they have not reaped the fruits of a common victory. In the eloquent and tragic words which form the title of the book written by the former Polish Ambassador to the United States, Jan Ciechanowski, they suffered "Defeat in Victory."

Now that the future of America is so obviously threatened by the menace of Soviet aggression it is imperative that Americans be made aware of what Soviet ruthlessness and Soviet cruelty really can mean. I have repeatedly tried to call the attention of Americans to what has happened in Poland as a lesson in the brutality and callousness of Red Russian policy. This summer I drew attention again to the Katyn Massacre which is one of the grossest crimes of modern history.

Twelve thousand Polish officers and men were put to death in the Katyn Forest near Smolensk in the U. S. S. R. in 1939 or 1940. Last January I attempted to get the Secretary of Defense to make public to Americans the documents dealing with that unconscionable massacre. I was informed that it would be unwise to disclose the facts at that time. Again in July I wrote to the Secretary of the Army informing him that in view of the recent developments in Korea and the tense situation in many other areas of the globe, I believe that it is paramount that the American people and the people of every country be officially and fully informed of this Polish tragedy which was perpetrated by men of the Soviet Army. Informed persons claim that the time of the deaths and the Russian-manufactured ropes binding the hands of the slain Poles prove that the slaughter could only have taken place when the Red armies controlled the area.

The American people have, as have all peace-loving people, been reluctant to accept stories of atrocities since so many reports have eventually been proven groundless. But here we have such an extraordinary case of the mass murder of thousands, a case which, I understand, has been thoroughly investigated not only by competent American officers, but also by Swiss neutrals and the German military. I believe it would be a service to the American people and to the interests of the United States as well as to the cause of freedom everywhere if these reports were now released for the judgment of mankind.

However, it is not only to the martyred dead but to the martyred living that American public opinion should be directed. There is another pressing problem of which our people in America should be made fully aware. On September 1, I wrote to the Attorney General of the United States to urge that this problem be solved without further delay. My reference was to the 18,000 Polish veterans now living in Europe who under the terms of Public Law 555 are entitled to be admitted with their wives and children to this country. I worked hard for that law. The Congress enacted it on June 30 of this year. Yet through maddening red tape and delay the provisions of the law are not yet being carried out.

The admission of these heroic Polish veterans is authorized only until June 30 of next year. Our Government authorities must move without further delay to make sure that these 18,000 men who fought as our allies will in accordance with the expressed intentions of the Congress come to this country before the law expires. I shall continue to press the authorities to speed action on this important matter.

As I told the Congress when I urged passage of that law, these Polish veterans have given ample proof that they deserve to become citizens of the United States. Their skills, their vitality, their love of honor, their hatred of slavery, their indomitable courage, their spiritual fervor, will constitute a mighty contribution to American life. The ideals which have sustained them during their long years of combat and loneliness, of pain and privation will help America in her hour of trial. They will inject into our national bloodstream the kind of physical, mental, and moral attributes which we associate with our own beloved land.

This is a way in which we are making atonement for the wrong that we committed at Yalta. By this gesture to our gallant wartime ally we give additional recognition to the cause of freedom. Thus we partially redeem our solemn pledges. By this means we reassure the Polish people as to our intentions and in so doing help ourselves to achieve that enduring peace with freedom so devoutly desired by the American people.

May this act of the American people be only one of many by which we will, in the fullness of time, restore the confidence of the people of Poland and aid them to regain the freedom for which they long and to which their contributions to the common cause of humanity so richly entitle them. In Poland's noble 1,000-year history, this suffering nation has endured martyrdom many times. Yet the Polish spirit refuses to be crushed. The admiration of America for this gallant Polish spirit and the conscience of America over the betrayal at Yalta must manifest themselves decisively in Poland's behalf.

The Airplane—Our One Hope for Survival

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the news in the daily papers conveys the crisis into which we have suddenly been plunged.. The threat of a third world war is a very sobering fact.

Whatever happens in Korea, the United States must hasten preparations to defend itself and to help its allies of the free world.

Those are the words in Newsweek of a distinguished general who has served the United States and the cause of democracy in two World Wars. He is Gen. Carl Spaatz, USAF, retired.

General Spaatz was Chief of Staff of the United States Air Force until his retirement in June 1948, when he was succeeded by Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg. He is one of the heroes of our armed services, and a veteran who can speak with wisdom based on long experience. No man alive today knows better than General Spaatz what air power has accomplished, and what can be accomplished with air power.

In his article in the current issue of Newsweek, General Spaatz writes:

Perhaps we can learn from defeat in far Northern Korea the lesson which victory in the Second World War and in Southern Korea failed to teach us in a convincing way. Simply stated, the lesson is this: The United States must rely primarily upon air power, in which it excels, rather than upon manpower, in which it is excelled by its enemies, actual and potential, when compelled to take the offensive to protect its essential interest.

Mr. Speaker, General Spaatz is well aware that in the face of the present danger we must build up both our Army and our Navy. We must husband our manpower and our resources. But, in words of General Spaatz which any thinking American must readily appreciate—

The United States, even if fully supported by its western allies, will never be able to place enough men in the field to match the manpower available to eastern Communist powers.

Our superiority to oriental manpower is our air power. If we should be forced to fight China as a result of the Chinese Communist invasion of Korea, we should not try to conquer China by a war on land. It would be far wiser to destroy strategic targets in China by air until the Chinese were convinced that further resistance was futile.

The German will to resist was destroyed by air power; so was the Japanese. The Chinese will to resist could also be so destroyed.

Mr. Speaker, the superior quality and weight of American air power, offensive and defensive, is our one hope for victory, and for survival if a struggle between freedom and slavery lies ahead. As General Spaatz warns us:

Slavery may win if we consent to meet it on its own terms with its own methods and weapons. But it cannot win if we use the means and weapons in which we are unbeatable.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the article by Gen. Carl Spaatz, United States Air Force, retired, in the December 11, 1950, issue of Newsweek.

The article is as follows:

It is too soon to foresee the immediate consequences of United Nations and United States reverses in Korea. If a defense line can be established and defended against the oncoming hordes of Red Chinese along the waist of the peninsula or somewhere below it, disaster can be averted. If the military situation can be stabilized, diplomatic negotiations can proceed.

And this does not seem impossible unless UN troops are in an even more desperate predicament than dispatches from Korea indicate. Mountainous terrain in all Korea is favorable for defense The air is still under UN control. So are the seas at both ends of the land front. A large enough force to man a defense line in considerable depth and enough equipment to hold off even an infinitely more numerous enemy seem to be getting out of the northern debacle.

However, it is possible that all of Korea will be lost. Such a loss would be a major disaster to United States arms. But so was Pearl Harbor and so were Kasserine Pass and the Bulge. Yet we survived them. Whatever happens in Korea, the United States must hasten preparations to defend itself and to help its allies of the free world.

Perhaps we can learn from defeat in far Northern Korea the lesson which victory in the Second World War and in Southern Korea failed to teach us in a convincing way. Simply stated, the lesson is this: The United States must rely primarily upon air power, in which it excels, rather than upon manpower, in which it is excelled by its enemies, actual, and potential, when compelled to take the offensive to protect its essential interests.

This does not mean that the United States can disband its Army; on the contrary, it must build a considerably larger ground force than it now has. Its allies also must rearm rapidly. Neither does it mean that the Navy can be reduced. What it does mean is that the Army should be used to supplement and implement air power. And the Navy should be used primarily to keep sea lanes open, but also to exploit opportunities for coastal bombardment and limited aerial penetration, the functions it has performed so well in and around Korea.

No American soldier should ever be used to invade China or any other part of the populous Orient except to accomplish the limited objective of securing air bases. The reason for this is obvious. The United States even if fully supported by its western allies, will never be able to place enough men in the field to match the manpower available to eastern Communist powers. Conversely, no eastern Communist power is far enough advanced technologically to match the United States in air power or to protect itself from American air power.

If this country is forced to fight China as a result of the Red Chinese invasion of Korea, it should carry the fight to the Chinese by air. Strategic targets—industries, communications, and transport—should be pounded from available bases until the Chinese are convinced that further resistance is futile.

Japan was beaten by air power based on the Marianas in the last war. Germany was in the process of crumbling even before the Normandy invasion, and eventually would have fallen of its own weight of industrial rubble if this pounding had continued. China could be beaten in the same way. So could any nation subjected to continuous bombing from the air. Use of the atom bomb would hasten capitulation but wouldn't alter essentially the process of capitulation.

The same strategy should be used against Soviet Russia if war with the homeland of the Reds becomes unavoidable. Here the problem would be complicated by the existance of a large and presumably strong air force, supplemented by antiaircraft and radar installations, and by more distant bases. Moreover, the Russians might be capable of retaliatory bombing of American targets. But these complications would be overcome by the superior quality and weight of American air power, offensive and defensive.

In the struggle between freedom and slavery which lies ahead, and in which we are in fact already engaged, slavery may win if we consent to meet it on its own terms with its own methods and weapons. But it cannot win if we use the means and weapons in which we are unbeatable.

Letter to the American Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. M. G. BURNSIDE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include herewith excerpts from a letter I sent to the farmers in my district during the month of December:

DEAR FARMER: On the 7th of December, 9 years ago, our country faced one of the greatest perils ever before seen in the history of our Nation. Today we again see war clouds boiling up over the horizon even more darker than those we faced at that time. We as Americans, wanted neither the first, second, or now a third world war which can only bring misery and suffering to many millions of people. We had no choice in the two former occasions and today Moscow, and Morcow alone, holds the key to peace. We have tried every honorable way possible to maintain peace but these have been unheeded by the Communist tyrants of Moscow.

If we are forced today to bear arms with our Allies to the full strength of our country, the American farmer will be called upon to do a job much bigger than any in the past. He will be forced to operate with less manpower and have shortages in much needed fertilizers. I would suggest that you experienced farmers advise the less experienced farmers as to the necessity of oiling and repairing farm machinery because it will probably be very difficult to replace due to the war effort. As great as these adversities may be, I am confident they again would show a record which could be praised as well done when the end should come.

We must stand together and fight together to defend the things we love in America. The task before us is a great one and one in which there is no turning back when American lives are being lost on the field of battle. We are fighting as our forefathers for liberty and justice; and this we will attain as they did, against any foe.

Mr. Speaker, recent events have pointed out clearly the crisis we are now facing throughout the world. There can exist no longer any doubt as to the sacrifices we must make to build up our fighting strength. It will be a job for all of us, and one in which we will all have to contribute our share of the hardships. By God's help we will succeed. I urge the prayerful call of all our Members upon a power that is greater than ours.

Dr. James W. Fifield, Religious and Civic Leader of Los Angeles, Denounces Socialism and Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, if there ever was a time to invoke impeachment proceedings on two high officials, namely President Truman and Secretary of State Acheson, it is now.

This is the first time in our long and glorious history that we have been led into a position of being subject to the whims and caprice of an unfriendly foreign power, Russia.

Never before in our history have leadership and wisdom in high places been so lacking, and the Government been rendered so impotent as it is in this critical period due to the mistakes of the administration.

We cannot afford to allow the present administration to further demoralize and degenerate this great and powerful Nation. From all sides the people are clamoring for action.

Letters, post cards, and wires are coming to me from all parts of the Nation urging the removal of Truman and Acheson.

The following news story from the Los Angeles Herald-Express quoting Dr. James W. Fifield expresses the views of most of the people I have heard from. It follows:

DR. FIFIELD DEMANDS UNITED STATES BREAK WITH RUSSIA

A demand that the United States break diplomatic relations with Russia had been made today by Dr. James W. Fifield, Jr., who told his congregation at the First Congregational Church that this Nation had been betrayed by President Roosevelt at Yalta and by its leaders since.

"By next May," he said, "the Comintern will control 1,200,000,000 of the 2,000,000,000 persons on earth." He asked that the present United States leaders be repudiated.

"At Yalta," Dr. Fifield said, "the President (Roosevelt) drunk or sober, gave to Stalin more than Stalin had ever dreamed of asking."

Stalin was described by the pastor as "the foulest dictator and antichrist" in history. "He has killed 15,000,000 souls, and now I am informed that there are 10,000 murders daily in China. Mao Tse-tung is second only to Stalin in ruthless brigandry and murder."

DENOUNCES SOCIALISTS

These, he said, are the men our national leaders have helped by supplying Soviet Russia with vast amounts of matériel.

He demanded that Russia be thrown out of the United Nations, or the United States should withdraw from the United Nations.

Terming "Socialists" the advance guard phalanx of the Reds, he said:

"Clean out the fifth columns—Socialists as well as Communists. Clean them out of our churches, unions, magazines, newspapers, schools, businesses and our Government."

Communists should not be allowed out of jail on bail while American boys are dying in Korea, he said.

TRACES MORAL DECAY

He advocates revolt of rebels and arming of any nation that will fight Russia.

Much of the blame for the moral decay of the day should be placed on every man and woman for being overcredulous in their faith in their leaders, Dr. Fifield said in the sermon, he declared "has been clamoring to be preached for 19 years."

"We have traded our birthright as the favored Nation of the world," he continued, "for a mess of pottage, and the pottage stinks."

This Nation, he said, has made commitments—such as the one with Korea—"that we couldn't keep, and each failure has been a betrayal."

Manila Newspapers See Statehood for Hawaii and Alaska Significant to America's Position in Far East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON
DELEGATE FROM HAWAII
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to present an editorial from the Philippines Herald of December 5 and an excerpt from an editorial from the Manila Bulletin of December 8.

The editorial from the Philippines Herald follows:

HAWAII STATEHOOD AND THE PHILIPPINES

The people and the Republic of the Philippines have a stake in the issue of Hawaii statehood.

Legislation to admit Hawaii and Alaska as States is now before the United States Senate.

It has passed the lower House of the United States Congress by an overwhelming vote. It has been given a strongly favorable report by the United States Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. It has been heartily endorsed by Republican and Democratic Senators alike.

But though the people of the United States are strongly for the Hawaii and Alaska statehood bills, the United States Senate may not act favorably at this session. Much "must" business is before Congress, particularly that relating to the war in Korea and the defense of the free world. And a few Senators, mostly from the southern part of the United States, seem opposed to admit two more Territories as States at this time.

Without presuming to tell the Congress of the United States what to do, we feel it is appropriate for us to express the deep concern of the Philippines in the passage of this legislation. There are 60,000 Filipinos living and working in the Territory.

We would view passage of the Hawaii statehood bill by the United States Congress at this time as another demonstration of the extension of the principle of democracy to the Pacific area.

To the United States we are forever grateful for making good on the pledge to give independence to the Philippines. By that act the United States not only endeared itself to our country but answered the argument of the Communists that the United States is aggressively and greedily imperialistic.

Favorable acion on the Hawaii measure would be hailed in the Philippines as another evidence of that principle of human freedom and political democracy for which we are all fighting today.

It would show the propagandists of Russia and China and North Korea that the American people admit to full political kinship the Territory of Hawaii, with its strategic position and its half million people of many races living peacefully and progressively together as Americans.

The excerpts from the Manila Bulletin editorial follows:

The issue of statehood for Hawaii-Alaska is still before Congress and the Territories have hopes of its passage. Consolidation of American interests in the Pacific in face of the international threat is a sharpened reason for its consideration.

Inflation—A National Peril

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEROY JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, by leave granted to me, I am including in this short statement an article by commentator Frank R. Kent.

Inflation is a deadly peril, and has already caused untold financial injury to many who can least afford to be injured in that respect. One group that I am thinking about is the group in the armed services. It was my privilege to be a member of the subcommittee that wrote the pay bill that increased the pay of everyone in the armed services. They have already found that their present increase pay buys less than the pay they had during the recent world war. This is a concrete result of inflation.

It it unfortunate that the President, who was given the authority by this Congress, prior to its taking recess last fall, has not seen fit to invoke any of the authority given to him. We have been asked to extend rent control, and I voted for it, and, yet, the President, who had the power, refused to do anything about any other phases of our economic system, which might halt or delay the inflationary trend, now in full swing.

Mr. Kent points out that one certain individual seems to be the dominating influence with the President in preventing any steps from being taken to regulate inflation. Since Mr. Kent is an eminent and experienced commentator, I assume that the source of his information is reliable, and that his statement is a statement of fact. The following is the article referred to:

WRITER BLAMES KEYSERLING FOR TRUMAN'S INACTION

(By Frank R. Kent)

What is happening abroad to our military forces and in New York to our diplomatic forces (to say nothing of the Attlee-Truman conferences here) is so much more dramatic and colorful that naturally they obscure what is happening to our economic situation at home. But they are not really more important.

For our military and diplomatic power wholly depend upon our economic strength and solidity. That is basic. Without economic strength there can be neither military strength nor diplomatic force. There are several other facts accepted by reasonable men. One is that inflation is perhaps the chief national peril. Uncontrolled, it can be as devastating as a lost war. Uncontrolled, it can lose a war.

Inflation cannot be successfully combatted by doing one of these things. They all have to be done. And they should be done at the beginning of the defense program, not in the middle and certainly not after wages and prices have begun really to soar. In brief, delay can be ruinous. There has never been a denial of B. M. Baruch's oft-repeated assertion that failure to face the facts in the last war resulted in its prolongation by 6 months at an additional cost of $100,000,000,000 and many wholly unnecessary causalties. Last summer these realities were so generally accepted that before Congress adjourned it not only gave Mr. Truman everything he asked with which to fight inflation but some things, including the vital power to regulate wages, for which he had not asked at all.

Since then the administration has played a double-faced game—ineffectually attempting to restrain inflation by credit controls while directly encouraging inflation by aiding wage boosts. In consequence, wages have gone on a rampage. Strike after strike has been called. Raise after raise has been granted. Time after time the Government's weight has been on the labor side and time after time industry has raised prices to meet the wage boost, which is thus passed on to the consumer, thereby directly promoting inflation. The result is that by the end of October prices had reached their highest peak and the cost of living had broken all records.

Why has Mr. Truman with full knowledge and warning failed to exercise the power voted him to control the inflation against which he so earnestly preaches? Why has he let nine billion be added to the cost of his program? Why, against all reason and experience, has he permitted himself to be persuaded that labor and industry will voluntarily keep down wages and profits? Why, with the costly lessons of War I and War II clearly before him, has he not acted? It is true he has appointed a long string of mobilizers and stabilizers, including a wage stabilizer. But, up to date, they have not mobilized or stabilized anything at all.

Nor, judging from the way the new wage stabilizer talks, are they likely to stabilize anything for quite a while. Apparently he is not even sure wage control is necessary. It is fair to say that in this uncertainty he reflects the administration attitude, which in the field of economics is anything but certain about anything. What are the reasons for this extremely costly uncertainty? Those with the best foundation are, first, that Mr. Truman and his political advisers are still in such fear of the professional labor bosses with whom they are politically linked that they dare not take a step to which they are opposed.

The second reason is the fancy arguments of Leon Keyserling, chief of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. Though Mr. Keyserling's views of the current inflation problem are held by exceedingly few recognized economists and directly clash with those of Mr. Baruch and practically every other man of experience, he seems not only to have impressed Mr. Truman but to have swept all the mobilizers and stabilizers off their feet. Though their instinct is against the Keyserling philosophy, they do not know enough or cannot talk fast enough to argue with him. Hence, in this great national crisis we find ourselves being economically directed by a man who thinks the size of the debt is unimportant, that inflation can be controlled without wage and price control, that nondefense expenditures should go up and not down.

RFC Loan to the Kaiser-Frazer Sales Corp.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following statement from News Bulletin of November 6, 1950, and also an Associated Press dispatch. The above-mentioned follow:

[From the News Bulletin of November 6, 1950]

NEW RFC LOAN OF $25,000,000 TO KAISER-FRAZER NEEDS INVESTIGATION

The announcement that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has authorized an additional loan of $25,000,000 to the Kaiser-Frazer Sales Corporation to mature November 7, 1951, should be the subject of careful congressional investigation.

It will be recalled that over a period of 10 years the Kaiser companies have had a virtual pipe line into the United States Treasury and its lending agencies. The Kaiser companies have at times owed as much as $192,000,000 to the Government.

On September 20, 1950, it was announced that Kaiser would pay off a $94,000,000 Government loan on the steel plant at Fontana, Calif., and that he was contemplating an expansion of steel making facilities for which new Government funds, in the possible amount of $500,000,000 might be sought.

In a news item of April 14, 1950, the United Press announced that Kaiser-Frazer lost $30,329,351 in 1949. On December 12, 1949, the Wall Street Journal in a feature story headed—Kaiser's next bout reported in part:

"Challenger Henry J. Kaiser is doing his road work for a return bout with the auto industry heavyweights.

A new light car will be his heavy punch, he hopes. But he intends to go into the ring swinging with the big Kaiser and Frazer autos again, too—and learn to land them in a lower price bracket where they'll hurt his opponents more.

"In the coming match, Kaiser has a new partner, the Federal Government. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is giving Kaiser-Frazer a $44,400,000 transfusion."

The Wall Street Journal story recites also how stockholders who plunged some $53,000,000 into Kaiser-Frazer's war chest before a single auto was built, watched the common stock plummet from a high of more than $23 a share to a 1949 low of less than $3.

Yesterday Kaiser-Frazer stock which was quoted on the New York Curb Exchange on Monday at $5.50 advanced to $6.50 per share.

Henry J. Kaiser is a builder and a genius when it comes to planning for the future. Yesterday at a press conference he reportedly said that plans for future expansion requiring approximately $300,000,000 can be financed without further resort to RFC. However this may be, the Congress ought to have a quick look into RFC's lendings to Mr. Kaiser's enterprises.

PAUL O. PETERS.

RFC LENDS KAISER ANOTHER $25,000,000

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation today granted another $25,000,000 loan to Kaiser-Frazer Co., to help it maintain auto output and get into defense production.

Simultaneously, Henry J. Kaiser announced the auto-making concern plans to open a plant in the San Francisco-Oakland area to make military products and is getting ready to go into shipbuilding.

The RFC attached a number of conditions to its new $25,000,000 credit, requiring Kaiser-Frazer, among other things, to:

1. Hold the prices of its cars to the present level unless RFC gives written consent to an increase.

2. Cut production to 600 cars daily—half Kaisers, half Henry J's—by January 1. Production already has been reduced to 800 cars daily from 1,400 daily before October 12.

3. Make conscientious efforts to obtain defense work and give it priority over the production of autos.

Excerpts From a Letter From a Reserve Officer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLENN R. DAVIS
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I suspect that quite a number of the Members of this House have received letters similar to one from which I am inserting excerpts here. As halting, as tardy, as incomplete as our manpower mobilization has been, equipment mobilization has been even worse. Slightly overage equipment is better than none at all, but the existing policy has been to get rid of all surplus materials at great financial sacrifice. I hope the additional billions for defense will be more wisely spent than many of our past billions have been.

The anonymous excerpts follow:

We have more equipment now than the last time I wrote, but it's still awfully short of what we should have. We have our six 240-mm. guns, but only one M–6 tractor to pull them with. It takes two M–6's to pull one gun, so you can see where we are getting with the big guns. Of about 36 radios we should have, we have 3, so that is coming along about as well as the guns.

Morale has been up and down a number of times. The preelection announcement of the point system for enlisted reservists made the boys feel pretty good for awhile, but like a lot of things, it, too, seems to have been forgotten.

It's quite disgusting to talk to other units and find that they are as short of everything as we are, and then reflect back to the days of war surplus sales when the items we are short of were sold for less than junk value.

It's also hard to understand that there isn't more activity in getting production and mobilization under way, the way we are involved in Korea right now, and will be for a long time to come. Russia could move in on Europe and we'd be helpless to oppose her. We haven't the European or English Armies to give us time as they did until 1941, so we'd better quit kidding ourselves and get down to business.

I think if anyone made a survey of what is available in our army camps today in the way of trained troops and equipment, they would be amazed and completely scared. I know that we out here certainly are from what we have seen and heard thus far.

Certainly, more than a few people in Washington should be made to account for the situation we find ourselves in today. Of course, it's probably second-guessing, but it seems so much of this could have been so easily prevented—what with the things we should have learned from past experience.

The Pause of Confession

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an article by Mr. George Sokolsky, which points out why we have lost so much prestige in recent years, namely, through our own sins. The article follows:

THE PAUSE OF CONFESSION
(By George E. Sokolsky)

We have lost a military war; we are losing a diplomatic war. Let us pause to confess. For unless we cleanse our minds of the barnacles of untruth, we shall suffer even greater disasters.

The truth can no longer be hidden. It is exposed by the retreat in Korea and by that strange palaver in the United Nations. A world should have arisen to our defense, and we should be standing shoulder to shoulder with all freemen. It has not happened.

Years have been wasted. Wealth has been wasted. Lives have been wasted.

It is false to blame Gen. Douglas MacArthur. He was not present at either Tehran or Yalta. He did not set the stage for our defeat. He did not give Soviet Russia $11,000,000,000. He did not open the door to agents and spies who stole our atom bomb and other devices of defense. He did not coddle Chinese Communists.

He must not be made the scapegoat for the errors he did not commit. If his judgment concerning the manpower of Soviet China was faulty, he has already answered that he took no steps without the approval of our Government and the United Nations.

Blaming this man or that will not avail us now. For the blood of our sons demands an answer to a question asked as far back as 1942 by Alfred Noyes, the British poet, in his book The Edge of the Abyss:

"How can we build a stable world again, or find any security for our children, or believe in any of the higher values that make life worth living, when the very foundations of all real belief have been shattered or sneered out of existence, in the intellectual and spiritual collapse of western civilization?"

It is a question that goes deeper than party politics or whether someone would have made a more able Secretary of State than Dean Acheson. It is a question that goes deeper than the events of yesterday or the conversations of heads of states worried about their majorities. It goes to the heart of our problem, which is that we have confused ourselves. We are paying a bitter price for permitting ourselves the luxury of the lie.

Noyes, in these same essays, says:

"The chief characteristic of the intellectual world during the last 50 years is its gradual loss of the old simplicity and integrity which went so deep—went right down to the roots of life with men like Milton and Wordsworth in literature, or Abraham Lincoln in statesmanship. This deep integrity of spirit has been replaced everywhere by a shallow cynicism, a spirit of mockery, sometimes clever mockery, but nonetheless a shining surface with nothing behind it."

This shallow cynicism and mockery is in our daily lives. May I recall such a figure as Charles Lindbergh? Do you remember how he was driven from public life and ridiculed? Was Lindbergh mad when he feared the opening of the world to Russia?

Do you recall how when certain American newspapers dared to question the wisdom of policies that have produced our defeat they were branded as Fascist? Are you ready to say that their warnings did not warrant consideration?

I watch men hopping on the tailboard of anticommunism these days. Those hoppers dare not risk the rising anger of a people betrayed. Like pickpockets, they melt into the crowd and shout, even louder than all others, "Down with Stalin."

Their shouts are a mockery. For decades now they have devoted themselves to the destruction of their own people, and now, when the consequences of their infamy are upon us all, they move over. Nothing will cleanse them but open confession.

We shall not go under. We are still a good and a strong people. But the thousands of American bodies that lie under Korean snows must be atoned. They must never be forgotten. On their tombstones should be the words: "A victim of cynicism."

The politicians have had their day. Now the American people must speak out loud and clear. And they should take count.

Only if a joint committee of the Congress—the best men in Congress—study truthfully and nonpolitically the causes of our defeat, reexamining every step that led to it since 1933—only so we can prepare a votive board where he who has it in his heart to confess, can do so under oath and in public.

Powers of the Rules Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 6, 1950.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: One of the most important recent legislative reforms was the bipartisan action taken at the beginning of the Eighty-first Congress to limit the power of the Committee on Rules to bottle up legislation favorably reported by the regular legislative committees of the House.

Regardless of which party may be in power, the spectacle of 7 Members—or even less—out of 435 assuming power to prevent the other Members of the House from having a chance to vote on a proposition that has been fully and carefully considered by the proper committee with legislative jurisdiction would be a discredit to democratic government in America.

Yet, a quiet movement is now under way to restore the Rules Committee road-block by depriving the chairmen of other committees of their present power to call up a rule if the Committee on Rules fails to act within 21 days.

In other words, it is proposed that the Members of the Eighty-second Congress again delegate to a few men the authority to decide finally even what legislation shall be brought up for debate.

I first presented this problem to all Members-elect of the Eighty-first Congress in a letter dated December 10, 1948 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 95, pt. 12, p. A5).

I again sound the call to arms, and invite Members of both parties to join in holding the gain we have made for democratic procedure, and for effective representative government.

With kindest regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

HERMAN P. EBERHARTER.

Futility, Frustration, Defeat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, if George Washington were leading our country today, I am sure he would repeat his words quoted in the editorial of the Glendale (Calif.) News-Press of December 7, 1950. It is a tragedy that we have not had his counterpart nor anyone approaching him since Abraham Lincoln.

At all events our present position in the world is so bad that while we cannot withdraw from our present international commitments we must forge ahead on the right road without too much regard for other countries, trusting that such other nations as may will follow.

Ours is a position of world leadership perforce. Wishing that a George Washington were leading us will not accomplish that tragically needed fact, and the only answer is for each one of us to do his level best until that leadership appears. The editorial from the News-Press follows:

FUTILITY, FRUSTRATION, DEFEAT

"Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, my fellow-citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake. * * *"—From Washington's Farewell Address.

Now that the Korean incident has given the United Nations its first opportunity to demonstrate its strength and effectiveness in an emergency of major magnitude, and the results of this demonstration are beginning to appear an increasing number of thoughtful American citizens are beginning to think that possibly the Father of His Country was not so far wrong, after all, when in his Farewell Address he earnestly and solemnly warned the Nation against entangling alliances with foreign powers.

The Korean episode, you will recall, was, at first, only a police action by the United Nations to halt an aggression by North Korea against its twin nation, South Korea. But it was the United States that supplied the initial force that attempted to turn the invaders back. And up to the present tragic hour a vast majority of the pitiful white crosses on the battlefields of the Korean peninsula mark the graves of American boys.

And when the crowning hour of crisis came and an overwhelming flood of Chinese Communist troops swept across the Manchurian border, the United Nations, in both the Security Council and the General Assembly, were bogged down in bitter and wordy debates over long-deadlocked issues and had not even a suggestion for meeting the new and more crucial problem.

The first reaction of member nations was criticism of the acts and decisions the United States had taken, under pressure of its enforced responsibility. The second reaction brought various suggestions for compromise and appeasement—any and all of which, if adopted, will result in the humiliation of the United States in the eyes of all of its enemies and will leave the entire Korean situation, from the viewpoint of every nation or people involved—excepting only Red Russia—worse than it was before the United Nations intervened.

The tragic record of futility, frustration, and defeat is not to be charged against any individual or nation. There may have been and most probably were, individual and national blunders and failures of discretion and duty. But the over-all cause of the calamity is inherent in the nature of international alliances and common undertakings by peoples and nations whose interests, objectives, ideals, habits of thought and traditional attiudes are divergent and often antagonistic.

It is these basic differences that are responsible for the bitter, heart-breaking delay as diplomats debate, denounce each other and entertain each other at banquets—while soldiers on the frozen fields of Korea fight against the greatest odds soldiers ever tried to stand against, conduct dismal retreats and rear-guard actions, or try to fight their way out of traps and encirclements by swarms of savage, drug-frenzied foes.

The sooner we get out of Korea—the sooner we get out of the United Nations, and the sooner we start working, earnestly, intelligently, and industriously on our own national problems, including the building of a military establishment capable of defending our Nation against any enemy, the better it will be for us and for everyone else whose welfare we cherish.

No nation on earth ever had so great an opportunity to solve, directly for itself, and indirectly for all mankind, the problem of a just and equitable and righteous social and economic order as has the United States—spreading across the heart of one great continent, with friendly nations on both borders, and friendly nations on the other great continents of the hemisphere, with a population made up of the best sons of all races on the earth, with the best form of government and the best—even if the shortest—tradition of individual enterprise, individual self-direction, and individual self-responsibility.

With the energy and genius that have marked our citizenry in the past, with wise leadership and united devotion to the task that remains before us, we and our children and our children's children can build on this continent a shrine of freedom, a mecca for free souls of other lands, and a tower of light and inspiration, which, in truth, may spread the light of liberty and justice, humanity, and good will throughout the earth; and to all the inhabitants thereof.

The national policy we urge herewith does not spring from nor imply any surly revolt nor any selfish withdrawal from the atttiude of friendship and community of interest and objectives of world peace and world-wide welfare which formed the inspiration and the aspiration out of which the United Nations had its birth.

It does not imply any lessening of our national friendship for the peoples of the Eastern Hemisphere, nor any renunciation of our duties and responsibilities for the safety and well-being of other members of the universal human family with whom our destiny is linked in the grand adventure of human progress and evolution.

The policy here indicated is suggested in the firm and well-considered belief that our own efforts—and the honest efforts of every other nation will be more effective, better managed and pursued with greater energy and singleness of purpose if our own Nation—and every other nation—acts as an independent, self-directed entity, free from the hampering complications, compromises, delayed decisions, and frustrated purposes that are bound to result—and do result, as is now so completely demonstrated—when many nations try to act as one.

Acting on its own initiative and with unfettered hands, the United States, in past decades, has given too many practical demonstrations of its international friendship and good will to have these qualities questioned now.

The Press and Excess Profits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the press of the country is becoming fully aware of the weakness and ineffectiveness of the so-called excess-profits tax which passed the House. It is a lame-duck bill, the putative father of which was the CIO. It will be interesting to see if another body in the great crisis in which this country finds itself will return a bill to the House which will raise the necessary revenue, eliminate the inequities, and avoid the punishment which the House bill sponsors sought to inflict upon the corporations and their stockholders. Let us hope that the enemies of free enterprise are not in the saddle.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting two editorials in the Appendix of the RECORD, one from the Washington Post of December 11, 1950, and an editorial which appeared in the New York Times Saturday, December 9, 1950. The editorials follow as mentioned:

[From the Washington Post of December 11, 1950]

EXCESS PROFITS

The $3,000,000,000 of additional revenue that the excess-profits-tax bill passed by the House is expected to yield (at the present level of profits) is a billion dollars less than the amount requested by the President. It is a very moderate over-all levy—in view of the huge aggregate volume of current corporation earnings remaining after payment of existing taxes. The question at issue, however, is not whether to tax corporation earnings more heavily, but whether to obtain the additional revenue from a limited proportion of all corporations in the form of an excess-profits tax or by an across-the-board percentage increase in the corporation income tax. With few exceptions, spokesmen for industry favor the latter method, which could be adjusted to meet changing revenue requirements, as an alternative to a much higher rate of tax on excess profits paid by a small percentage of companies. Under the House bill, for example, it is estimated that only 18 percent of all nonfinancial corporations would be subject to excess-profits taxation.

The strongest argument in favor of an excess-profits tax in lieu of increases in the ordinary corporate income tax is that a flat rate increase would create hardship for corporations whose profits are declining and firms that have not benefited from the defense boom. Nevertheless, a uniform tax increase spread over all business profits would be less disruptive in its effect on business and much less likely to interfere with industrial expansion than a tax imposed on a part of corporate earnings arbitrarily defined as excess profits.

The Ways and Means Committee was fully aware of the defects of the latter method of taxation. This was shown by its incorporation in the House bill of extensive relief provisions. These include a $25,000 minimum credit designed to relieve small corporations from payment of the tax, liberalization of World War II methods of computing average base-period earnings, allowance of higher returns on invested capital under the alternative, optional invested capital formula, and the setting of a ceiling of 67 percent on total taxes—regular and excess profits—collected from any corporation. Complicated special provisions have also been introduced. Relief is provided for rapidly growing companies with low base-period earnings. New corporations that began operations during or after the base period may be given credits equal to the average rate of return for their respective industries in the base period. Preferential treatment is accorded regulated public utilities that would virtually exempt them from payment of excess-profits taxation—a provision that, according to Secretary Snyder, would result in a substantial loss of revenue and cause the Federal tax system to "lose its effectiveness for equitably distributing tax burdens." Mr. Snyder also harbors doubts as to the justice of the preferential treatment accorded corporations engaged in the mining of strategic minerals.

To be sure, the House bill is an improvement on the excess-profits-tax system of World War II. However, the attempts to provide more adequate relief for hardship cases and the adoption of a base-period-earnings credit equal to 85 percent of the average for the three best out of 4 years (1946–49), instead of 75 percent as urged by the administration, will lower the yield. To obtain the $4,000,000,000 of additional revenue recommended by the President, therefore, the rate of the excess-profits tax, set at 75 percent, would either have to be increased, or the base-period-earnings credit reduced, with the result that the incentive to wasteful expenditures inherent in this system of taxation would become all the greater. Secretary Snyder has tentatively suggested that one way to prevent corporations subject to excess-profits taxes from cheating the tax collector would be to permit the Bureau of Internal Revenue to disallow unnecessary and unreasonable expenditures for tax purposes. This is a pernicious proposal. For it would give the Treasury such extraordinary powers of control over the spending policies of privately owned corporations as to constitute an intolerable and dangerous invasion of the field of private enterprise. Yet no one has suggested any other feasible plan for preventing the waste that is inevitably encouraged by heavy taxation of excess profits.

Apparently Congress is all set to pass some kind of excess-profits-tax bill at the present session. But it is to be hoped that any changes made in the House bill by the Senate will be in the direction of liberalizing rather than stiffening its provisions. That will, at least, leave the way open for consideration by the incoming Congress of alternative methods of raising still more revenue from corporation taxes. Considerably more than three or four billion dollars will eventually be needed from this source to help cover the costs of the defense program. The answer to the question of how much depends upon the (1) cost of the defense program, still a matter of conjecture, and (2) the decisions reached in regard to increases in other taxes.

Certainly the bulk of the huge amount of revenue that will unquestionably be needed to finance a pay-as-you-go policy or an approach thereto, cannot be obtained by taxation of profits. It will have to come from an expansion of excise taxes—a potentially prolific source of revenue—and increases in individual income taxes. These are the kind of taxes, moreover, that curb consumer spending and so arrest inflation. Taxes on corporations produce revenue, but if they are inequitably distributed, they are more likely to stimulate inflation than to discourage it.

[From the New York Times of December 9, 1950]

WAR PROFITS VERSUS HIGH PROFITS

Representative REED of New York, discussing Secretary Snyder's version of a wartime profits tax, charges that the administration "has disregarded its own fiscal advisers in favor of a plan advocated by the labor unions." In our judgment there is some circumstantial evidence to support Mr. REED's charge.

It is important that everyone should understand clearly the philosophy of the new bill. For if it is not challenged we may find that we have unwittingly and quite unnecessarily accepted, under the emotional stress of threatened war, a principle of taxation which is thoroughly evil, and which can come back to haunt us long after the world has returned to the ways of peace. Stated simply, this is the principle that for purposes of taxation private industry may be treated as a public utility—that the Government may step in at any time, in peace or war, and announce that it is going to expropriate all profits above what in its immediate wisdom it decides is a fair return.

Such an impost is a libel on the term "war profits tax." A genuine war-profits tax is a tax on windfall profits, to which no one has any claim in equity in time of war. But a tax directed at what a capricious Government may decide are abnormal profits, totally unrelated to war, is a vicious tax in at least two vitally important respects. In the first place, it strikes directly at the profit variable, which is the element that determines the movement of investment under the free-enterprise system, and that, along with the price variable, keeps that system in balance. In the second place, it discriminates between companies according to the degree of their profitability. The fallacy, and the reckless injustice, of this lies in the fact that all taxes must be paid, in the last analysis, not by corporations, which are purely legal entities, but by the shareholders as individuals.

It cannot be emphasized too strongly that the question of how heavily corporations should be taxed is not at issue here. Even among those who oppose an intelligently conceived war-profits tax there is no disposition to quarrel with the excess-profits tax because of the size of the tax burden it represents. As a matter of fact, the sponsors of the Republican counterproposal to the administration's plan (which consists of a combination general-profits tax and a true war-profits tax) maintain that these measures would actually produce $200,000,000 more than the latter.

Billions Escaping Tax Collector Through Unfair Tax Exemption

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to a glaring inequity existing under our tax laws, an inequity that will be tremendously aggravated by the passage of an excess-profits tax. I refer to the tax-free status of what is known as section 101, corporations. In the excess-profits-tax law of World War II there was a clause that specifically exempted all section 101 corporations from the provisions of the excess-profits tax. That specific exemption of section 101 corporations is again included in the excess-profits tax now under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I can find no possible legitimate excuse for the exemption of various tax exempt organizations and corporations from the proposed excess-profits tax, or for that matter for the continued exemption of them from the normal and surtax rates imposed upon their taxpaying competitors. Our present normal and surtax rates amount to 45 percent of the total profits of a taxpaying corporation. That makes an extremely high taxpaying differential between section 101 corporations and taxpaying corporations. Under the terms of the proposed excess-profits tax, we are going to increase that differential to 67 percent of all profits made. This just does not make sense. This inequity in our tax laws should be corrected.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent heretofore granted, I shall insert as a part of my remarks a letter that I have received from Mr. William L. Clayton, of Houston, Tex.

Mr. Will Clayton is an elder statesman whose judgment and opinions are held in high esteem throughout the Nation. He has had an illustrious career in business. He has served his country with distinction both at home and abroad. He has been a recognized leader of the Democratic Party, but even more he has served democracy with credit and honor.

His views are not to be discounted, therefore, when he declares that the income-tax exemption of certain competitive forms of business is being abused and should be canceled. His criticism of the tax exemption of cooperatives is based on competition which he has encountered in his own business—and I might add, Mr. Speaker, that if the very substantial business of Anderson, Clayton & Co. is bothered by the tax-exempt operations of cooperative competitors, the plight of smaller companies faced by the same situation may well be understood.

I welcome the sound advice that comes to me from so wise a counselor as Mr. Clayton, and I am placing his letter in the RECORD so that his opinions may be available to all of my colleagues in the Congress. In 1951, without any further delay, the income-tax exemption of the cooperatives, the mutuals, and similar organizations and corporations must be ended by proper legislation. Simple justice demands such action and, as Mr. Clayton says, a very large sum of revenue will be added to the Treasury's receipts for the national defense. Mr. Clayton's letter follows:

ANDERSON, CLAYTON & CO., INC.,
Houston, Tex., November 29, 1950.

Hon. NOAH M. MASON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MASON: I am sure you are thoroughly familiar with the fact that a very large sum of money, probably running into two or three billions of dollars, is eluding the tax collector through the improper use of so-called charitable and educational trust or foundations, through abuse by so-called cooperatives of tax exemption provided by law and by other similar methods.

Recently Anderson, Clayton & Co. had an opportunity, which they did not take advantage of, to sell their 50,000 acre farm in California to a so-called charitable, tax-exempt foundation. I understand the biggest cotton producer in California recently sold a substantial part of his holdings to this foundation. I have also been informed that the Campbell wheat farm was sold to the same foundation.

Furthermore, we are more and more finding ourselves in competition with tax-exempt, so-called cooperatives in the gin, oil mill, and compress business.

For example, cottonseed are now selling at $100 per ton and more. Suppose one of our cottonseed-oil mills can make a profit before taxes of $10 per ton in manufacturing and merchandising the products from a ton of cottonseed. The corporation tax on this is now 45 percent. This leaves us a net profit of $5.50 per ton. But our cooperative competitor has a net profit of $10 per ton due to his tax-exampt status. He thus has nearly twice as much profit as we have with which to expand his facilities or build a new mill. Morever, the so-called cooperative is not compelled to distribute profits to their member stockholders but can retain the entire profit for expansion.

This just isn't right.

With increased corporate taxation the advantage in operating as a cooperative will be so great that more and more commercial activities of all kinds will be done on that basis, squeezing out tax-paying elements and depriving the Federal Government of much needed revenue.

Many so-called cooperatives are going into the petroleum business in a big way.

When a tax-exempt charitable or educational foundation owns stock in a commercial coporation, the dividends on such stock accruing to the foundation do not pay an income tax. No one objects to this. But the corporation itself must pay the corporate income tax before the stockholders can get a dividend. This should be true of every commercial undertaking operated by a tax-exempt foundation even if such undertaking is not incorporated.

Suppose, for example, one of these foundations owns a building or a farm which it operates in its own name and not in a separate corporation. It seems to me that before any profits on such undertakings could accrue to the tax-exempt foundation, such profits ought to be subjected to the regular corporation tax which would have been paid had such enterprises been conducted in corporate form.

Hoping you will give this question your most careful consideration, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

W. L. CLAYTON.

Effect of Tariff Policies on the State of Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have in my hand a very interesting brief prepared by the Wisconsin Manufacturers' Association, located in the Marine Exchange Building, in Milwaukee, and received this morning from its distinguished executive vice president, Mr. Robert A. Ewens. The subject of the brief is the effect of the United States tariff on the State of Wisconsin, and the occasion of its release is the International Conference on Tariffs meeting at Torquay, England, in which the United States is now participating.

Mr. President, I have on many occasions commented on this tariff problem. I have pointed out that we of America recognize that trade, of necessity, must be a two-way street. I have pointed out that we are anxious to be good customers of the world and good sellers to the world. I have pointed out, however, that a reckless free-trade policy followed by the United States Government, far from helping foreign nations, could actually inflict grave harm upon them in the long run, because anything that endangers American prosperity and stability cannot help but hurt other countries.

In the brief sent to me by Mr. Ewens, he reports the considered judgment of the Wisconsin Manufacturers' Association on the very adverse effects that can accrue if our Government persists in a reckless tariff-slashing policy. The brief cites instances of harm to the United States motorcycle industry, the pulp and paper industry, the leather products industry, veneer plants, hosiery, sheet-metal works, rubber footwear, and so forth. I have previously mentioned practically every single one of these industries as offering a good illustration of harm that can develop from ruthless tariff slashes.

Now, Mr. President, we are all aware that under present circumstances, we are confronted in many instances by a shortage of goods rather than by a surplus; therefore, to a considerable extent, we cannot now perceive the long-term consequences of tariff slashes because the war crisis has made supply-and-demand conditions very abnormal. This does not mean, however, that we should forget that some day we hope to be in a state of enduring peace and stability. The long-range factors of supply and demand, of high-cost labor against cheap labor will again prevail. I urge therefore the serious consideration by my colleagues of this excellent statement by the Wisconsin Manufacturers' Association.

Lest it be assumed that Wisconsin is thinking solely in terms of competitive imports, I should like to point out that we of Wisconsin are a great exporting State also. We pride ourselves on the high-quality goods which we ship to the far corners of the world. Our desire for foreign markets, however, does not obscure in our eyes the fact that we have here at home in America the greatest consumer demand in all the world. Moreover, we recognize that the building up of export industries at the price of destruction of certain essential domestic plants is hardly the sort of situation that is desirable from a national defense or any other viewpoint, like that of economic health.

So, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, the text of this brief prepared by the Wisconsin Manufacturers' Association based upon the polling of its members.

There being no objection, the brief was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE IMPACT OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE ON THE STATE OF WISCONSIN

THE NATIONAL PICTURE

When international relations culminate in a crisis which can be solved only by military action, the industrial capacity of a Nation becomes its greatest asset. American industry has proved in two wars that its unrivaled ability for mass production has weighted the scales of warfare overwhelmingly in favor of this Nation. Our industrial strength was not achieved by accident. It represented the outgrowth of individual initiative, ingenuity, and inventiveness on the part of millions of Americans who were encouraged to advance by Government policies which for more than a century included protection for domestic industry through reasonable tariff regulations.

Increasingly in recent years, United States industry generally has been obliged to develop without the benefit of these protective tariffs. Despite the fact that foreign governments, even before World War II, subsidized their manufacturers in the export market, our industry was able to compete with these foreign-made products largely because the quality of their merchandise offset lower prices of competitors.

This minimum tariff American policy has no precedent on the part of any other major world power in modern history. While the intent of the reciprocal trade treaties of recent years in the eyes of the United States Government, was ostensibly to encourage healthy international trade, the program actually laid the groundwork for developments which is placing this country's industrial might in jeopardy. This is particularly true at this time when the United States Department is participating at Torquay, England, in an international conference on tariffs, which is expected to further lower protective barriers so that some 2,500 manufactured items can freely flow in greater volume from foreign nations into the United States.

At a time when this Nation is in a state of semimobilization, such additional imports can do much to ease the strain on the civilian economy, and from this standpoint, the immediate effects of further reduction in tariffs may be constructive, if inflationary aspects are ignored. We are concerned, however, with the greater problem that will arise once the present emergency passes. At such time, it will be possible to sell at retail from American store shelves foreign merchandise at a price much below the cost of actual production only of similar articles made in American factories. This situation will apply to every State in the Union, and will result in considerable loss of employment for persons now engaged in industrial work. In Wisconsin alone, the Wisconsin Manufacturers' Association has been informed by some 100 manufacturers who employed 55,608 persons at the start of 1949, that further reduction in tariffs will work a serious hardship on them in normal times. In a peacetime economy, Wisconsin factories employ about 8 times that number of workers, or approximately 450,000 persons. We have made no attempt to survey all these plants. The findings listed on subsequent pages, however, serve to indicate that the anticipated experience of the quoted companies will also be the lot of the firms who were not surveyed.

The present Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, is well aware of the impact that a wholesale free-trade program will make on American industry. He has chosen to ignore this threat and its consequences to the United States if a weakened industry is called upon again after the present emergency to arm a free world. As stated in the September 2, 1950, issue of Collier's magazine, Secretary Acheson has blandly proposed that Congress set up a fund to train for "new jobs" millions of American workers and to pension off with cash grants the thousands of manufacturers who are expected to lose their jobs or businesses as a result of a flood of competitive goods produced by cheap foreign labor.

Wisconsin industry is well aware that numerous trade associations have protested in vain against the State Department's present policy on duties. On behalf of its members, however, the Wisconsin Manufacturers' Association feels it would be derelict in its duty if it did not call this dangerous situation to the attention of the Congress which must rightfully determine whether the jobs of millions of Americans and their futures, must be placed upon the altar of free trade as a sacrifice to idealism, and whether the security of our Nation is to be imperiled without careful consideration of the consequences that will arise from sapping industry's vitality.

The industrial revolution endowed England with productive capacity which for centuries permitted it as a small nation to determine world events. When England allowed its industrial might to falter as a result of ill-advised Government actions and the drains of two world wars, its place in the sun began to fade. America today stands at a crossroads—one way we remain strong; on the other hand, by lowering tariffs, we pave another section in the road down which England is now riding.

THE WISCONSIN ECONOMIC SCENE

For many months considerable attention has been focused on the fact that huge imports of Swiss watches, unhampered by equitable tariffs, have undermined the domestic watch business in the Eastern States to such an extent that the training and employment of skilled craftsmen in this industry is seriously threatened. Since these workers are essential to military production in that they produce scientific instruments, the danger to our defense is self-evident.

In much the same fashion an unrealistic approach to this problem by the State Department has imperiled the stability of the motorcycle industry, whose role in a war economy needs no elaboration here.

Milwaukee is the home of the Harley-Davidson Motor Co., which is the largest producer of motorcycles in this country, E. V. Gumpert, export manager of that corporation, reports that Harley-Davidson has already filed a brief with the Committee for Reciprocity Information and the United States Tariff Commission. Further, oral testimony was given before the committee, but no relief has as yet been obtained from a duty rate of 10 percent on motorcycles and 15 percent on parts. The problem is amplified by Mr. Gumpert as follows:

"In March 1950, imports of motorcycles from England amounted to slightly over 73 percent of our domestic production, which means that for every four motorcycles we made, England brought in three. In April, this percentage was 44; in May, 56. Devaluation of the British currency has made it possible to offer British mortocycles in this market at prices approximately 25 to 30 percent below prices we can hope to meet.

"If (at Torquay) our Government should agree to reduce these rates by 50 percent, which is the maximum permissible, the new rate on motorcycles would be 5 percent and on parts 7½ percent. That is practically free trade, and it would mean that still greater quantities of English motorcycles would be sold in this market in competition with us. With increased inflation in this country, prices of American products are bound to go up, and these higher prices, coupled with practically free trade and a 30 percent devalued currency in England, make competition extremely difficult.

"At one time we exported between 30 and 40 percent of our total production, and various sections of the British Empire were our biggest market. Now we cannot sell a single motorcycle in the British Empire, with the exception of Canada, where we are on a quota basis. Throughout the balance of the British Empire, we are completely barred; the governments refuse to issue import permits because they say they are short of dollars and their good people should buy British motorcycles. This is an excellent means of completely barring competition. As a result of these restrictive measures, our exports now amount to approximately 10 percent of our production and will remain around that figure until such time as we are again able to sell in the British Empire. That time may never come. Meanwhile, our market is being flooded with thousands and thousands of British motorcycles each year, and still our Government is playing with the thought that we ought to reduce the duty by an additional 50 percent to still further increase these imports."

Wisconsin's second largest industry, paper and pulp, which directly employs more than 32,000 persons and probably twice that number indirectly, is also most vitally affected by the Torquay conferences. Already subjected to severe competition because of lowered import levies, this industry is now faced with the prospect that out of 21,921,000 tons of paper produced annually in this Nation, 13,001,000 tons of the production are involved in negotiations at Torquay, which may lead to further drastic cuts in rates. Moreover, of the grades not being considered at Torquay, many have already been subjected to the maximum reductions in duty permitted under present law. These grades include 1,000,000 tons of fine paper, 2,400,000 tons of wrapping paper, and 775,000 tons of newsprint, the latter being on the duty-free list.

We can all remember that during World War II, the slogan was "Paper has gone to war," and efforts were made to conserve its use so that vital military and essential civilian activities might not be hindered. Obviously, then, the paper industry, which aside from producing its normal product, turned out vast amounts of armaments and allied military products in World War II, is a critical one.

To contentions that industry may be complaining before it is hurt, the paper industry points to history to confirm its fears for the future. In 1913, when newsprint was placed on the free import list, Wisconsin had 13 paper mills making newsprint. Today it has one.

The more than 50 companies engaged in this industry have made previous representations concerning this matter to the State Department, but they too have been rebuffed.

The veneer industry of Wisconsin, with more than 3,000 direct employees, is in a similar position. It should be pointed out in this respect that of the 15 companies in this industry, only 1 employs 1,000 persons; the remainder are small and medium-sized businesses which are in no financial position to withstand long periods of intense competition for domestic markets. Moreover, in World War II, these companies were called upon to supply their products for a multitude of military items, including British mosquito bombers. This industry cannot meet the much lower labor costs of veneer producers in Canada, Mexico, Brazil, Japan, and other foreign countries. Moreover, foreign imports are competing for a well-saturated domestic market and, consequently, employment in this industry will be particularly sensitive to any increase in imports. Further details concerning the plight of this industry may be obtained from Robert N. Hawess, Barr Building, Washington, D. C.

While Wisconsin is not one of the largest producers of apparel, it is a leading manufacturer of leather products and hosiery. Edward Gerhardy, president of the Hansen Glove Corp. of Milwaukee, reports that his company has experienced extremely serious competition in the knit wool glove field from Japan, which today is shipping to this country 40 percent of the total number of dozens of gloves that are consumed in the United States. Prices, of course, are absurdly low because of the extremely low labor rates abroad.

"We are also beginning to feel the competition from Europe in the cotton fabric glove field," Gerhardy continues, "and any further reductions in tariff would so seriously affect our volume that it would probably necessitate our closing one or two of our factories, which at present are located in the smaller communities of Wisconsin. These production units have become some of the mainstays in the economic lives of these communities, and a cessation of our operations in these towns would seriously affect their economic position."

This company, too, reports that its national trade associations have protested without effect, over the Torquay proposals.

The Pfister & Vogel Tanning Co., one of the leading tanners of the State, points out that thousands of persons are employed in the various tanning plants in the State and they face the prospect of some job losses, the extent depending on the severity of the tariff reductions at Torquay and the length of the present emergency.

Erhard H. Buettner, president, declares that "competition from foreign countries in the field of leather has increased considerably in the past 1 to 2 years, and is expected to make further headway under present tariffs. The low labor cost in foreign countries is largely responsible for their ability to undersell in the United States despite our present duty rates. If tariffs were reduced further, the importation of leather would be speeded without a question of a doubt."

The Holeproof Hosiery Co. discloses that imports of hosiery during the first 6 months of 1950 were valued at $1,682,000, an increase of 58.9 percent over the like period of 1949. Admittedly, these imports are not now causing much difficulty, except in the case of wool hosiery from Canada and the United Kingdom, but the company feels that if tariffs were further reduced, some weakening effects on the industry are bound to be felt.

In the field of rubber footwear, the La Crosse Rubber Mills Co., La Crosse, has found that serious competition already exists in the domestic market because of lower import levies, and feels a further reduction could easily put this industry out of business.

In the highly essential metal industries, the situation is as yet indefinite, but stiff competition in some lines is already an actuality without any further advantage accruing to foreign nations.

Here is what H. F. Millmann, chairman of the board of Geuder, Paeschke & Frey Co., Milwaukee, a typical producer, has to say on the subject:

"We make a very varied and diverse line of sheet metal wares and, therefore, cannot give a categorical answer as to whether our volume is affected by imports. We do distinctly feel foreign competition in the line of milk shipping cans, sizes 20 to 40 quarts. Germany is offering German manufactured cans at prices 15 to 20 percent under our selling prices. Our selling prices return a very meager profit as it is, probably because the industry is overequipped. Our investment in facilities and equipment and presses for making milk cans is large and most of it is not suitable for any other purpose. Unless we get sufficient tariff protection, that division of our business is apt to suffer a constant loss and will be liquidated. It seems to us most unstatesmanlike to supply Europe with funds to buy machinery and otherwise equip themselves to produce various and sundry items and, by virtue of lower labor costs, ship such goods to the United States to harass our manufacturers and working people, if we permit them to do so by inadequate tariff protection."

Other reports might be added covering other industries, but the foregoing offers ample proof that the Torquay conferences and reduced levies which may result from them pose a threatening spear at the heart of Wisconsin's industry.

Documented evidence for entire industries in the Nation have provided similar proof that not only industry, but its workers too, as well as the merchants, have a vital stake in these deliberations that transcends partisan politics.

The Congress has here a problem that involves not only the welfare of the Members' constituents, but the vitality of the Nation's economic and financial systems. A solution too long delayed may provide our enemies with more comfort than they could obtain from many divisions of trained military forces.

Operations of Commodity Credit Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement from the News Bulletin of December 11, 1950.

SUMMARY OF OPERATIONS OF COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION FROM OCTOBER 17, 1933, THROUGH OCTOBER 31, 1950—REPORTED LOSSES TOTAL $2,473,139,523

Reported losses of the Commodity Credit Corporation for the period from October 17, 1933, through October 31, 1950, total $2,473,139,523 according to the latest calculations submitted to Congress.

As of October 31, 1950, the Corporation had $2,898,405,000 invested in commodity loans and price-support inventories. Cotton under loan accounted for $905,460,000 and wheat for $1,003,318,000. Nonbasic commodities totaled $621,310,000. On October 31, 1949, the amount outstanding in loans and inventories was $3,148,577,000. The inventory reductions and the reduction in commodity loans can be attributed to the rapid increase in wholesale commodity prices during 1950.

In 1933 the index number of wholesale prices of all commodities was 65.9 for the average. However in October 1933 it stood at 71.2. As of October 1950, the wholesale price index stood at 169.6. Thus the Corporation has been playing with dollars in an inflationary market.

In the 7-year period for which the report was compiled it appears that $263,691,250 was realized from transactions under the cotton loan programs and $185,872,485 from dealings under the general commodities purchase programs. These gains, however, were offset by losses among which were:

Irish potatoes	$414,534,712
Eggs	91,548,715
Wool	92,207,035
Peanuts	67,739,511
Dried milk	23,522,406
Butter	16,614,893
Grain sorghum	26,213,180
Sugar beets	16,517,269
Wheat	59,844,089

The loss on building grain bins for farm storage of commodities was $10,027,621. The bins which were for the storage of wheat and corn are scattered throughout the West Central States. The reported losses on corn totaled $54,630,041.

Although the Commodity Credit Corporation reportedly lost more than $92,000,000 in the wool transactions, it appears that as of October 31, 1950, the inventories totaled but 41,000 pounds of wool on which a value of $23,000 was placed.

Over $2,000,000,000 of the reported losses from operations was credited to the wartime consumer subsidy program.

Power Study for New England

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL
OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article entitled "Power Study for New England," published in the New York Times of Sunday, December 10, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POWER STUDY SET FOR NEW ENGLAND—SURVEY BY SIX FEDERAL AGENCIES WILL INCLUDE SEAWAY PROJECT AND NIAGARA RESOURCES

WASHINGTON, December 9.—Representatives of six Federal agencies announced plans today for a $6,000,000 study to determine what could be done to ease water and power shortage in New England.

The study, authorized by the 1950 Flood Control Act, will include a reappraisal of the proposed St. Lawrence seaway, increased power production from Niagara Falls, and New England's Passamaquoddy tidewater power project abandoned in 1941 as unfeasible.

Agencies named by President Truman to make the survey are the Departments of Agriculture, Interior, and Commerce, the Federal Power Commission, Division of Army Engineers, and the Public Health Division of the Federal Security Agency. The State Department will participate as a nonmember representative to handle international phases.

The study is an outgrowth of complaints from New England States and New York that lack of adequate power and water has caused many industries to move where these natural resources are available. Officials said the survey, which will be reported to the President for transmission to Congress, will be completed in about 2 years.

Governors of the States involved have been invited to sit in on the program. The overall aim of the survey will be to find out how to stimulate industry, conserve soil, improve forests, develop navigation, and assure adequate power and water supplies.

The decision to resurvey the possibilities of the Passamaquoddy project was reached after an international joint commission recently said it was "feasible from an engineering standpoint." The committee's study will be directed principally to determining whether it is feasible economically. It has been estimated that the cost of a thorough survey would be $3,500,000.

Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a telegram which was sent by Mr. John J. Sattler, commander of the Department of North Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars, to President Truman.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 4, 1950.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
White House, Washington, D. C.:

We feel that our Nation is in the most critical and dangerous situation that it has ever found itself in our history. We recognize that the decisions to be made at this time are dependent upon much information that only those in high positions in our Nation are possessed and that it may be difficult for all of us who do not have this information to understand all of those decisions at the time they are made. We wholeheartedly support and are in favor of a permanent peace at any and all cost. However, we strenuously object to any appeasement for a temporary peace which will lead to inevitable war.

We strongly feel that all ultimate decisions should, if possible, be made by the United Nations and all action, if possible, taken by the United Nations, as that Organization must be retained as the world guaranty of permanent peace. However, we feel that this Nation should place squarely before the United Nations in no uncertain terms the imperative and unalterable necessity of backing up its original decision to act in Korea to stop Red aggression, because, if the United Nations negotiates a temporary appeasement peace, they have sold their birthright for a mess of porridge and have relegated themselves to a mere debating society and can no longer justify their existence.

We recognize and fully appreciate and sympathize with the delicate and vulnerable position in which France and England find themselves in the event of total war. We fully appreciate that in the event of total war their peoples face the potential possibility of unfathomable destruction. However, we feel that they must be told in no uncertain terms that we cannot countenance another Munich, and we feel that the only hope civilization now has to prevent total war, as slim as that hope may be, is to stand firm and unalterable behind the original decision of the United Nations to stop Communist armed aggression.

We feel that already the United Nations has waited too long. We do not have days but only hours to avert military disaster and the slaughter and torture of 100,000 American boys.

We feel that our Nation has financed the democratic nations of the world against communism and we have been in full accord that we should do so. However, if we are going to finance the democracies of the world, we feel those democracies should mobilize at once so that we do not have to fight alone. We feel that from a military standpoint the only practical immediate hope of saving the situation in Korea is by the immediate amphibious landing of the Chinese Nationalist troops now stationed in Formosa. We urge upon you, Mr. President, to use every influence of our Nation to have the United Nations immediately order the Chinese Nationalist troops on Formosa into action; tomorrow will be too late; and in the event that this action is not forthcoming by the United Nations at once, that the United States of its own volition take steps to put in action in Korea the Chinese Nationalists now stationed in Formosa.

We strongly urge that Russia be told in positive terms that unless she withdraws her stooges from the battle lines and discontinues using satellite nations as Communist gun fodder, the United Nations will strike directly at the Soviet Union and with the atom bomb, if necessary.

JOHN J. SATTLER,
Commander, Department of North Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars.

Good Government Is the Greatest Blessing Any Country Can Vouchsafe to Its People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, in the course that our country has followed in dealing with the countries of the Old World, many thoughtful citizens of this country have come to feel that those responsible for Government policies and the plans that are being followed in dealing with the people of the countries of Europe and Asia, are erroneous and detrimental to the best interests of the American people in particular, and to all the people in general.

There is submitted herewith a letter from a citizen of Idaho for the consideration of my colleagues:

POCATELLO, IDAHO, December 8, 1950.
COMPTON I. WHITE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WHITE: In this dark hour, all thoughts are turned toward Washington, D. C., our Nation's Capital. We listen eagerly for something that will give us hope, and all we hear is discord.

There never was a time in the history of this Nation when there was greater need for united leadership than now, but if we are to judge by what we see and hear, there never was a greater dearth of this leadership.

Why cannot something be done? The boys are dying—fruitlessly dying, while we at home are enjoying every worldly comfort and discussing what effect this act or that word will have upon our chances in 1952.

It seems time to lay aside the politician's garb and don the statesman's robes. Our country is in grave peril. It will give little comfort to anyone, after the damage is done, to attempt to place the blame on someone else.

You, sir, may be fortunate in not having a son in Korea, but if you did I know that my son, who is there, would be better looked after. To allow this session of the Congress to conclude without every necessary thing being done to avert another world crisis would be a major tragedy.

There should be no Democrats nor Republicans in Congress at this time, but 531 patriots working unselfishly to protect our most cherished heritage—our liberty.

May God give you divine wisdom to see the right, and courage and a will to do it.

Very sincerely yours,

W. E. GEE.

Show-Down With Friends

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Show-Down With Friends," published in the Oregon Daily Journal, of Portland, Oreg., on December 4, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHOW-DOWN WITH FRIENDS

These are bitter times. They call for straight thinking, straight statements, and straight shooting.

We believe, therefore, that the United States must have an immediate show-down, not only with its avowed and fully identified enemies, but with its supposed friends. And we believe that the show-down with our friends should come before the show-down with our enemies. In fact, it must be that way.

Since that historic day, June 25, 1950, when the United States decided it could retreat no longer from Communist aggression and must stand and fight in Korea (under the UN banner) most of the members of the United Nations have gone along with us.

They praised America's courageous stand, said it gave the UN a new lease on life, told the United States to go to it, promised their support.

When things have gone well, they've been all for us. But when things have gone badly, as early in the Korean war, they've jittered. (Except British and Turks who are fighting, not carping.)

Now that things are going disastrously once more, with an entirely new war in our laps, they're hedging again, second guessing, criticizing our leadership.

That's the record.

Britain, for example, now wants to broaden the high command on a more representative UN basis. More than 100 Laborite members of Parliament threatened withdrawal of Britain's token forces in Korea unless the United States consulted Britain as to the possible use of the A-bomb. And Prime Minister Attlee, in a hurried trip to Washington, seeks to amplify Britain's views.

The French think we're sowing the seeds of a European war in Asia.

All Europeans think in terms of their own interests and their own safety.

All this propounds some serious questions:

What could we expect from our allies if we were involved in an all-out war with the Soviet Union?

How much real help could we reasonably expect from our friends in the Western Hemisphere—except from Canada, of course? Virtually none.

Could or would the Scandinavians come through? We know Sweden would not.

Would France and Belgium and Holland really fight if the Soviet armies swept across Europe? Frankly, we don't know.

Would Communist-ridden Italy help? It would not.

Would the western Germans, whom we've befriended and defended, fight with us? Recent elections indicate they wouldn't.

Would India aid? Not likely.

What does that leave us? The British, naturally. They exercise the prerogatives of a relative. They criticize us freely and expect us to do things for them and in their way. But when an outsider moves in they stand at our backs.

Who else is there, besides the Canadians and Australians?

This sounds like a brutal appraisal.

But we believe it is simply realistic. At least the burden of proof is upon our allies.

Our fighting men are dying by thousands in Korea. Our latest casualty list is more than 31,000 killed, wounded, and missing.

Who's fighting the war—despite token aid from 12 of our allies? We are.

Who's supposed to provide the money and equipment and troops to protect western Europe? We are.

And who is criticized when things go wrong? We are.

If our allies want a broader military high command in Korea, we're for them. Let them supply it—and the troops and munitions and money to go with it.

We're getting a little impatient with allies who talk a good game and like to coach, but want us to provide the uniforms, do all the blocking, carry the ball—and collect the lumps.

So we think a show-down is in order—with our friends first.

Then with our enemies.

What's Wrong With Labor Leadership?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. RHODES
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article by Walter G. O'Donnell from the New Leader of November 27, 1950:

WHAT'S WRONG WITH LABOR LEADERSHIP?

The labor movement is really moving through a profound evolutionary process. Union-management relationships are changing so rapidly that labor lawyers and labor economists hesitate to write books on the subject for fear that they will automatically become dated. A new and still nebulous body of law is evolving, with the aim of regulating the relations of labor and management toward each other and toward the public; and the outcome of this strategic economic development is bound to determine for a long time the structure, efficiency and equitability of our economic system.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Although the fundamental traditions and liberating purposes of the labor movement remain essentially the same, the changing institutional pattern of power and the increasing social effects of union activities have so altered the operational situation that new methods and functions—and a keen ethical sense of social responsibility—are required of union leadership today.

ROUGH-AND-TUMBLE GLADIATORS

In the old days, labor leaders were like gladiators, locked in rough-and-tumble combat with stubborn employers, most of whom refused to bargain collectively until forced to do so. Blocked by the restrictive provisions of an antiquated legal code, these early labor leaders had to fight relentlessly for every gain, generally without benefit of legal support, and sometimes in derogation of arbitrary legal formalities. This extremely adverse situation bred its type: the belligerent, strong-headed, leather-lunged fellow with heavy jaw and bulging muscles, whom some have since deemed it fashionable to stereotype and ridicule. But without the fighting qualities and courage of the old-line labor leader, trade-unionism would never have progressed.

With few exceptions, the old-fashioned labor leaders have grown up with the labor movement and have adjusted themselves to the modern era by developing a wider social vision and concomitant new methods. Among them there is now a more sensible appreciation for the public consequences of union activities. Keeping in mind that organized labor is still a minority of the working force, and that attention is directed to every public move made by a labor leader, the importance of breeding a new kind of labor leadership—one that is socially acceptable, dynamic, and can see beyond the immediate interests of the union membership—becomes obvious. It is only by being something more than a leader of labor that the modern union official can further the purposes of trade-unionism and extend its constructive influence into the affairs of the community.

The changed situation vis-à-vis the trade-unions, in which problems of increasing complexity and scope are constantly arising, is producing a new type of labor leader. Some of his features are already evident. He possesses well-controlled fighting qualities, moral courage, quiet persistence, a flexible intelligence. Soft-spoken and cool in debate, he is usually armed with legal logic, with the facts of economics, and with up-to-date psychological techniques for guiding group activity.

Thanks to New Deal legislation, organized labor is no longer as frustrated by hoary legal statutes as it once was, nor so completely the outcast of the courts. Protection of the right to organize and bargain collectively—as provided in the Wagner Labor Relations Act (before Taft-Hartley) and the Norris-LaGuardia Act, and in related legislation restricting the use of the injunction in labor disputes and exempting unions from the antitrust laws—have given labor a workable measure of equalized legal and economic influence with management. As a result, collective bargaining, one of the most essential institutions of free enterprise, has grown more effective as a mean of improving the conditions of the workingman and the processes of industrial coordination.

THE NEW PATTERN

Through the years of economic recovery and war, labor and management became more cooperative, and trade-union membership grew in numbers and in power. But the new pattern of more fairly balanced power between labor and capital, however workable, appeared offensive to certain managerial interests which had become accustomed to a continual preponderance of power on their side. Instead of being satisfied with an orderly up-and-down movement of counterbalancing but cooperative forces, management wanted the teeter-totter always tipped in its favor, and every time the weight of organized labor put management "up in the air" it yelled for help against the growing power of labor. This reaction culminated in the Taft-Hartley Act—which impartial economists, arbitrators, and legal experts who have observed the actual effects of it on collective bargaining agree has impeded, confused, and disrupted the orderly processes of bargaining, and has reduced labor relations more and more to a problem for litigation and decision by courts and governmental agencies. In short, the Taft-Hartley law and similar types of State laws are pushing labor relations into "statism" and unions into politics—with a vengeance.

Not only has the legal status of labor improved over what it was many years ago, but its economic strength has grown because key segments of the economy are so well unionized that labor's decisions, demands, and achievements are affecting the whole structure of our interdependent economic society. This explains the new widespread interest in labor, and motivates the growing social responsibility of labor leaders. No longer can individuals or groups afford to act in economic affairs as if they alone exist; at times, true, their interests may coincide with the general welfare—but on other occasions group demands may require modification or self-restraint to accommodate larger social needs. The strategy of the labor movement should embrace the broadest interests of society, working toward full employment at high levels of production under relatively stable conditions favorable to the creative effort and welfare of all.

A VITAL FUNCTION

Labor relations are no longer a gladiatorial contest before an amused but disinterested public, but are a most vital function in our economic structure which, when disrupted, can profoundly affect the social and economic fabric of the Nation. Such disruption may involve the chronic indigestion produced by obsolete building codes or the acute paralysis of a general strike. However, no one can expect an economic system to function painlessly, and some disturbances—even strikes in public utilities and the civil service—being symptoms of deeper disorders and injustices, may warrant a collective withholding of labor services as a last resort.

If the decisions of labor unions are to be made with reference to the interests of society at large, it is important that their membership as well as their leadership have an understanding of economics and other social sciences in addition to a practical grasp of immediate problems. Thoughtful unionists should, for this reason, consider the need for establishing a national labor institute to train labor leaders scientifically. Most institutions of higher learning conduct special courses for the training of industrial and business personnel, but very few provide facilities for educating young men for the difficult responsibilities of labor leadership. Yet the function of the leader of labor is rapidly becoming as vital as that of the businessman and industrial manager, and is likely to increase in importance as collective bargaining expands in the direction of union-management cooperation. Education has always needed the support of the labor movement; now the labor movement needs the support of education.

The nonpartisan business unionism of Samuel Gompers served to advance the labor movement during his heyday; but today, labor is in politics for keeps. The reason for this is clear. Labor made its greatest gains when formerly restrictive laws pertaining to its rights were reformed. When people in a movement which relates so directly to their personal welfare, as does labor, become convinced that government policy is the key to realizing the purposes of their movement, they are impelled to engage in politics on a partisan basis. More and more, labor-management issues are being transferred from the bargaining table to the realms of law and politics.

SPECIALISTS NEEDED

This legal-political process, from which a new labor-management pattern is evolving, requires of its participants a great deal more than skill in collective bargaining or ability to exert organized pressure. In fact, the functions of labor leadership have so expanded that, in the larger locals, in the State and national federations, and in the national and international unions, these functions can be effectively performed only when distributed among specialists. The most a small local can do is choose leaders versatile enough to meet the new demands of an efficient, modern union; but even on the local level it has become necessary to organize auxiliaries such as educational, public relations, and political action committees. A rapidly growing segment of labor, aware of its enlarged social, economic, and political responsibilities, is providing specialized services to fulfill those responsibilities efficiently. More than 50 national and international A. F. of L. unions have an educational director, a research director, or both; nearly all the large CIO unions are similarly staffed. Most unions have a legal department, and an increasing number are employing economists, statisticians, public-relations directors, and specialists in workers' education.

The labor leader in this age of specialization, fully aware of his new scope, is more than a representative of the interests of his union—he is also an executive who coordinates and directs a staff of specialists who assist him in administering union policy. In his capacity as executive he embraces the functions of an entrepreneur, a salesman, an I a statesman. The labor leader who tries to perform the whole job of union administration himself will either do it poorly, or kill himself trying to do it well; even an outstanding labor leader would have to neglect, say, public relations, education, and research in order to attend to pressing matters like grievances, contracts, and organization drives. A function like political action alone is not merely a problem in how to organize union members for effective political expression of their interests; it is also a matter of preparing the workingman for acts which will extend his influence further into the community, and of securing the support of nonlabor elements for policies designed to improve the general welfare. Successful political action, in this broader sense, involves marshalling the services of experts in public relations, workers' education, and economic research—areas where labor is most in need of improvement.

RECONCILING INTERESTS

Organized employers, in trade associations, chambers of commerce and manufacturers' associations, are using the techniques of economics, education, and public relations extensively to help them state their position on public issues in an effort to reconcile their interests with society's. This approach is legitimate, and not always antilabor; but unless it is balanced by other viewpoints equally well articulated, it may produce a strongly conservative bias in the community and thus obstruct the labor movement's progress.

Evidence of this systematic drive on the part of employers, which columnist Thomas L. Stokes has called the "conservative counter-revolution," can be found on every side. Millions of dollars per month are being spent in a campaign to resell the free enterprise system to the American public. Of course, labor is for free enterprise—but for everybody—and collective bargaining is one of the cornerstones of genuine free enterprise. But free enterprise is a phrase with many meanings and, unfortunately, for some whose fervor reaches fanatic proportions at mention of those holy words they mean free-booting. Interestingly enough, the free enterprisers are selling employers and business executives on the idea of getting out of their offices and into community life; as a result, some employers have even gone to as far as organizing tours of school children and teachers through their plants. Organized labor might follow this example with profit.

The World Crisis Stems From Many Errors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR V. WATKINS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Salt Lake City Tribune under date of December 7, 1950, written by Holmes Alexander, a well-known national columnist. The title of the article is World Crisis Stems from Many Errors.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

WORLD CRISIS STEMS FROM MANY ERRORS
(By Holmes Alexander)

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Depending on how you look at it, Capitol Hill reaction to the Korean setback has been (a) an orgy of blamesgiving or (b) a sober willingness to reexamine the causes of our plight. This column is based on an interview with an administration Senator who is as close to the White House, the State Department, and the Pentagon as anybody in Washington.

WHO'S TO BLAME?

He believes that—

1. It was a mistake to go to Korea and it is a mistake to stay there.

2. The decision to intervene in Korea was primarily a tragic popularity bid by President Truman who hoped to outsmart his Republican critics.

3. Everybody is in part to blame for our desperate predicament—the President on his guilty motives, the business leaders who called for tax reductions in a time of crisis, and mercurial American public which demanded disarmament in 1945 and shouted for action as the cold war intensified from 1948 onward.

4. We must now appease communism, abandon Asia, stall for time, and rearm in the realistic knowledge that we have lost the first battle of world war III and must go all out to win the last one.

LOSS OF FAITH

These opinions, which I am reporting and are not my own, go a long way toward revealing the disunity, lack of confidence, and loss of faith which prevail in the Capital City. These are not praiseworthy qualities, but they serve one useful purpose. They combat the old wives' tale that, having made one's bed, one must lie in it. If we lie much longer in this one, we shall certainly die there. The mood in which the Senator delivered those opinions was not defeatist by any means. It was a mood that called for understanding, for change.

We should understand, better late than never, that the cheers which greeted Mr. Truman's bold act of last June drowned out solemn military warnings. The Senator of this interview presided at some secret hearings, and sat in on many more, where the Joint Chiefs of Staff plainly stated that Korea was useless to occupy and impossible to defend.

OPINIONS OVERRULED

These opinions were overruled by the President. It is as simple as that. He reversed both his Secretary of State and his military advisers—all of whom might properly have resigned in order to alert the country. We went into Korea on the gamble that neither Russia nor Red China would fight us there. If either or both did fight us, the A-bomb was known to be our last resort—and still is. But the fate of the Korean campaign was always in Communist hands, not ours. Mr. Truman was playing his luck.

The President, far more experienced in politics than in military matters, was right about one thing. His popularity rocketed skyward as a result of his bold action. He was acclaimed abroad and at home. His Republican adversaries, particularly in the Senate, were covered with confusion as his action rebutted charges of appeasing communism and bypassing the United Nations. Is this the kernel of his Korean decision? The Senator under interview thinks it is. "I'll say this much," he said. "If the Republicans had not been hammering on Harry Truman, he'd never have gone to Korea. Blame him for it; yes. But blame the Republicans for driving him into it."

There from a close friend and adviser is one of the most pungent judgments ever made of Harry Truman. He wanted to be popular. He wanted to confound the political opposition. How much more infantile can leadership be?

EVERYBODY TO BLAME

As for the Senator's general statement that everybody is partly responsible for the fix we are in, that is surely a matter of the leadership we've chosen. If the American public has been wrong about Russia, the best proof is that we elected Presidents who recognized the Soviet Union as early as 1933 and expected to live in peace with Russia as late as last spring. If it was a mistake to believe in peace and prosperity, the mistake was made when we elected a President who promised these things in 1948. These are errors which we might as well confess and try to do better next time.

As for the rest, we lost the battle of Asia when Mr. Truman lost his gamble that neither Russia nor Red China would fight in Korea. Even if we stabilize the MacArthur line and defend it all winter, we must still win the last battle of world war III—the battle of Russia. We won't win it by carping criticism.

Military Courts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter by Arthur E. Farmer, addressed to the New York Times, under date of April 11, 1950. The letter has just been called to my attention, and I think it should be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of April 16, 1950]

MILITARY COURTS—PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF ACCUSED HELD NO THREAT TO DISCIPLINE

(The writer of the following letter served in the Judge Advocate General's Department. He is now chairman of the Committee on Military Law of the War Veterans Bar Association.)

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

In the Times of April 9, C. Bradford Welles says: "As a teacher and as an officer, I am familiar with the complaint that military justice is not justice. I agree. It is not and should not be."

Mr. Welles "justifies" this conclusion by assuming that justice is incompatible with discipline and that the decent administration of justice to men and women in the Armed Forces will "endanger the fabric of discipline which alone can secure victory."

Fortunately, the officers and administrative officials who are responsible for the leadership of the armed services do not appear to agree with Mr. Welles. There have been major differences of opinion respecting the requirements of a Uniform Code of Military Justice. But these differences have all been based upon conflicts in ideas as to the means by which justice may be insured, and not upon any doubt that the fundamental purpose of the court-martial system is to guarantee to every member of the services charged with an offense an impartial trial, with all the constitutional safeguards found in civilian life which can be afforded the accused under the exigencies of military service.

Notwithstanding the unanimous view that the court-martial system must be a system of justice, opponents of the proposal to eliminate the right of the commanding officer to appoint the courts argued that such a provision would subvert discipline and interfere with the armed services' primary duty of winning wars. Answering this contention, Senator MORSE recently stated upon the floor of the Senate:

"The best answer I can give is the statement of one general who testified before the War Department Advisory Committee on Military Justice that—

"Discipline is maintained by many means, outstanding of which is the proper administration of justice. There is no such thing as a choice between maintenance of discipline and proper administration of justice by the courts-martial system. Justice is administered through courts martial in the interest of maintaining proper disciplinary standards.

"Those of the Members of the Senate who have served, not in the exalted ranks of the generals and admirals but in the lower echelons of the military, naval and Air Forces, know that nothing will arouse the resentment of the men and women in the services as quickly and in such degree as the feeling that one of their number is receiving a raw deal from a court martial, and they will also know, as the rest of us must realize from our human experience, that a resentful individual is an inefficient individual and one who is far less amenable to discipline than those who have faith in their superiors." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 3, 1950, p. 1432.)

In this statement lies the basic refutation of Mr. Welles' contention. The Army realizes, if Mr. Welles does not, that men can be led but cannot be driven, and that the fundamental requisite for leadership is the leader's ability to inspire confidence. It has explicitly so stated in one of its field manuals. Men and women trained in the American tradition will not accept injustice as a necessary implication of discipline, and will refuse their confidence to officers who work on the contrary assumption.

Expediency is never a valid excuse for injustice. A stinging sense that a court martial has given a member of their unit a raw deal will do more to subvert discipline and destroy morale than those slight delays which may be inherent in giving a man a fair trial—the process which Mr. Welles refers to as legalism.

ARTHUR E. FARMER.

Current World Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on Sunday, December 10, I was interviewed on the subject of the current world crisis by Mr. Don Passante over Station WNJR, Newark, N. J. In this interview I expressed the belief that if the world-wide forces of freedom are to prevail we must stick to our friends and stick to our principles, and we must speak for those principles in truly inspiring terms to all the peoples of the world.

I ask unanimous consent that this interview be printed in the Appendix to the RECORD.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. PASSANTE. Senator SMITH, will you tell us what in your judgment are the most important steps to be taken in the present world crisis?

Senator SMITH. I would answer that, first of all, by saying what seems to me the general duty of all of us, the American people and free peoples everywhere. That duty, as I see it, is to stick to our friends and stick to our principles everywhere in the world. I think we must keep in mind that over-all duty as the guiding principle of our actions in all these problems that beset us today: Stick to our friends and stick to our principles.

Mr. PASSANTE. Why do you put it in just that way, Senator? Do you think there is danger that we may abandon friends or principles?

Senator SMITH. I wish I could say confidently that I thought there was no such danger, but I am inclined to think there is. To my mind, that is the greatest danger we face. That is just what the Communists want to bring about—they hope that each of the free nations will become so fearful of Communist aggression against itself that the morale and cohesion of the free world will fall apart and that every nation will try to save its own skin at the expense of the rest. The Communists are waging a war of nerves as well as a war of weapons in the hope of breaking our unity. We have to resist that war of nerves just as much as the war of weapons. We have to stick together and keep our heads.

Mr. PASSANTE. Senator SMITH, you have more than once publicly opposed the idea of a preventive war by the United States against Russia. Do you still feel the same way?

Senator SMITH. Very definitely. I know some Americans have sincerely argued for a preventive war, but in my judgment it would be a tragic error to start a conflict which might cost millions of lives both here in America and throughout the world at a time when we still have a chance to save freedom without a general war. On the same basis, I personally oppose the use of the atomic bomb unless and until we are forced into a total war.

If we are to preserve the unity and the common moral purpose of the free world, there are three courses which we must follow:

First, we must make crystal clear to the whole world our unflagging desire for peace. If war should come, we must be ready to fight it; but we ourselves must never yield to the temptation to be the warmakers.

Second, we in America must take the leadership in supporting freedom everywhere in the world, for large and small nations alike, in Asia as well as Europe. There has been pressure on us, of course, to abandon Asia with the idea of building up Europe. In my judgment that would be folly. The fight for freedom is a world-wide proposition. I am hopeful that our friends in Europe can be brought to see the matter in that light and join us in a world-wide effort to maintain the institutions we value. If we aim high I know we can find the strength to follow through.

My third point is that we must not appease anywhere in the world. We have had to retreat in Korea and we may well have to retreat some more. But don't forget we had to retreat at Bataan and still we won the Japanese war. No matter where the battle lines are, we must always be prepared for sweat, blood, and tears to save our principles, and we must refuse to enter into any unmoral agreements for expediency or under duress. As soon as we begin to compromise our principles, as soon as we begin saying that what was wrong yesterday is right today simply because it is backed by superior might, the unity of the free world will dissolve and the United Nations as a force for peace will cease to exist.

Mr. PASSANTE. Then, Senator SMITH, if you rule out preventive war and at the same time you reject appeasement, how do we proceed from there? Do you think there is any basis for negotiation with the Russians or the Chinese Communists?

Senator SMITH. That depends on them. Thus far they have shown very little disposition to negotiate in good faith. At the same time, on our side we would never rule out the possibility of honorable negotiation. We should explore every possibility through our diplomatic channels, because when the diplomats give up then the war is on. But I repeat, we must never entertain the notion of some Munich-type settlement by which we agree to what we know is morally wrong.

Mr. PASSANTE. One further question, Senator SMITH. Are you still hopeful that the Communist powers actually will negotiate on terms we can accept without a general war?

Senator SMITH. In other words, you are asking whether I still have hopes that a third world war can be avoided.

Mr. PASSANTE. Yes, Senator.

Senator SMITH. I think the Communist leaders in Moscow will negotiate only if they are faced with superior force in the free world. They showed that in the case of the Berlin blockade in 1948.

Therefore the great problem for us now in order to avoid war, and I want to emphasize this above all, is to build up the strength of freedom all over the world as fast as we possibly can. That means military production, it means sacrifices for all of us at home, and of course it means sacrifices for the other free nations, including Europe, who are having to turn back to military affairs just as they had begun to get back on their feet through the European recovery program. But if we see the need and if we stick together on a world-wide basis, we can do the job.

Last of all, but equally important, we must develop new means of breaking through the iron curtain and bringing the message of hope and freedom to all the people who are now under Communist subjection. That includes the Russian people. We must convince them that we are their friends, that we want peace and free communication and understanding with them. If we can get that message through in a powerful enough way, then we will add the good will of the Russian people and the captive peoples to the power of the free world.

Mr. PASSANTE. We know how concerned you have been with that problem, Senator SMITH, and we know that our Government's world-wide Voice of America program owes its existence to the Smith-Mundt Act which you initiated in the Senate more than 2 years ago. Do you think the Voice of America is doing an effective job today with its world-wide "campaign of truth"?

Senator SMITH. Yes; I think it is doing an increasingly good job. We greatly increased the size of its operations by a new appropriation this year. Yet nothing we have done so far is good enough. We still have the obstacle of Russian jamming. It is becoming more and more difficult for radio programs, printed material, and individual people to get through the iron curtain. We have that problem, and we also have the problem of how to express our ideals in terms which will have powerful meaning for people everywhere.

We cannot afford to neglect any means which will make a contribution to this effort. I have suggested the idea of a Voice of Freedom to inspire human beings everywhere with loyalty to the great heritage of our free civilization. Not only America but all free nations must enlist in this great effort. There is a vital place in it not only for governments but for private groups and individuals like you and me. It may be that the United Nations can help us in this work, because it is the principles of the United Nations which are at stake today.

This is something for all of us in America to think very hard about. As we build up our military power it must go hand in hand with the power of our moral principles, and our ability to speak for those principles in terms which will inspire all the peoples of the world. If we can do that, I am confident that we can save the peace and save freedom. That, as I see it, is the God-given destiny of free America.

The Hiss Verdict

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me and an editorial entitled "Hiss Verdict Upheld," published in the Washington Post of December 9, 1950.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MUNDT

The unanimous decision of the circuit court of appeals in New York, upholding the conviction of Alger Hiss, brings close to a conclusion this notorious espionage and disloyalty case which is certain to rival in history—if not exceed—the transgressions of Aaron Burr.

As acting chairman of the subcommittee in the House of Representatives in the Eightieth Congress which undertook the investigation of Alger Hiss, which heard the shocking testimony of Whittaker Chambers, and which disclosed the documentary evidence leading to the indictment and conviction of Hiss, let me say it is good to know that the long-continued activities of Hiss in his connivance with the Communists are about to be abruptly ended by his impending incarceration.

The attached editorial from the Washington Post is especially interesting because the Post was one of those newspapers in America which in its cartoons and editorials lambasted our committee viciously when we were investigating Alger Hiss. Speaking from the vantage point of writers and cartoonists entirely devoid of the actual facts in the case, it is perhaps understandable that the early position of the Post was to defend Hiss and to denounce the committee which was serving the public interest by trying to amass the evidence required to disclose his treacherous activities. In all events, I congratulate the Post on the attached editorial which indicates that unlike the tragic example of Dean Acheson it is now entirely willing to "turn its back" upon the Communist agent it had mistakenly defended in its earlier policies.

Now all that remains is for Herb Block to draw some cartoons which in their attack upon characters like Hiss will be at least partially as passionate and pertinent as those he drew to attack the men and the committee which were responsible for the exposure and the conviction of Alger Hiss.

Like the editors of the Post, I have often marveled at the iron nerve, the disciplined emotions, and the stubborn silence of Alger Hiss in failing to come clean now that we are in a life-or-death war with world communism. He could tell much if he would which would help America even at this late hour. He could give us many names of people in and out of Government whose identity as spies or agents of Russian communism would help save the lives of American boys now dying in Korea. As the Post so clearly points out, by so doing Alger Hiss might at least make it easier to live with his fellow citizens when his term is over and with his conscience in the meantime. By making such disclosures now—just as Whittaker Chambers and Elizabeth Bentley did long ago—Alger Hiss could at least do belatedly a constructive service for the country which has done so much for him but which he has never done anything to defend in time of war.

However, it was indeed a strange cabal of characters that were associated with Hiss in the Communist conspiracy of which he and Chambers were a part. Apart from Chambers who freely confessed, and Henry Julian Wadleigh who turned state's evidence when it was made clear to him the statute of limitations would prevent his arrest, the others in that sad story of deceit and treachery have followed the code of gangland and refused to talk. Some like, Noel Field have fled the country and disappeared entirely from public view; some like Lawrence Duggan and Harry Dexter White have carried their secrets to the grave in premature deaths; some like Nathan Gregory Silvermaster, and many others have pled constitutional immunity against having to testify with self-incriminating evidence; some like Donald Hiss, brother of Alger, and law partner of Dean Acheson, have been protected from investigation by the fact that when the Democratic Congress took over from the Republican Eightieth Congress, they put the House Committee of Un-American Activities entirely under new controls and leadership and refused to continue the investigations of the Chambers' testimony which the Republican Eightieth Congress had begun and which had led to the conviction of Alger Hiss. The Democratic high command was so upset by this conviction, they even removed from the House Un-American Activities Committee two prominent Democratic Members who had served on the subcommittee which brought about the Hiss conviction.

Thus we are involved with war against communism but many who can and should tell the country the names of operatives in and out of government whose machinations helped so greatly to involve us in the present situation will not talk and the appropriate committees of Congress up to date have failed to force out the evidence by the necessary vigorous investigations required to produce it. Up to date, no name supplied by Whittaker Chambers has demonstrated innocence once indicated by the Chambers testimony, but many named by Chambers have never been submitted to the same careful and comprehensive investigation and public hearings without which in the case of Alger Hiss, the indictment and conviction of this notorious character would never have been secured. It is unfortunate indeed that the appropriate committees of Congress have not courageously completed the work they so nobly started.

[From the Washington Post of December 9, 1950]

HISS VERDICT UPHELD

The circuit court of appeals in New York has done nothing to solve the mystery of Alger Hiss, but it appears to have removed any lingering doubts as to the fairness and legality of his conviction. Attorneys for Mr. Hiss pressed every conceivable challenge to the jury's verdict and Judge Goddard's conduct of the trial. At no point does it appear that they came close to convincing the circuit judges that there was any material weakness in the verdict. As Judge Harrie B. Chase, who wrote the opinion, and Judges Augustus N. Hand and Thomas W. Swan, who concurred, are eminent men of the law, their unanimous conclusion seems to establish the guilt of Mr. Hiss with about as much certainty as can be attained by the judicial process.

It is not the function of an appellate court, of course, to try a case over again. But the court did thoroughly comb through the record and found that "there was independent evidence sufficient as a matter of law, if believed and so considered by the jury, to substantiate the testimony of Mr. Chambers in compliance with the rule in perjury cases as to both counts." The opinion also analyzes enough of the testimony to indicate that it would have been very difficult for the jury to have arrived at any other verdict. No doubt Mr. Hiss will ask the Supreme Court to review the case, but as that Court hears cases only in the interests of clarifying the law it may see nothing in a petition from Mr. Hiss that demands its attention.

There is every indication also that Mr. Hiss prefers to go to prison as a man of mystery, stoutly protesting that he never betrayed his trust as a State Department official. That, of course, is his privilege. At no point in our judicial process is a man required to confess or to testify against himself. Yet this cool and cynical perjurer ought to realize that his one chance of softening the attitude of the American people toward himself is to come clean and tell all he knows about the Communist spy ring that was apparently operating with his connivance. That service to his country would not in any degree wipe out his guilt or minimize the despicable nature of his offense, but it would doubtless make it easier for him to live with his fellow citizens when his term is over and with his own conscience in the meantime.

One More Question, Mr. President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include the following article appearing in the December 16 issue of America, national Catholic weekly, entitled "One More Question, Mr. President:"

ONE MORE QUESTION, MR. PRESIDENT

(By M. Amrine, E. A. Conway, S. J., and M. S. Levine)

(A Catholic, a Jew, and a Protestant explore some of the moral implications of President Truman's stated position on the use of the atom bomb. Father Conway, associate editor of America, is joined by Murray S. Levine, chairman of the New York Committee on Atomic Energy, and Michael Amrine, former education director of Brookhaven atomic laboratory.)

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In your reply to questions at your press conference on November 30 about the use of the atom bomb and also in the clarifying statement issued later the same afternoon from the White House, you stated that there has been active consideration of the use of the bomb since the outbreak of hostilities in Korea.

You issued your clarifying statement to make it certain that there is no misinterpretation of your answers at the press conference. In search of further certainty we beg leave to ask one more question:

In this active consideration of the use of the atom bomb is due attention being given to the moral questions involved in its use? Or, to rephrase the query, does our Government consider the question of how the bomb is to be used just a military question?

This point arose during one exchange at your conference, and your answer was explicit—and, as the indirect transcript testifies, very swift. We believe half the panic abroad arose from the not unwarranted fear that the bomb might be used as swiftly.

After you had replied to a questioner that there has always been active consideration of the use of the atom bomb, since it is one of our weapons, the following exchange ensued, according to the Washington Post:

"Question. Does that mean, Mr. President, use against military objectives or civilian?"

"Answer. Mr. Truman, interposing said * * * that it was a matter that the military people will have to decide—that he was not the military authority that passes on those things."

After confusing press reports had spread the impression abroad that you had authorized General MacArthur to use the bomb in Korea, your clarifying statement was issued in which it was explained that:

"Only the President can authorize the use of the atom bomb, and no such authorization has been given. If and when such authorization should be given, the military commander in the field would have charge of the tactical delivery of the weapon."

That last sentence, it sems to us, Mr. President, itself needs clarification. Does it mean that you decide only the "if and when" and that "the manner of its use will be subject to determination by the military commander in the field"? We hope that this interpretation, found in a Washington Post editorial obviously trying to put the best possible construction on your remarks, is another misinterpretation. The atom bomb is not immoral in itself. It is the manner in which it is used that determines the morality or immorality of atomic bombing. Do you actually intend to leave to the harried judgment of a field commander the choice between, say, the bombing of military installations, which is legitimate, and the terror-bombing of civilians, which is not?

Please do not misunderstand us, Mr. President. We do not ask the United States to give up its atomic weapons, nor even to give the impression that they would not be used. We agree with the Washington Post that it would have been irresponsible folly on your part to renounce categorically the use, under any circumstances, of our most potent weapon, and that you were well advised to emphasize that it is a usable weapon, not a museum piece. What we do seek is a clearer explanation of the circumstances in which it would be used, and the assurance that you and your civilian advisers will dictate not only the if and when, but the circumstances themselves.

We fear, Mr. President, that unless you retain such control, military expediency alone will be the sole criterion. In this connection we quote from a masterly document opportunely published just 3 days before your press conference by the Federal Council of Churches, entitled "The Christian Conscience and Weapons of Mass Destruction." The basic fear of the drafting committee, which included, besides a score of eminent Protestant theologians, three prominent laymen who had been associated with atomic projects, is that the United States will follow the philosophy of total war, or war in which all moral restraints are thrown aside and all the purposes of the community are fully controlled by sheer military expediency.

The committee voices a warning that all of us should heed as we move ever deeper into conflict:

"We must recognize that the greater the threat to national existence the greater will be the temptation to subordinate everything, all civil rights, the liberty of conscience, all moral judgments regarding the means to be used, and consideration of postwar international relations, to the single aim of military victory. * * * Just as death is preferable to life under some conditions, so, too, victory at any price is not worth having. If this price is for us to become utterly brutal, victory becomes a moral defeat. Victory is worth having only if it leaves us with enough reserves of decency, justice, and mercy to build a better world and only if it leaves those we have conquered in a condition in which they can ultimately cooperate in the task of setting forward God's purpose in creation. Hence the way we fight and the means we use are of crucial importance. Military expediency * * * cannot be the sole test, but must be subordinated to moral and political considerations."

The military commander in the field cannot be expected to give proper weight to those considerations. It is just because his sole test is military expediency that the moral choices involved in atomic bombing cannot be left to him. Upon those choices may well depend the whole future of our civilization. Therefore, says the Federal Council's committee: "The National Government must not yield to the military its own responsibility for the immediate and the postwar consequences of the conduct of the war."

Undoubtedly this consideration influenced Congress in 1946 when, after long and serious discussion of military versus civilian control of atomic energy, it passed the Atomic Energy Act. Do we misinterpret that act, Mr. President, when we observe that it seems to invest you with wider responsibility for the conduct of an atomic war than you seem to have acknowledged either in your press conference or in your clarifying statement? We refer specifically to the section which gives you supreme authority over the atom bomb:

"The President from time to time may direct the Commission (1) to deliver such quantities of fissionable materials or weapons to the Armed Forces for such use as he deems necessary in the interest of national defense."

That, Mr. President, is an extremely broad grant of discretionary power, as you—and we say it sympathetically—must be only too well aware. In another field it would undoubtedly be subject sooner or later to review by the Supreme Court for official interpretation of the intent of Congress. But this grant of power is unique, in the sense that the decision you make under it will be final, subject to no review excepting history's.

As we read the act, it empowers you to turn the bombs over to the military to be used in the way you—which in effect is you and the National Security Council—deem necessary. In other words, the law seems to give you responsibility not only for the if and when, but for the how this weapon is used. It would, therefore, seem inconsistent with the letter of the law if you were to delegate to a military subordinate part of that decision which by law devolves upon you. We have already noted that it is just the part of the decision most fraught with danger to the ultimate purposes of our foreign policy Even if it would not be inconsistent with the letter, would it not be inconsistent with the spirit of the law, with what seems to have been the obvious intent of Congress, and with the tradition of the American people, who have always guarded the primacy of the civilian over the military in matters of national defense?

We have asked more than one question, we admit. But they boil down to this request. Will you, in the way you deem best, further clarify your atom-bomb policy? The questions we have raised are real questions which are bothering, we believe, not only ourselves but millions more at home and abroad. Only you, Mr. President, can allay the fears your press conference caused in the minds of your fellow men.

Subversives Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "A Job for Congress," published in a recent issue of the Christian Science Monitor.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

A JOB FOR CONGRESS

One of the first jobs Congress should take up when it returns to Washington is a review of the so-called Internal Security Act which it passed in such haste over a Presidential veto before the Members rushed off to the hustings in their respective States.

This act, a major portion of which is known also as the Subversives Control Act or McCarran Act, has been in effect long enough, even in a matter of weeks, for people to appraise some of its shortcomings and the disturbances it has caused.

One effect, the hardship it has laid on a large number of legitimate travelers to America whose visas were suddenly canceled for reinvestigation, is largely past and cannot be rectified.

A similar effect is showing up in postponement of final naturalization ceremonies for groups of applicants who have complied with all prior requirements for citizenship but who now must be screened to determine if they belong to any organization that is * * * required to be registered under the act.

Since it is a matter of months if not years before the newly established Subversives Control Board can determine what organizations are required to register, the naturalization process would appear to be practically suspended for a while, keeping in alien status a number of desirable potential citizens as well as any undesirables.

Seth W. Richardson, chairman of the examining board, declares himself to be of an open mind but intensely curious as to whether the criteria and methods legislated for identifying Communist-front or Communist-action organizations are workable. This will take some time to judge after the Department of Justice has prepared its voluminous cases against the American Communist Party and a long list of related or suspected groups.

But already the Attorney General has had to step in with a ruling to modify the operation of the law where it was excluding from the United States persons whose connection with Fascist or Nazi organizations was only a nominal one in childhood or under duress many years ago. These may be given only temporary visas.

It is not desirable to depend on administrative modification to correct inequities in a law, for administrative discretion can also be abused. Congress should complete its job.

More than an administrative judgment is involved, for example, in determining whether President Truman was right in protesting that the list of defense activities required to be published under the law would be a convenient checklist for saboteurs.

The United States has had a great deal to learn about how to curb Communist or other totalitarian activities effectively, and that learning process did not end with the passage of the McCarran Act.

The Problems of Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Junction City (Oreg.) Times for December 7, 1950. The editorial is very interesting. It sets forth some sound grass-roots philosophy, and contains a practical lesson which should be heeded by all of us, in this great period of crisis in our country.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

A farmer settled in raw country. Over a period of years he built up a good farm, built good barns, equipped it well, and ridded out all the weeds and brush, even to the wild mustard in the fields. He acquired position and prospered, and also a few holdings in another part of the county.

But as the years went by he began to spend more and more of his time telling the other farmers how they should run their places, what organizations they should belong to—in fact, it got to the point that he began criticizing his neighbors' fences, livestock, machinery, and even the way the children acted. He even began trying to settle all the neighborhood quarrels—his way, of course.

The sad part of the story is that by his eagerness to be all things to all men he let his own place go down, the neighbors' scrub stock got to running with his good herds and due to hard-luck stories he gave away much of his good seed corn. After a long series of borrowing funds against future crops he found himself heavily in debt, his family dissatisfied, and even the hired help finding fault, careless in their work and indifferent to his plans.

Meantime a Johnny-come-lately had come into the picture and was not only running a pretty big place himself but leasing or otherwise taking over the operation of many other smaller outfits in the county and nearby. There was much distrust of this newcomer—both his methods and the way he treated his help and his attitude toward his neighbors was open to suspicion. It became increasingly apparent that he was out to grab everything worth grabbing by fair means or foul. And the question all of the neighbors were asking was, "What's the old pioneer going to do—take care of his own place and bring it back to its former good condition, or just go on as he is and still try to outfox this newcomer, and maybe lose everything seeing as how his own folk's don't altogether trust his good intentions any more."

The problems of nations are just the problems of people, multiplied in size but basic in principle.

Congress and Our Municipal Governments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Congress and Our Municipal Governments," by Hon. W. Cooper Green, mayor of Birmingham, and president of the Alabama League of Municipalities. This very able and timely address was delivered by Mayor Green at a dinner given in Washington on the evening of Monday, December 4, 1950, by the Alabama delegation to the American Municipal Congress. The dinner was in honor of Alabama's two United States Senators and the Members of the House delegation in Congress.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS AND OUR MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENTS

This is in many ways a most unusual get-together. I doubt if there has ever before been such a meeting in Washington—a meeting where duly elected spokesmen for home-town governments back in Alabama have come to Washington to personally express appreciation to you, our spokesmen at the national level, for the fine job you have done for Alabama people—and for our local community governments.

It is altogether fitting that we should take time out from our day-to-day running of our home-town governments and appraise the relationship existing today between our local and Federal governments, and compare that relationship of today as against the situation 20 or 30 years ago.

It is also very appropriate that we, as local government officials, let you, our leaders here in Washington, know what your actions here have meant to the well-being and progress of our local communities—your home towns and those of your Alabama constituents.

I have perhaps stepped ahead of my prerogative as president of the League of Municipalities in making this talk, or giving you this message. Perhaps it should have been made by our distinguished chairman of the league's Committee on Federal City Relations, the lovable mayor of Mobile—Ernest Megginson. But, somehow, I felt that what I have to say may reflect the thinking of most of us in local government. So, I'm sure Ernest will pardon me if I step into his field and speak briefly on Federal-city relations in this interesting period in our Nation's history.

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT GROWS UP

There are those in our country, even in our own State of Alabama, who argue that the Federal Government has grown and grown in recent years, and because it has grown so remarkably that everything is going haywire—that everything is out of balance, governmentally speaking. I'm going to say to you people here tonight something that may sound strange for one connected with local government. I'm going to tell you that the Federal Government has not grown as fast or as much out of proportion to its size of 20 years ago as has our State government and most of our city governments. Those who harp about the size of the Federal Government never mention the great increase in serviceability of that Government, or the increased good that Federal services have done for our people. They talk only about cost in dollars and cents and the number of Federal employees. Because it costs more to run our Federal Government and takes more people to run it, the opponents of the Federal Government say the situation is all bad. I want to say a few words tonight in opposition to that viewpoint.

In my home-town afternoon paper, issue of a week or so ago, there appeared a full-page advertisement signed by an organization which claims that its purpose is to develop and promote a better understanding of the American way of life. The advertisement pointed out that in 1949 "your Federal Government spent over 12 times as much as in 1929—$3,000,000,000 in 1929, over $40,000,000,000 in 1949." It then pointed out that in 1949 the Federal Government "hired over 9 times as many civilian employees as 20 years ago—500,000 civilian employees in 1929, 2,000,000 civilian employees in 1949."

Now, let's see what the facts are; the facts as distinguished from propaganda against our Federal Government. I'm defending the Federal Government tonight because those who attack the Federal Government would just as quickly attack our city and town governments. They're against almost everything that all governments do. Then, too, we officials and people back in the local communities are a part of the Federal Government just as much as we are a part of the local city or town government. The relationship between the Federal and home-town governments is so close that when someone jumps on one or the other, it's like some individual jumping on your brother or cousin. We just naturally resent an enemy jumping on our folks—our kinfolks, so to speak. So, our Irish gets up. It gets up when we see and hear reckless individuals and organizations going about lambasting the Federal Government because it happens to be big. Sure, it's big. It serves 150,000,000 people. No other nation in the world today serves daily as many people in so many worth-while ways.

Getting back to the advertisement that appeared in my home-town newspaper about the size of the Federal Government's expenditures in 1949, as compared with 1929 expenses, let me say what Senator JOHN SPARKMAN has already so ably stated—that 70 percent of the annual budget of the Federal Government goes for payments on debts of two World Wars, veterans' payments, benefits, and services, and to prepare to avert in the future the costly errors of unpreparedness that preceded the last World War. That leaves 30 cents in each Federal dollar to be spent on domestic or normal Federal services. That's 4 times—not 12 times—what the Federal Government was spending in 1929 for Federal services. Is there anyone in this room tonight who doubts that the Federal Government is rendering more than four times as many services today as against 1929 for our people? When we realize what twelve billion Federal dollars is getting for us today in the way of Federal services and benefits, we wonder what $3,000,000,000 was spent for in 1929 when there were no old-age and survivors insurance program for the millions of our wage earners, no farm benefits, no expansive soil conservation program, no program to electrify rural and urban homes, no rural telephone program, no extensive development of our rivers and inland waterways, no flood-control measures to speak of, very little in the way of interstate road building, no airport program, no slum clearance and low-cost housing programs, no Federal-aid hospital program, no free school-lunch program, no Federal aid school-building program, very little in the way of vocational education federally supported.

Yes; the Federal Government for $3,000,000,000 in 1929 was doing a few things for our people. It provided lighthouse service for our merchant shipmen and fishermen, limited forest fire prevention services, planning of waterways projects, a limited Federal road program. There were some funds expended for vocational education. But the principal service that you and I looked to the Federal Government for in 1929 was the postal service. We did not then, as now, expect aid for small-business men. If there was any Federal aid for businessmen, it was for the great monopolies, not for the little fellow who needed the helping hand of his Government. We did not then as now look to the Federal Government for protection of bank deposits. The 1929 Federal Government to which so many of our citizens now like to point as the model government was the Government that allowed big business to squeeze to death little business, let our banking system drift into ruin and bankruptcy.

And, while the Federal Government is 4 times—not 12 times—bigger than in 1929, our State government in Alabama is 6 times bigger today than it was at that time. The figures gathered from our State comptroller show that just a little more than 20 years ago the State's revenues were $32,000,000. During the past fiscal year they were $191,000,000. Compared with 30 years ago our State government is 24 times larger today—in just 30 years, mind you. But the enemies of the Federal Government in Alabama never mention that. That would be too fair. In our city governments our expenditures have increased in about the same proportion.

So, my friends, after we eliminate the war and defense and veterans' costs from the Federal budget, our Federal Government has not grown to the same extent in the past 20 to 30 years as have our State and local governments.

WHY DO THEY GROW?

The thing that has made the Federal Government four times larger in 1950 than it was in 1930 and 1920 is the same thing that has made our State and local governments larger—an ever-increasing demand on the part of those who pay for government for more and more services and benefits from government. In the full-page advertisement that recently appeared in my city's afternoon newspaper, to which I referred a moment ago, appeared this comment: "About 25 cents out of every dollar earned by the people goes for Federal, State, and local taxes." What does that outlay get for the people? I've already mentioned some of the gains—social security, hospitals, schools, roads, rural electrification benefits, farm income improvement, airports for an expanded transportation system, police protection, protection from fire damage and loss, sanitation services, and all sorts of other services. Total up all these services and benefits and they exceed in value anything else the dollar buys for people. There was a time—not too many years ago—when the head of the family in figuring the annual family budget always listed a sizable outlay for a case of typhoid fever, or yellow fever, or diphtheria, pneumonia, scarlet fever, measles, or any one of a dozen other maladies that could strike the family each year. The family doctor bill was certain to be costly. Today, as a result of public spending for improved public health, these diseases which used to strike annually every family, are almost unheard of—certainly they are today indeed rare.

Government is doing today for the people what they cannot as individuals do for themselves. The people, in other words, are collectively doing for themselves what they cannot individually do for themselves. Those who oppose Government's costs seldom, if ever, oppose the benefits of Government. We used to have a State senator down in Alabama who served 24 years in the senate. I've heard him say many times that he never failed to vote for an appropriation bill, but he wanted it understood that he had never voted for a revenue or tax bill. He was for the popular side of government—the spending for useful and needed services—but he was against the unpopular side, the raising of revenue for the payment of these services. There are lots of men in Congress today like that and there are officials in our State and local governments with the same point of view. But, it's to the everlasting credit of you men and to my colleagues here from the local governments that we've had the intestinal fortitude and the intellectual honesty to recognize the fact that things of real value to our Nation and to our localities cost money, and we've designed the revenue structure needed to provide the funds for rendering the long list of daily services of Government that mean so much to people.

With a huge debt hanging over from two world-wide wars and the enormous debt caused by outlays voted for benefits and services to war veterans, it is going to be difficult for our National Government to reduce its annual budget. We know that, but we hope that you men who represent us here will be ever mindful of the fact that the Federal Government has the taxing power to a much more extensive degree than we have in the States and local communities. So, it will be very helpful indeed in the financing of the State and local governments if you will help to design a pattern of Federal support of a lot of services now borne exclusively by the States and local communities, or develop a satisfactory system of grants-in-aid to help us do a better job of performing at the local level for the benefit of all our people. We know that by your past actions and votes you have indicated the strongest type of friendship for our governments and have demonstrated a pronounced interest in and sympathy for us in our battle with the problem of meeting the demands of a local populace for expanded services of all types. Let me urge that you extend your thinking and efforts in the general direction of greater cooperation between the Federal and local governments in solving some of the more difficult problems of Government financing and providing services in response to increased local demands.

YOUR VALUABLE EXPERIENCE

I cannot think of our delegation in Congress without thinking how fortunate we people in Alabama are to be so ably and so well represented here in the Nation's Capital. I think our good friend, Ed Reid, has expressed in a few of his choice words the way most of us feel about our congressional delegation. This is what he wrote in a guest editorial appearing recently in the Lee County Bulletin:

"Alabama has a fine set of men in the Congress. They're doing great work individually as lawmakers, and collectively as our State's spokesmen in the greatest legislative body in the world. But, every one of them could be a better Congressman, or a better Senator, if our people would let him be. There's not a one of them who is not in better position than any of his constituents to know at all times how his vote could be most effective in the national interest. But, every single member has to try to weigh the sentiment of the 'folks back home' on every issue upon which he must vote. Actually, they have the very best experts on all issues right at their call there in Washington. They hear testimony by knowledgeable and trained experts, but they have to listen to second-rate opinions and viewpoints from the 'folks back home' because, after all, it is the 'folks back home' and not the War Department or State Department experts on foreign affairs who send the Congressmen back to their seats—if indeed they get back to Washington for continued service after casting a series of votes, every one of vital interest to local people."

In this editorial, Ed Reid pointed out in a very clear way the importance of seniority, or long service, in the Congress on the part of our delegation. This is the way he expressed it:

"The greatest investment our people here in Alabama have is in the experience gained by the members of our delegation in Congress through years of service in Washington. Those who know the mechanics of legislation, and the processes through which bills pass before being defeated or passed, realize the value of ranking positions on important committees in Washington. I was never so much impressed by this fact than when I was called to Washington by the national organization of municipal governments back in 1937 to assist in the sponsorship of a bill to amend the Glass-Steagall Banking Act of 1933. There was a provision in the original act which prevented banks belonging to the Federal Reserve System, or which were members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, from paying interest on daily bank balances of public bodies. It was considered a good provision from the point of view of banks, but an unfavorable one from the standpoint of public agencies. When spokesmen from cities in New York and California who, because of the great wealth of those States, became more interested in the provision than those of us in the poorer States, they found after reaching Washington that an Alabamian—Hon. Henry B. Steagall—was head of the committee before which the bill was pending. That was when I was called into the picture. It was then that I first became impressed with the value of our delegation in Congress. All of our Members were outstanding members of powerful committees. The director of the California League of Cities visited the Alabama delegation Members with me, following which visits he remarked: 'I now see why the South has exerted such a considerable influence over the passage of our Nation's laws. You people have sent your representatives here and kept them here long enough that they are in positions of great prestige and influence.' There's no question about it, we profit here in Alabama by reason of our long-established practice of sending good men to Congress and keeping them there long enough for them to acquire positions of power and influence."

I agree wholeheartedly with this viewpoint expressed by Ed Reid. I was counting up the years of service of you members of our congressional delegation the other day. I was impressed when I discovered that you 11 men have a total of 108 years of experience in Congress—an average tenure of nearly 10 years—this despite the fact that we have 6 Members who have been here less than 5 years each. This is a wholesome situation. You younger men have been able to draw on the rich experience of the older Members of the delegation, and those of you who have been here a longer time can benefit from the fresh viewpoints brought here by the newcomers. But I hope the time will never come when our Alabama people turn our Congressmen out of office before they have been here long enough to acquire the experience needed to render distinguished service to our State and her people.

FEDERAL-CITY RELATIONS INCREASE

A few weeks ago we set up inside our League of Municipalities a committee to be known as the Committee on Federal-city Relations. In appointing the members, I wrote them as follows:

"For quite some time we have been planning to set up a special committee to be known as the Committee on Federal-city Relations. Our reason for this is to have a committee to devote its entire efforts to the study of proposed Federal laws of interest to municipal government. The volume of such legislation has increased session by session until now there are actually more measures before the Congress each session affecting municipal government interests than there are in the State legislature. In other words, Congress and what Congress does each session is equally, if not more, important to the municipal governments than is the case with what the Alabama Legislature does each time it meets."

That's how important we consider the relationship between our Federal Government, on the one hand, and our municipal governments, on the other. As chairman of that committee, I have designated Hon. Ernest Megginson, the able mayor of Mobile. Two outstanding municipal officials from each congressional district were named to work with him. They are: First district, Hon. N. B. Fields, mayor of Demopolis, and Hon. W. W. Andrews, mayor of Jackson; in the second district, Hon. Travis Cosby, mayor of Opp, and Hon. Carroll Lawrence, commissioner of Troy; third district, Hon. Forney Renfroe, mayor of Opelika, and Hon. Grover Ray, mayor of Headland; fourth district, Hon. Wallis Elliott, mayor of Talladega, and Hon. Ralph Nicolson, mayor of Selma; fifth district, Hon. Roy Wallace, mayor of Gadsden, and Hon. James E. Cameron, council president of Alexander City; sixth district, Hon. W. H. Nicol, commissioner of Tuscaloosa, and Hon. J. W. Oakley, councilman of Centerville; seventh district, Hon. George Hiller, mayor of Jasper, and Hon. John W. Hendrix, mayor of Oneonta; eighth district, Hon. Elmer Vinson, mayor of Athens, and Hon. Wilford Lynn, commissioner of Sheffield; ninth district, Hon. L. A. Goolsby, mayor of Pleasant Grove, and Hon. Jap Bryant, mayor of Bessemer.

Most of these men are here tonight. They want you to know that it shall not be their purpose to try to tell you how to vote on various proposals of interest to municipalities. They will, however, from time to time, offer recommendations that are based on the public interest—not their personal interest—in all pending municipal measures. They want to help you to study more carefully all legislative matters and government policies that relate to the welfare of local government and local people. When you have their studies and suggestions, you will be able to act with more information and knowledge on our problems.

In a report that recently was issued by Chairman Megginson and his Committee on Federal-city Relations, the great volume of legislation considered by the Eighty-first Congress of interest to our municipal governments was discussed with our 234 member-municipalities. This report fully indicated the importance of Congress and its actions to our local governments.

I cannot close my remarks without thanking you for all that you have done here at the Federal level to help make our Alabama municipal governments sounder and more serviceable, and to thank you for coming here this evening and allowing us to discuss with you the importance of a strengthening of the bonds of cooperation and effort on the part of the Federal and municipal governments. Our ties of personal friendship are always strong, and our greatest hope is that our official or governmental relationship shall always be just as strong. You are our national spokesmen, and as long as you are here we know our interests, the interests of our local community governments and local people, are being fully safeguarded and well represented.

I thank you.

A Bad Week for the Big Lie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a manuscript of a broadcast by Mr. Charles M. Hulten, of the State Department, in charge of our Voice of America program. The broadcast was delivered recently at Valley Forge, at a program honoring the State of Oregon.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A BAD WEEK FOR THE BIG LIE

The Communist strategy of the big lie has suffered a number of bad blows in the past week in Germany and the United Nations. In Eastern Germany an attempt to whip up a propaganda campaign charging American planes with dropping incendiary bombs on East German grain fields has just bogged down in confusion. The campaign began a few days ago. The usual inspired stories appeared in a number of Communist papers. And then evidently something happened. ADN, the Communist news agency, withdrew a dispatch it had sent out earlier giving details of the alleged fire-bomb incident and sent a warning to its subscribers not to use the story.

What caused the fumbling in the East German ministry is not clear at this moment. Perhaps officials of the ministry got their signals crossed with Moscow. Perhaps they remembered that during the war, Dr. Goebbels made an identical charge against the British Air Force, and they thought the resemblance a bit too embarrassing. Perhaps, even, they read some of the back numbers of the East German press, which have been warning locomotive crews to observe more care, because sparks from their engines were setting grain fields afire. Or perhaps they realized they had made a bad mistake in identifying the marking of the American planes allegedly involved in the incident since the United States Air Force does not even have the type of planes mentioned.

Whatever the reasons, it is evident that the technicians of this latest big lie are taking time out to straighten themselves out.

Meanwhile, to the rest of the world, the difficulties in which the Communist strategists of the big lie find themselves are encouraging. The fire-bomb campaign was obviously planned as a successor to the late and ill-fated potato-bug story. That big lie was a major effort. But it, too collapsed under the weight of its contradictions. The people of Eastern Europe were well aware that the potato bugs which American planes were accused of dropping had long infested their farmlands. And when jokes began to circulate about this campaign in the various countries of Eastern Europe, the propagandists suddenly saw the light. They knew they were beaten and called the campaign off.

To most people, the implications of the difficulties which these big lies have met are important. Despite the iron control of all the sources of information behind the curtain, Communist propagandists are having a difficult time convincing their skeptical peoples that black is white.

Another prominent Communist—Mr. Jacob Malik—is also finding this out. Mr. Malik has been trying to tell the world with little success that the United States is guilty of aggression in Korea. But unlike his Eastern European comrades who control the press and radio of their countries and don't have to worry about anyone talking back in public, Mr. Malik has to work under a great handicap. He is in the unhappy position of having to prove his lies with facts. This he has found impossible to do ever since he assumed the presidency of the Security Council and began to give his upside-down version of events in Korea. For the facts in Korea speak for themselves.

As American delegate to the UN, Warren Austin has pointed out two times this week, it is the North Korean troops that are invading the Republic of Korea. It is the North Koreans and those who support them that are responsible for the bloodshed. And it is the North Koreans and those who support their aggression who can stop the bloodshed at a moment's notice.

After driving home these self-evident facts, Mr. Austin summed up the situation in Korea with a simple analogy, which is worth repeating.

"A man's house," he said, "has been attacked by a band a bandits, who have occupied most of its rooms and driven him and his entire family into one corner while reinforcements * * * are on the way. At this point, a powerful patrol of the invaders suggest 'peaceful settlement of the question'; he says the shooting should stop and the police should go back to headquarters. The invaders would remain in possession of most of the house. They would hold on to their weapons. The householder and his family would be left in their corner, nearly disarmed and wounded * * * does this proposal appeal to the household as 'peaceful settlement.' What will the community think of a police force which accepts such a proposal?"

And Mr. Austin answered his question with these words:

"The United Nations has undertaken to protect the Korean people from aggression and to help the Korean people attain freedom of unity and peace. The 'peace' resolution proposed by the Soviet resolution is the kind of peace that ensues when the innocent victim lies dead and still."

These words are going to be heard throughout the world. They are going to echo in the countries of Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union despite the effort of the Communist governments to suppress them. And Mr. Malik is going to find that his attempt to counter the truth with the big lie will have as little success as the potato-bug campaign or its close cousin, the incendiary-bomb fable. The truth, as Communist propagandists have been finding out lately, is a tough opponent to beat. This has indeed been a bad week for big lies and big liars.

Displaced Persons

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "The Real Displaced Persons," written by Marie T. Gerhard, and published in the April 1950 issue of the Magnificat, a Catholic monthly magazine. I invite the attention of all Senators to the article. In my judgment, the author says more about the Volksdeutsche, the problems which confront them, how they have been mistreated, and the attitude toward them of our State Department and the administration than any other article I have read on the subject. Miss Gerhard is an outstanding writer on the subject, and I invite the attention of all Senators to the article.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE REAL DISPLACED PERSONS

(By Marie T. Gerhard)

Do you know the difference between a displaced person and an expellee? Such a conspiracy of silence has been prevailing in the public press that you are indeed exceptional if you can make this distinction.

Broadly speaking, a DP is a displaced person of any other nationality or racial origin than German. An expellee, in contrast, is an individual only of German origin, who for that reason is excluded from the medical care, food, clothing rations, and immigration privileges granted the former group.

The latter comprise approximately 15,000,000 unfortunates who were displaced by the Potsdam agreement and by countries of southeastern Europe. Signed by the United States, Britain, and Russia, the Potsdam pact stipulated in part: "The transfer to Germany of German population or elements thereof, remaining in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary will have to be undertaken."

Though their forefathers had settled this territory before the discovery of America, 15,000,000 citizens were made destitute by one stroke of the pen. Having fought nazism, this multitude was also a tangible threat to communism. Nevertheless, they were informed, "Take only what you can carry. You have an hour to get out of here."

Torn from their loved ones as finally as if death had parted them, these hapless victims were flung into unheated cattle cars. Like refuse they were dumped upon a land unable to provide for its own 60,000,000 inhabitants.

What had been left behind—homes and farms, food and clothing—all was seized by Communist vultures.

During the mass expulsion men were beaten, women were violated, children were taken by the legs and hurled against trees. As a result, 3,000,000 perished or were never heard of again.

Of the 12,000,000 surviving, 7,600,000 were scattered between the American and British zones of Germany, 4,000,000 in the Soviet zone, and 350,000 in Austria. Had they been on a desert island they could not have been more isolated from their dear ones.

A number were housed in ramshackle army barracks with leaky roofs and air holes for windows. Bunks were laid in tiers so that six people were and are sleeping in an area less than half the size of your bedroom.

The natives were ordered: "All you can keep of your home is one or two rooms. From now on seven or eight 'guests' will share the rest with you."

The situation is still desperate. In Western Germany alone there is a shortage of roughly 5,000,000 dwellings.

War atrocities grow pale in comparison with the tortures which have been inflicted upon these outcasts. As Senator WILLIAM LANGER, Republican, of North Dakota, so ably expressed it:

"Never in the course of inhuman events has any group of people been so ruthlessly treated as the so-called expellees, who augment their daily prayers with a supplication that somewhere on earth a place can be found where their sole crime, the stigma of being of German ethnic origin, will be pardoned, so that they may once again raise their faces skyward and breathe an air not polluted with bigotry, abuse, and the stench of rotting bodies of their miserable friends and wretched relatives."

The DP bill of 1948 has been propagandized to make us think that equal benefits are given the displaced persons and the expellees, when nothing could be further from the truth. Sole care of the DP's and problems concerning their immigration have been placed in the hands of the International Refugee Organization, whose constitution specifically excludes, in a class with quislings and war criminals, those of German ethnic origin.

This means that had your family lived for generations in Poland, for example, the protest might be: "Your great-grandmother was a German, so you're automatically disqualified."

The Langer amendment of the DP bill of 1948 permits 13,000 expellees to be admitted to this country yearly under the German quota. But even this has been sabotaged. With the IRO screening all individuals seeking entrance to the United States, only 300 visas have been granted these uprooted souls.

The Senate Judiciary Committee, in whose hands the law was placed for revision, has been taunted for apparently closeting the act. Its chairman, Senator PAT MCCARRAN, Democrat, Nevada, has been pilloried by practically every newspaper in the country. This stanch American and his colleagues have withstood the unbelievable pressure of a million-dollar lobby. The committee has thus tried to obtain fair treatment of the victims of Potsdam.

Representative ED GOSSETT, Democrat, Texas, who has served on the Immigration Committee for 12 years, is reputed to know more concerning this question than any of his 435 confrères. In a hearing before the Immigration Subcommittee he stated:

"I want to commend as patriotic citizens and good public servants those who may be sitting on this bill. In my opinion, future generations will rise up to call them blessed."

In October 1949, the legislation was voted out of the committee—an almost unheard-of thing in parliamentary procedure. When discussed on the floor of the Senate, shortly before adjournment, it was obviously a complex problem. There was no alternative but to send it back to the committee.

Remember that America signed the decree which ultimately displaced these grief-stricken throngs, and when this terrible crime was perpetrated, she did not raise a single cry on their behalf.

These doomed creatures are not begging for even half a loaf; all they ask is a crust of bread.

We recognize that the knots won't be unraveled until the evicted millions are returned to their homes, and that where dismantling leads, disintegration follows. A partial solution, however, lies in our absorbing some of the outcasts.

Now that Congress has reconvened, the DP bill is on the agenda.

Must we not, then, alert our Congressmen and our Senators, imploring consideration of these millions of expellees—the forgotten people of the world?

Our holy father recently announced to a congressional delegation:

"Clearly it is too late and too futile merely to be shocked and righteously indignant. The plight of millions who must now answer to the hideous appellation of expellees is no longer simply a subject of humiliation and regret. There is more here than even a stark challenge for Christian compassion.

"Our prime anxiety—as we are sure it is yours deep down in your hearts—touches the judgment of history and of history's Lord on the fulfillment of that gravest duty of man to man and of nation to nation, which calls for respect for the image of God in even the weakest and most abandoned of His children."

The Right of Congress To Declare War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, in view of the tragic turn that events have taken in Korea and the continued lack of any clear-cut, constructive program advising the American public as to this country's goals in Asia, it seems to me that an editorial, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, is especially pertinent.

Unless Congress safeguards energetically its right to declare war, we shall have taken a long and perhaps irretrievable step toward the totalitarian forms of government which operate to glorify the politicians of a country but which inevitably bring bloodshed and hardship to the people.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RIGHT OF CONGRESS TO DECLARE WAR

Is the United States at war in Korea or isn't it? Are we to consider the action in the Orient just a police action?

These questions lead up to an extremely important question. If we are at war, how did we get into it? Who acted to put the United States into war?

The question is not whether we should be in Korea or not. It centers around the making of the decision about whether we should or not.

Who made it?

In this case, action did not come from Congress. The decision was made by the President.

Is this the way it should be? Does the President have authority to move the country into war or is that a matter reserved for Congress?

Actually it is the function of Congress, so stated in the Constitution.

But the President, performing as he did in respect to Korea, could place the United States in a position where war was inevitable.

That was never the intention of the founding fathers when they delegated certain police authorities to the President.

And the American people, we are sure, have no desire to change the Constitution in respect to the declaration of war. If this matter were placed before the voters of the Nation today, we are sure that they would vote overwhelmingly to keep the Constitution as it is—to reserve to Congress the right to declare war.

The President may say in explanation that quick action was required in Korea, if we were to act. But Congress, too, can act quickly. Its Members can respond as readily as the President to an emergency. That has been demonstrated time and time again. When Congress delays on such a matter, it is because question has arisen—a question of sufficient validity to create doubt about the wisdom of a course.

It would be well for Congress to reexamine the situation in this respect. If the Nation is to go to war, Congress, and not the President, should make the decision.

But we are at war in Korea and significant decisions have been made without congressional action.

Our troops entered Korea without authority from Congress. And the decision in respect to crossing the thirty-eighth parallel, surely a matter that should have been aired, was made by the President and not by Congress.

Before long we may be confronted with similar decisions. What are we to do when we reach the Manchurian border? The President or the Congress?

The whole matter becomes particularly significant in view of the results of the November 7 election. One important conclusion to be drawn from that election is that the people are dissatisfied with our international policy. Such dissatisfaction is more likely to be reflected by Congress than by the President.

Let's see that Congress moves into its proper role in the decisions that lie ahead. So far no dictatorial powers have been vested in the President.

Health Services

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Health Services," published in today's issue of the Washington Post. The editorial refers to a bill which would assist the States in the development and maintenance of public-health units. The bill was originally introduced by me, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] in the second session of the Eightieth Congress. It was introduced in the Eighty-first Congress by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], on behalf of himself and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], and myself. The bill has passed the Senate and is now pending before the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives. I wish to call the editorial to the very careful attention of all Senators. It expresses the vital need for such legislation in these times.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

HEALTH SERVICES

There was urgent need for Federal financial aid to State and local health departments long before the threat of a major war became acute; the need is now underscored and clarified by the importance of such departments in the mobilization of civil defense. They would be the country's principal refuge in case of atomic or biological warfare attack. We believe, therefore, that the House should act on the local public health services bill, which the Senate has already passed, during the present session. The bill has been reported favorably by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and is now in the Rules Committee.

State and local health departments are woefully inadequate. Some 40,000,000 Americans live today in areas where no local full-time public health departments exist; and it is estimated that nearly a hundred million others have only inadequately staffed departments available. The cost to the country in time lost from productive effort and in the incidence of preventable or controllable diseases is much too high. The cost in lives and human suffering in the event of widespread aerial attacks on the United States would be incalculable.

The civil defense report of the National Security Resources Board recommended that "in each State, the State health officer should be placed in charge of all civil defense health and medical services; and cities should appoint local officers in the same manner." The report pointed out also that "special measures must be taken to enable civil defense organizations to deal with the problems arising from atomic, biological, and chemical warfare. * * * The effects of these special weapons are of such a nature that defense against them becomes primarily the responsibility of the health and medical services."

But the plain fact is that in many areas there simply is no such defense at all. And it is highly possible that war production plants and other vital installations will be dispersed into just such areas, with large concentrations of war workers clustered around them. Many cities which might become bomb targets are lamentably lacking in health facilities. The problem is not one on which the country can afford to defer action.

Importance of the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial by George V. Denny, Jr., president of Town Hall, New York. In the editorial Mr. Denny discusses very effectively, I think, one of the great problems which confront us here in the Senate.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When will we learn that we endanger our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor when we try to play games with gangsters?

When the Bolsheviks seized control of a political instrumentality called "a sovereign state," they had all the attributes of gangsters and have never changed their nature to this day. Although they have cloaked themselves (with our help) in the raiment of national sovereignty, they have been as ruthless with the people behind their national boundaries as with those they have conquered.

We have tried with all the resources at our command, and with the help of a vast majority of the members of the United Nations, to persuade them to accept the extension of the principle of the law to the world community, but we have failed. It should be clear to all the free peoples of the world and to millions behind the iron curtain that gangsters have no place at a conference table, and have no intention of allowing the methods of conference and democracy to succeed. They have made a mockery of democracy and freedom wherever they have been able to extend their rule, and they will continue to do so as long as we continue to play this diplomatic game of striped pants with them.

They are our enemies and the enemies of freedom-loving peoples everywhere. They began their war against us long before World War II, a war to destroy our influence, to discredit us and to turn the minds and hearts of the rest of the world against us and everything we stand for. These weapons may well prove to be far more effective than guns, tanks, and planes, especially if we allow this to continue with the puny opposition we've been using against them.

While we make elaborate and colossally expensive preparations to "contain communism" and to meet old-fashioned aggression (the Atlantic Pact), waiting for armies to cross national boundaries, the enemy moves into every free country with its invisible fifth columns and trains its local agents to take over. We're doing just what the men in Moscow want us to do—break our backs economically trying to "contain" them by arming and feeding the rest of the world.

How can we, a nation of 150,000,000 people, possibly "contain" a dynamic and ruthless force of 800,000,000 people thousands of miles from our shores? We can't do it through the United Nations as presently constituted, for the enemy is now at the council table. He speaks with a powerful voice and other nations tremble. Where can they turn for help? Alone they are powerless. Jan Masaryk knew this; so do the people of Tibet.

We must face the unfortunate fact that the basic assumption on which the present structure of the United Nations was established is false. That we are living in one world, and therefore must have one world organization composed of all nations, was and is untrue. Actually, we are living in two worlds politically—and the United Nations is a political organization—two worlds which are diametrically opposed to each other in all basic assumptions and philosophies of life. We did not create these two worlds, but we closed our eyes to the fact of their existence in 1945 and invited the enemies of freedom to become part of a great and noble concept, giving them power to wreck it.

The time has come for us to organize a real United Nations, consisting of those who have demonstrated their desire and ability to live and work under law to stop our common enemy before he destroys us one by one. We cannot do it alone, and it will be suicidal to try. Our very survival as a free nation depends upon our ability to recognize that we can never have a secure peace until the power of the men in the Kremlin is checked or destroyed.

This does not necessarily mean a hot war, but it does mean that the free peoples now outside the iron curtain must form a real united front against Moscow-inspired aggression and fight with all of their combined resources a psychological, political, and economic war that will stop the gangsters' march of conquest. We still have the preponderance of power—militarily, economically, and politically. We have the resources to beat them at psychological warfare, but we must organize these resources and make them effective before it is too late.

Yes; we must keep up our military defenses, but this is not enough. We must create a world law backed by force great enough to negate the power of our enemy. Ultimately the Russian people wil have to throw off the present tyranny with the help of the free people of the outside world. But, above all, let's stop playing games with gangsters now and recognize them for what they are—the enemies of law and order. Suppose the people of Chicago had "recognized" Al Capone and made him a member of the city council because he had de facto control over part of that great city. Gangsters are gangsters, whether they control a small-time mob or a government. If we fail to see this, we will deserve our fate. "Where there is no vision, the people perish."

The Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM
OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter from Paul G. James, attorney, Des Moines, Iowa:

EMMERT, JAMES, NEEDHAM & LINDGREN,
Des Moines, Iowa, December 5, 1950.

Hon. PAUL CUNNINGHAM,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR PAUL: Am sure that you want to hear from your friends in this tragically critical hour. It looks from here as though we were confronted with the gravest crisis in our entire history.

There are some very few things which seem to be clear beyond all possible controversy:

1. The sole responsibility for this crisis, and all of the continuous series of crises, since the conclusion of hostilities in World War II, rests upon the clique in the Kremlin; and corollary thereto, it is equally clear that the incidents, in Berlin, Greece, Indochina, and Korea, are all Kremlin inspired and directed. We, therefore, cannot accomplish anything constructive or conclusive unless and until we meet and determine the issues there. And in so doing, we must make it abundantly clear that our sympathies are with the Russian people in their enslavement, and that our problem is their problem, how to free them and free mankind from the same menace.

2. The United States cannot stand alone, and battle the Kremlin alone, or practically so, in Asia, Europe, and the rest of the world, dissipating our manpower, and our resources fighting satellites of the Kremlin, while our real enemy is conserving both to strike us down after having so dissipated our strength. Britain and France in particular must be made to clearly understand that we will march along together, side by side, as full partners, but we will not participate in any such blood-letting alone, as we are suffering at this hour.

The conduct of the British and French Governments in this crisis has been reprehensible, publicly voicing disunity and demands for appeasement, giving aid and encouragement to the Kremlin. Many were the disagreements between Roosevelt and Churchill, but they confined them to private negotiation. If the British and the French do not propose to stand up to the common foe with all their might, we shall have no alternative but to pull out. We can, and we will, defend this hemisphere. But we cannot defend the entire world alone, or with half-hearted help, much less, carping public criticism.

3. The Chinese people are and have been our warm friends, ever since the days when we declined to take the Boxer indemnity except to use it for educating their youth. We made a dreadful mistake in falling for the Kremlin's propaganda that the Chinese Nationalists were independent agrarian reformists, and in turning Chiang Kai-shek to the wolves. Correction of that mistake will exact a dreadful price. Dr. JUDD was a voice crying in the wilderness, but he was right, and I have supported his position to the best of my poor ability. The Chinese are a poor, poor people. We are in large part responsible for their betrayal to the Kremlin. And while under the control and the influence of the Kremlin unable to obtain any semblance of the truth, we must be careful to establish that even in this hour we hold not them, but their betrayers, accountable. Again, we must make clear that we know, and we understand, and that the guilt and the responsibility and punishment will be inflicted upon their betrayers—not on them.

4. The American people spent billions of dollars to perfect the A-bomb as a weapon. As a weapon, it was created to save the lives of countless thousands of American youth which would otherwise be required to be sacrificed. The question is not if it shall be used; but against whom and where.

Recognizing the Kremlin as the instigator and supporter of all of the recorded, and many unrecorded, sinister, and deliberate acts of aggression, and recognizing the fact that the poor Chinese are but dupes, and victims of Kremlin lies and propaganda, it would seem quite clear that A-bomb No. 1 should go direct to the source of all the evil that besets mankind; and that we should demonstrate to all the world that our hearts and our sympathies go out to the peoples of the world everywhere, including Russia, who are enslaved and deceived.

5. This is the time—now—to fix the responsibility, and the accountability, and to demand that the men in the Kremlin come clean or else. Let us not dissipate our strength and our resources upon the innocent victims of their tyranny and deception. Let us put the finger upon the source of all of the evil and the trouble of this tragic hour. Let us demand their prompt direction and instructions to the Chinese to halt hostilities, and withdraw from battle, and that they, and all other nations, submit all differences to the United Nations for settlement.

We can keep the masses of India, and of China, both, on our side, if we unerringly put the finger on the Kremlin, and unswervingly demonstrate our devotion to the masses of the people of China, and of Russia, too, for that matter.

We can only hope and pray that we shall not suffer a Dunkerque, or a double Dunkerque in Korea. But if compelled to withdraw it should be made with a declaration that we will not kill, and we will not punish the Chinese people, even though in this hour of Kremlin deception and domination they have been led to harm us.

6. Somehow we must find ourselves a great leader. From the time of Moses, and through the hours of our own great crises from the days of Washington and Lincoln, and in World War II, a Churchill—great leaders have been provided with the power and ability to challenge the great moral and spiritual resources of the free people of the entire world. The tragedy of this hour is that no such leader has appeared; and worse, that every potential leader is under fire from some important quarter. It is certainly a perfect set-up for our enemy, and nothing could be more gratifying to our enemy. It would almost seem to have been designed and sponsored. It must stop. Rattling the bones of our many mistakes will but help to destroy us, and lend aid and comfort to the enemy.

7. If there must be war, let it be war with the only real enemy—the only responsible enemy. Let us not deceive ourselves, nor hypnotize ourselves into the belief that we are accomplishing anything by not pointing the finger at the gangsters in the Kremlin for fear it may make them mad. We can no longer play the part of dupes and self-deceptionists. It is cowardly not to place the responsibility where everyone knows it is, and beyond all doubt. We destroy our own sense of integrity. We accept the role of hypocrites. We lose our own self-respect, and the respect of intelligent people everywhere by so doing. The world needs honest, fearless, courageous, consecrated leadership—or we shall perish.

May God guide and direct us all.

Yours as ever,

PAUL G. JAMES.

Korean Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including herewith a letter addressed to the Hutchinson News-Herald by Hon. J. N. Tincher, my distinguished predecessor who ably represented the Seventh Kansas District in Congress from 1919 to 1927. Although Mr. Tincher voluntarily retired from Congress and has devoted most of his time and energy to the legal profession in recent years, he has maintained a keen interest in public affairs and I am happy to have this opportunity to place his views on the current far eastern situation before the Congress and the country.

WESTERN FRONT,
Hutchinson News-Herald,
Hutchinson, Kans.

GENTLEMEN: I have been reading the News-Herald religiously. I notice that Drew Pearson and your good editor are inclined to oppose MacArthur. To my mind, MacArthur is not to blame for anything. Maybe his intelligence department couldn't tell him how many Chinese soldiers were ready to attack us from Manchuria. But we didn't appropriate any money to MacArthur to fight that attack. We appropriated it to the War Department. We were appropriated to care for the defense. Mr. Acheson never asked MacArthur what to do, he and our Commander in Chief have told him what to do. Any disposition to make the American people forget that this war is against and with Mr. Acheson's pets is short-sighted. I don't believe MacArthur had any right to think that the State Department's and the President's pets, to wit: the Chinese Communists, would attack us en masse.

Everything has been done by our Government, not MacArthur, to convince us that we were not in any danger from the State Department's pets. They are still protecting them. They won't let MacArthur or anybody else use the Chinese Nationalists to fight them. Although to the best information that I can get there are a good many thousands of men in the Chinese Nationalist Army that want to go into Korea and fight. They should. But our State Department and our Commander in Chief, who has the last word, always, apparently don't want them to hurt the Chinese Communists. In other words, they want our American soldiers to go past them on the road to Korea through the mud, it's now the snow and the ice, and have the battles instead of them having it; all this at our expense.

MacArthur can't talk back to you fellows, as he is in the Army. He can't criticize his Commander in Chief or the Secretary of State, who criticizes him, according to Pearson, so bitterly before the Senate committee. He has to keep still and fight with what he has, as he is told. I will always remember MacArthur, despite any faults in the past, as the fellow that had to leave the Philippines but who remarked that he would be back.

If there is any satisfaction to an American citizen in blaming MacArthur, I can't understand him. My sympathies with the Chinese Communists are not very strong, as between the Chinese Communists and the Nationalists, I would take the Nationalists.

I think something ought to be done. We have a few Members of Congress who still have the nerve to say what it is. The first thing would be to clean the State Department, starting at the head, of Communist sympathizers and Hiss admirers; and the second thing would be instead of knocking men like MacArthur to give them some authority. The Republican Congress is perfectly willing to give the administration all the money that is necessary but I don't think it is right for the State Department to o. k. shipments of munitions freely from this Government when they know that the Chinese Communists are going to use those supplies to murder American boys. I quit Congress, Jack, voluntarily. I'm afraid if I were there now, I would be disagreeable, and would certainly raise some disturbances.

I don't get to read Fulton Lewis' column, but I do listen to his broadcasts once in a while. He deals in facts, like the shipment of these war materials. Why don't you get his column back. Pearson doesn't like MacArthur, apparently, personally. Anyway, MacArthur wasn't afraid to go to the front and see how it looked, and while he may have some faults, the unwarranted murder of American soldiers in Korea can't be blamed on MacArthur.

I try to read to keep up with things. Up to the very day that MacArthur was ordered to fight in Korea, I had thought that Dean Acheson would never consent to our Government having a friendly pact with the Chinese Communists or any part of them, and I personally think that our Secretary of State was the man that was fooled by what the Commies are doing. Of course, the Army Intelligence would know that there were so many residents of China, but it was the State Department that knew, or thought he knew, that the Communist faction wouldn't cross him.

This may be a long letter, and I doubt that you print it, you seldom ever print my western-front ideas, but I have the satisfaction of offering it to you.

Yours truly,

J. N. TINCHER.

President Truman's Point 4 Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by my colleague, the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON], who is not present at the session of the Senate today, regarding a discussion of President Truman's point 4 program by him and Bert Andrews, the chief of the Washington Bureau of the New York Herald Tribune, which was broadcast December 2, 1950, from Station WMAL in Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the statement and broadcast were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. WILLIAM BENTON, OF CONNECTICUT

I appeared as a guest of that distinguished Washington correspondent, Bert Andrews, chief of the Washington Bureau for the New York Herald Tribune, in a broadcast on Station WMAL, in Washington, December 2, 1950. This broadcast centered around President Truman's point 4 program to build up and develop the backward areas of the world as a means of checking the spread of communism. In my talk I pointed out that the blue-print for the President's program was developed some 10 years back by my friend Nelson Rockefeller when he was the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs. I served with him at that time as one of his assistants. Indeed Mr. Rockefeller pioneered in this area, and did much to help our neighbors south of the border to improve their methods of agriculture, and further encouraged them to improve the administrative systems of their government, as well as showing them how to build and operate better factories.

I feel we are not doing enough with President Truman's program, especially in the light of the small $26,000,000 fund appropriated for this purpose. The British, through their so-called Columbo plan, largely patterned after ours, are planning to spend $5,200,000,000 for a point 4 of their own throughout Asia. I would also like to stress that far from being an economic program, point 4 can very well prove to be one of our most dynamic propaganda weapons in the world fight against communism.

BROADCAST BY BERT ANDREWS AND HON. WILLIAM BENTON, OF CONNECTICUT, OVER WMAL SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1950

Mr. ANDREWS. The United States is involved in a grim conflict in one particular area of the world, Korea. The battle is being fought with bullets. In many other areas it is being fought with words. The real problem, of course, is how to match and defeat the tactics used by Soviet Russia and Russian satellites and sympathizers. With me tonight is a United States Senator who has very strong ideas on how we can combat Russian propaganda. He speaks from a background of wide experience. He is Senator WILLIAM BENTON, Democrat, of Connecticut. Mr. BENTON was appointed in 1949 to fill the place left by the resignation of Raymond E. Baldwin. He was elected on November 7 for the remainder of that Baldwin term which expires in 1953. As a young man, Senator BENTON made an enviable reputation and considerable money in the advertising business. Later he took a number of jobs in which he could serve his country. For a period he was Assistant Secretary of State. Then he went into politics and he is now in the Senate. He is a strong backer of the Marshall plan, which would bring the free nations of a large part of the world into unified action against Communist ideas, but he is an equally strong proponent of what he calls a Marshall plan of ideas and he has been working for it in the Senate. Senator BENTON, I know that your advocacy of this plan and of the so-called point 4 program was a major issue in that election in Connecticut. But tell me, honestly, do you think the average person understands what point 4 is supposed to do?

Senator BENTON. Well, I don't think, Mr. Andrews, that the average person knows any more about it than the fact they recall that President Truman called it bold and new in his inaugural address in 1948. Of course, it wasn't new and it never has been bold. Point 4 was, in fact, originated by Nelson Rockefeller when he came to Washington about 10 years ago as Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs. He brought me along with him as one of his assistants.

Mr. ANDREWS. I remember that.

Senator BENTON. It was one of my first Washington jobs. Mr. Rockefeller pioneered in trying to show the South American countries how to raise more crops, build and run better factories, improve the administration of their governments, and all those things we have in mind when we talk about helping the peoples of the world to improve their standards of living and to raise their productivity.

Mr. ANDREWS. Of course, I agree. Mr. Rockefeller did a lot of his planning, and his vision at that time was somewhat stymied by the war and the shortages that were forced on us at the time.

Senator BENTON. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS. You have emphasized that this isn't exactly a new approach, but what do you mean it isn't a bold one?

Senator BENTON. Well, Mr. Andrews, our present appropriation for point 4 is $26,000,000. As I recall, that was put through with only a couple votes to spare in the Senate.

Mr. ANDREWS. Just two, as I remember it.

Senator BENTON. You may remember that the Republicans in the Senate voted 25 to 8 against point 4. It was only after a prolonged debate and great effort that the sum was raised from $15,000,000 to $26,000,000. Senator WAYNE MORSE testified before the Thomas subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, when it was holding hearings on my Senate resolution calling for the Marshall plan in the field of ideas to which you referred in your introduction. Senator MORSE said that point 4 should receive $100,000,000 and I agree with him. I think it needs that much just to begin with. The British, during this past week, laid out a program for the Commonwealth for Asia that exceeded $3,000,000,000 and is a counterpart of our point 4.

Mr. ANDREWS. Then your argument is that the United States, with its small appropriation of $26,000,000 has made only a very small beginning on what ought to be a very big proposition.

Senator BENTON. That is it exactly, Mr. Andrews. The British plan could only be described, as I have mentioned, as a version ow point 4 and it is just for Asia. Mr. Rockefeller invented the technique in Latin America and the British now propose to develop them on a vast scale for Asia. Incidentally I regard Mr. Rockefeller's appointment as chairman of the new Board on point 4 an appropriate and constructive one and no one else in this country is as well fitted for this job.

Mr. ANDREWS. Well, I may say, Senator BENTON, that I agree with you on that because I was here when Mr. Rockefeller first came down, and I know how hard he worked and planned the steps that he wanted to take in South America.

Senator BENTON. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS. But why do you think, in view of the fact that this isn't new, it has been discussed? Why do you think, Senator BENTON, that there is so little general understanding of point 4 and why is the program so much in your mind?

Senator BENTON. Well, let's take the lack of understanding first. One reason is that point 4 has been presented to the Congress almost wholly as an economic program. The request for the money when before the Senate Appropriations Committee was made by the Economic Divisions of the State Department. One distinguished Member of the Senate told me they didn't make a good enough case to justify $5,000,000.

Mr. ANDREWS. I think it was Senator WHERRY.

Senator BENTON. Yes; it was. Now, of course, point 4 is very important economically. Our three best customers before the war were the three most highly industrialized countries, Germany, Japan, and England. Three-quarters of the peoples of the world don't get enough to eat. And you can't sell American goods to people who don't have enough produce or money to get enough to eat. There may be 450,000,000 people in India, but they can't buy as much as the 12,000,000 people of Canada. Thus point 4 holds the promise on the economic front of developing better customers for our farmers and manufacturers.

Mr. ANDREWS. Before we make Canada mad, I think they claim 14,000,000 people, Senator BENTON. But I take it in general that there is much more to this point 4 program than mere economics; is that your argument?

Senator BENTON. Yes; and the economic side isn't as important or as easy for the Congress to understand. The big angle on point 4 is that it is potentially the most powerful propaganda weapon at our disposal. Further, it is a propaganda weapon wholly consistent with the temperament and background of the American people with our long record of things we have done through our churches and philanthropies to help the suffering peoples of the world and our going to their aid whenever disaster overtakes them.

Mr. ANDREWS. You were saying, Senator BENTON, that point 4 program is a powerful propaganda weapon as well as an economic weapon. I think we all know that the one big question is this: Is it a type of propaganda that will offset the methods used by Soviet Russia to sway nations to its type of thinking?

Senator BENTON. Our American people, Mr. Andrews, don't understand very much about these Russian methods. They hear that the Russians call us war mongers, imperialists—that's a favorite word for us. Yes, they know that the Russians preach a doctrine of hate against us but there is another side to the Russian propaganda coin which they don't know so well. Let's turn the coin over for a moment. On the other side the Russians are appealing with a great deal of skill to the legitimate hopes and legitimate aspirations of the suffering and starving people. They are appealing with a hundred tons. They give them the 1950 version of Marx's "You have nothing to lose but your chains," so join with me.

Mr. ANDREWS. I suppose that you have the recent successes in China in mind, for one thing, when you talk that way Senator BENTON.

Senator BENTON. The victories of the Chinese Communist armies is much more of a propaganda victory than our American people realize. Traditionally the Chinese landlord took 60 to even 75 percent of the produce of the Chinese farmer. The farmer had to support his family and pay his taxes out of 25 to 40 percent of his produce. He didn't get enough to eat. For years the Communist propaganda preached, follow us, follow the Communists and get rid of these landlords, these fellows who are exploiting you.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Mr. ANDREWS. And you think that that hard treatment of the landlords and the Communist invasion against the landlords, that is one reason the Nationalist forces were unable to stop the sweep of the Communist armies.

Senator BENTON. There is no doubt about it and it is a pattern we find in country after country, right now in India they are following the same pattern.

Mr. ANDREWS. I am afraid we can see that coming.

Senator BENTON. In many sections of China the Communists walked through as though they were going through tissue paper. Their words had won the battles without the need for bullets. Now what can we, the United States, offer the starving and oppressed peoples of the world? Well, we can offer them point 4. We can say to them we Americans aren't just a rich self-satisfied country telling you to go out and be like us, we know that you should have more food, better homes, better medical care, education for your children. We don't just promise these things the way the Communists promise them, we're going to help you get them through point 4 administered by your government and ours and the United Nations and its agencies. We shall help you toward broader horizons and a better world for you.

Mr. ANDREWS. Well look, Senator BENTON, that is an aspiration that we all hope for but do you really think you can do this job with $100,000,000 a year?

Senator BENTON. If we could, we could certainly solve most of our problems. All I think we can make is a beginning. We've got to train people, we've got to experiment, we've got to learn how to do it. As Jimmy Yen's farmer's management education movement in China shows, educating a Chinese farmer is a long-term job. You even have to teach him to read. Now, any money we spend, however, should be judged in contrast to our military expenditures. Your Herald Tribune, this morning, Mr. Andrews, reported that President Truman has requested a total of $41,000,000,000 for annual military expenditures. Senator MORSE and my proposed $100,000,000 a year for point 4 is only one quarter of 1 percent of that military total. I would be prepared to spend more as soon as we learn how to do it. If we discover, as Mr. Rockefeller and I are sure we can discover, that this point 4 is a way to develop a world climate which will encourage the forces of freedom and democracy and thus let us bring down our military expenditures then certainly we ought to step up point 4 expenditures rapidly.

Mr. ANDREWS. And so you look upon the point 4 expenditures as money that might provide some insurance for us and for the world?

Senator BENTON. That is a good analogy, but let us call the $41,000,000,000 that we are putting into the Army, Navy, and Air Corps an insurance policy. We hope that it will be that which enables us to avoid war, that if you are spending $41,000,000,000 on a fire insurance policy it is surely worth more than one quarter of 1 percent to try to figure out ways to try to reduce the risk of fire and cut down on the premium which may otherwise bankrupt you.

Mr. ANDREWS. I haven't checked your figures and I am afraid I don't have time to go into mathematics.

Current Case Involving Railway Conductors and Railroad Trainmen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter, under date of September 18, 1950, to Mr. W. P. Kennedy, signed by Mr. L. W. Horning. I offer the letter for the Appendix of the RECORD because of the fact, as Mr. Horning says in a letter of September 25 to me, from which I now quote:

NEW YORK CENTRAL SYSTEM,
Washington, D. C., September 25, 1950.

Senator WAYNE L. MORSE,
Senate Chambers, Capitol Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: You no doubt will remember the writer of this letter as having participated in the 1941 railway labor case, of which you were Chairman of the President's Emergency Board; also, having seen you several times since then. At present I am chairman of the eastern carriers' conference committee handling the current 40-hour-week case involving employees represented by the Order of Railway Conductors and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

I note you caused to be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 19, 1950, at page A6661, a letter which President Metzman of my railroad addressed to all New York Central System employees, under date of August 24, 1950; also copy of letter, dated September 1, 1950, written by President W. P. Kennedy, of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, to Mr. Metzman.

I will enclose copy of letter, dated September 18, 1950, which I have written to Mr. Kennedy in answer to his letter addressed to Mr. Metzman under date of September 1, 1950.

There are, as you know, two sides to every story, and in my letter to Mr. Kennedy I have set forth some of the facts in this case. I hope you will be good enough to have my letter of September 18 also inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Thanking you in advance and extending my kindest personal regards, I am,

Very truly yours,

L. W. HORNING.

Mr. President, I always insist upon being fair in these matters. I would have inserted the letter earlier if I had been here and if the Senate had been in session. This is the first opportunity I have had to insert in the RECORD the letter from Mr. Horning to Mr. Kennedy.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK CENTRAL SYSTEM,
New York, N. Y., September 18, 1950.

Mr. W. P. KENNEDY,
President, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Cleveland, Ohio.

DEAR MR. KENNEDY: Mr. Metzman has referred your letter of September 1, received here on September 8, to me as the officer of our company designated to handle such matters. I am sorry that you let yourself sign such an abusive and intemperate communication. Tirades of this character are a poor substitute for the facts, and here are the facts as I understand them:

1. The no-strike assurance. Mr. Metzman's authority for the statement, that you called the strike within an hour after assurances were given that there would be no strike, was the statement made by the President of the United States and the three separate memoranda of the White House conference made by Messrs. Loomis, Mackay, and Oram. If your later telegram to the President is correct, it means that those three and Dr. Steelman, the President's assistant, lied. I do not believe that they did.

2. You complain of what you describe as Mr. Metzman's "injecting" himself into this controversy by posting on the bulletin boards a notice addressed to employees of the New York Central Railroad, and you say that other railroad presidents and Mr. Metzman should have attended the Washington conferences. As you well know, the work of handling labor problems with the numerous brotherhoods who represent the employees, including protracted negotiations, mediation, and hearings, has long since become a full-time job for personnel executives of the railroad, and if railroad presidents were to undertake that work there would be no time for their many other duties and responsibilities. The point is that the railroads of the country are represented by the committee that holds full powers of attorney and is therefore authorized to speak and act for all railroads represented by them. No railroad president would have authority to speak for more than his own individual road. Furthermore, the Railway Labor Act expressly provides that representatives, for all purposes of the law, shall be designated by the respective parties "without interference, influence, or coercion by either party over the designation of representatives by the other; and neither party shall in any way interfere with, influence, or coerce the other in its choice of representatives." Perhaps you have forgotten this provision of law.

3. You say that the second paragraph of our bulletined circular "creates the impression" that a recommendation of an emergency board is final and binding. Our circular neither says nor implies anything of the kind. The law relies upon public opinion to enforce the reports and recommendations of emergency boards, and I am told that when the Railway Labor Act was being considered by Congressional Committees the representatives of railroad labor expressed the view that refusal of either party to abide by the recommendations of an emergency board would be "unthinkable." So far as I know, in every national case the railroads have accepted the recommendations of Presidential emergency boards but it has now become almost chronic for union leaders, including those of your own brotherhood, to repudiate the findings of these Presidential boards.

4. You complain of Mr. Metzman's appearance before congressional committees in support of the Donnell bill, which would prohibit railroad strikes against decisions of emergency boards appointed by the President of the United States. Legislative agents of railroad brotherhoods are constantly lobbying in Congress, frequently literally hundreds at a time, and it is difficult to understand your indignation that railroad officers should dare to appear at hearings of legislative committees and tell their side of the story.

5. In the matter of adjustment board awards which you refer to as "decisions," the New York Central has not refused to apply awards of the National Railroad Adjustment Board but we have declined in some cases to let your representatives be the sole judge of what such awards mean.

6. Your reference to patriotism and to the fact that the unknown soldier was not a railroad president is gratuitous. Most railroad presidents, just like most presidents of railroad brotherhoods, are beyond combat age. In World Wars I and II, hardly a family in America was without some participation in the Armed Forces; and, similarly, although fortunately on a smaller scale, the present Korean conflict has tapped a cross section of our national life.

7. You describe the findings of the President's Emergency Board as "unjust and unfair and unacceptable" and charge the railroads with attempting to "bait" you into acceptance by offering an additional 5 cents per hour, and so forth. As you well know, this proposed 3-year settlement with cost-of-living adjustment was made by the President's Assistant and was accepted by the railroads but rejected by you.

You refer to the promotion and development of harmonious labor-management relations. The management of the New York Central has a long record of consistent efforts in that direction, but cooperation between management and labor is not a one-way street. The letter of September 1 which bears your signature and abusive statements which have appeared in your brotherhood's newspaper do not contribute to harmony.

Finally, you indignantly resent what you describe as an attempt to dislodge the affection and regard which the membership has for your brotherhood. We have no such purpose in mind, but candor requires me to say that, conversely, your letter is a palpable attempt to "dislodge the affection and regard" which we think our employees should have, and do have, for the company that affords us our livelihood.

I note that you forwarded copies of your communication to the New York Central general chairmen of your brotherhood, and I take it that you would wish me to send copies of this reply to them.

Very truly yours,

L. W. HORNING.

Christmas Leave

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter from Vernon Denman, chairman, local board 13-77, Selective Service System, Des Moines, Iowa. Mr. Denman has been a member of a local selective service board since the beginning of World War II and has done much to boost the morale of inductees from his board. I believe the suggestions set forth in his letter merit the attention of the Defense Department.

SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM,
LOCAL BOARD 13-77,
Des Moines, Iowa, December 9, 1950.

Hon. PAUL CUNNINGHAM,
Representative, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CUNNINGHAM: I should like to protest with all the force at my command at the curtailment or near cancellation of the promise that boys in service could return home for Christmas.

Last night we sent 54 boys to Camp Sheridan, Ill., and just a few hours before their departure, news came that only a few would be granted leaves and that those who would be allowed to come home would have not to exceed 72 hours' time in which to make the round trip, and a more dejected and disappointed group of lads and parents could not be found. I do not mean to say there was a lessening in their patriotism, not at all, but just a terrific let-down in their spirits.

This is the first time in more than 10 years that I have been going to the trains with the boys that I have been unable to answer their questions or question, "Why can't I come home for Christmas, as promised?"

Please, Mr. CUNNINGHAM, do all in your power to reinstate the Christmas-leave promise and help to restore the confidence and morale that has been lost as a result of the unfortunate and untimely pronouncement.

Respectfully yours,

VERNON DENMAN.

Hungry Horse Power

REMARKS
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in the Great Falls, Mont., Tribune of Tuesday, November 21, 1950, there is a story headlined "No Hungry Horse Power Guaranteed to State, Counsel Tells Commissioners." Under this headline was a story from Helena quoting one Forrest E. Cooper, of Lakeview, Oreg., counsel for the Interstate Association of Public Land Counties, to the effect that Hungry Horse Dam would not guarantee one kilowatt of power for use in Montana. Furthermore, Mr. Cooper states that while western Montana would obtain immediate payroll benefits during the Hungry Horse Dam construction once this work was finished, these benefits would vanish and might in fact, create an unemployment and relief problem for a time.

I do not know who Mr. Cooper is and this is the first time I have even heard of him. I do, however, want to emphatically deny his allegations and raise the question, just who is this outsider representing? His statement to the Montana Association of County Commissioners is a tissue of lies and what his purpose is in putting out these falsehoods is something which I do not know. The gist of Mr. Cooper's statements are to the effect that there is nothing in existing law guaranteeing power from the Hungry Horse project for use in Montana. Obviously Mr. Cooper is not aware of the facts relating to the use of power generated at the Hungry Horse project. However, for the record and so that the people of Montana will know the truth and so that there will be no doubt in anyone's mind as to the use and guarantee of Hungry Horse power in Montana, I want to quote from the first section of the Mansfield Act authorizing construction of the Hungry Horse Dam:

To provide for the partial construction of the Hungry Horse Dam on the South Fork of the Flathead River in the State of Montana, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of irrigation and reclamation of arid lands, for controlling floods, improving navigation, regulating the flow of the South Fork of the Flathead River, for the generation of electric energy, and for other beneficial uses primarily in the State of Montana but also in downstream areas, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to proceed as soon as practicable with the construction, operation, and maintenance of the proposed Hungry Horse Dam (including facilities for generating electric energy) on the South Fork of the Flathead River, Flathead County, Mont., to such a height as may be necessary to impound not less than 1,000,000 acre-feet of water.

The Hungry Horse Act does not require that there be sold in the Montana area any particular amount of the total system power made available by the Hungry Horse project so long as that area is given preference to the power generated at the Hungry Horse project itself. The Bonneville Power Administration as marketing agent for Hungry Horse power has worked out a formula for giving Montana the primary benefits referred to in the act. In brief, the formula provides that the amount of power generated at the Hungry Horse plant during the draw-down season of a critical year, or one-half of the total power developed at Hungry Horse and at downstream plants from Hungry Horse storage, whichever is less, will be made available for sale in Montana. Such an amount of power obviously will meet the geographical preference requirements of the Hungry Horse Act. On the basis of this formula the amount of power to be reserved for use in Montana will be approximately 198,000 kilowatts. This is considerably in excess of the power that would be available to Montana if the project were operated on an isolated basis. Firm power from the project operated isolated would be 90,000 kilowatts.

Of the 200,000 kilowatts allocated for the primary benefit of Montana, the following amounts have been committed:

First. Fifty thousand kilowatts of firm power to the Montana Power Co. for a period of 5 years. The first 25,000 kilowatts would be available from the earliest Hungry Horse production in 1952.

Second. Thirty-seven thousand kilowatts of interruptible power for the Harvey Machine Co. in 1951, which will become firm in 1953, assuming generation and transmission facilities are kept on schedule.

Third. A second allotment of 74,000 kilowatts of interruptible power for the Harvey Machine Co., when generation and transmission facilities are available, probably in 1952.

Fourth. Two thousand kilowatts of firm power on a requirements basis to REA financed cooperatives in western Montana. By 1956 this total is expected to be 6,000 kilowatts.

Fifth. Twenty-five thousand kilowatts of interruptible power in 1951 to the Victor Chemical Works for use at Silver Bow, Mont.; 17,000 kilowatts of this will become firm in 1952, with 8,000 kilowatts interruptible.

Sixth. A commitment good until January 1, 1951, of 25,000 kilowatts for the Montsanto Chemical Co. in 1953. The latest reports from this company indicate that it expects to take up this option by the January 1, 1951, date.

The contract with Montana Power Co. is renewable for 1-year periods after the

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

5 years, with such renewals being negotiated 3 years prior to the expiration date of the contract. The industrial and REA contracts are on a long-term basis, usually 20 years.

It is obvious, therefore, that the right of Montana to the power generated at Hungry Horse is adequately stated and adequately protected, inasmuch as not only does the authorizing act contain this protection but the commitments of power in the form of contracts definitely implement the requirements of the law itself.

It is also interesting to note that, despite the fact Hungry Horse will not be completed until October 1952, all of its power has already been committed.

Mr. Cooper evidently came to Montana and appeared before the Montana Association of County Commissioners with the purpose in mind of criticizing Hungry Horse and its beneficial uses in and for the State of Montana. By what and whose authority he speaks I do not know, but I do know that he has told unqualified falsehoods which were given publicity in my State and which should be answered. It is obvious that the right of Montana to the power generated at Hungry Horse is adequately stated in the Mansfield Act and adequately protected, because not only does the authorization act contain this protection but the commitments of power in the form of contracts definitely implements the requirements of the law itself.

Mr. Speaker, I have just completed checking the statements I have made with the Bonneville Power Administration so that there can be no doubt as to their accuracy.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent of the House, I am inserting at this point in my remarks a copy of the news story carried in the Great Falls Tribune of Tuesday, November 21, 1950:

NO HUNGRY HORSE POWER GUARANTEED TO STATE, COUNSEL TELLS COMMISSIONERS

HELENA, November 20.—Montana has been too lax in the protection of its water resources in the opinion of Forrest E. Cooper of Lakeview, Oreg., counsel for the Interstate Association of Public Land Counties.

Here for a 2-day conference with officers of the Montana Association of County Commissioners, Cooper said it still may be possible, through interstate compact negotiations, to padlock the barn from which the horse was stolen.

Centering his attention on Hungry Horse Dam in northwestern Montana, which soon will be producing power, Cooper said not one line in the law authorizing its construction and maintenance guarantees 1 kilowatt of power for use in Montana. He recalled recent articles in Portland and Spokane publications praising Hungry Horse because of the benefits these communities would receive after its completion.

Cooper compared this situation with that found on the Colorado River in connection with construction of Hoover Dam.

"In 1934," he said, "Nevada had little use for power but reserved 18¾ percent of the output of the Boulder Canyon plant for use at any time the need developed.

"When the war came, the Government established a magnesium plant at Las Vegas. It was sold as war surplus to the State of Nevada which, in turn, leased sections of the big plant to several nationally known concerns.

"Now, with the need for power definitely established, Nevada has served notice on Los Angeles, which has been using the State's share, that the State will take delivery on a definite date. It's all being done according to agreement in advance and without the necessity of lawsuits."

Cooper said western Montana obtains an immediate benefit from the payrolls during the Hungry Horse Dam construction but warned that when the work is finished these benefits vanish and may, in fact, create an unemployment and relief problem for a time.

He urged that Montanans look forward to the needs for power and water that would exist if the State had three times the present population and to make plans now whereby it will be possible to recapture the use of electricity and water that may, presently, be put to better use in downstream States.

Submitted to the county commissioners and livestock men today by Cooper was a draft of a proposed bill to be introduced in Congress in an effort to stabilize the livestock industry dependent on the public range.

He said the measure would safeguard grazing privileges now existing on national forest and Federal grazing district lands for 5 years and would authorize permits, and renewals, for 10-year terms.

Existing methods of determining grazing fees would be unchanged pending a thorough economic study of the livestock industry in the 11 Western States by three Federal agencies and their subsequent report to Congress.

Nothing in the proposed law, Cooper said, would limit the power of the Government to discontinue grazing rights on any unit to prevent injury to the land nor to restrict the right to hunt and fish on Federal acreage.

The commissioners' association officers, members of its public lands committee, and representatives of the livestock industry spent most of the day discussing means of putting more land on the tax rolls.

It was pointed out that payments by Federal and State agencies in lieu of taxes usually are considerably less than what adjoining privately owned lands produce to meet the expense of local government. And such payments are of no value to a county or a school district when it seeks to float a bond issue because the bonded indebtedness limit is determined by the taxable value of property on the assessment rolls.

Officers of the commissioners group here today were Frank E. Dougherty, of Elliston, president; Clyde J. Dygert, of Hardin, vice president; N. W. Edwards, of Collins, secretary; and William A. Brown, of Helena, counsel.

Campaign Morals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, December 11 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON], who is not present at the session of the Senate today, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by him regarding an editorial entitled "Campaign Morals," which appeared in the New York Times, together with the editorial.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. WILLIAM BENTON, OF CONNECTICUT

An editorial entitled "Campaign Morals" was published in the New York Times at the height of the recent campaign, and unhappily applies not only to my State of Connecticut, but to many other States throughout the country. I read this editorial to many of my audiences during the campaign. I fear the Times editorial is correct in its observation that "So complete is the character assassination in some cases that those who reach public office will have lost the confidence of the voters who put them there."

This is not a new phenomenon in American politics. It was well known to George Washington and the founding fathers.

[From the New York Times]

CAMPAIGN MORALS

The political campaign of 1950, in city and State and apparently elsewhere too, is certainly one of the dirtiest of recent years. The violence of exaggeration and epithet is appalling. In many cases it is simply impossible to credit much of what the candidates charge, and the insuperable difficulty is to know what to believe. The competition for sensation is so bitter as to become a disease that feeds upon itself.

What will all this come to? Many decent people must become so disgusted with this phenomenon of democracy that they will stay away from the polls. More than a few candidates themselves must emerge from this nightmare of immersion in billingsgate thoroughly ashamed of themselves, their self-respect shattered. So complete is the character assassination in some cases that those who reach public office will have lost the confidence of the voters who put them there. The most serious result of all, perhaps, is that if this sort of thing continues it will become increasingly difficult to get decent men and women to stand for public office because of the unjustified abuse suffered en route.

We have no ready cure for this condition, much as we deplore it. When a candidate conducts a decent, moderate campaign and loses, then his supporters condemn him roundly for not putting up a hard fight. We cannot ask a candidate to keep silent about germane matters that deserve exposure. But the wild swinging of punch-drunk orators in the final phases of the campaign is not blameless and can do only harm. When almost everyone is calling everybody else a liar and a thief, the result becomes a stand-off. There is, then, no black and white of reputation in the public mind, only a muddy gray.

Not much time remains to learn self-restraint, but that is the prescription called for. The order would have to come from the top, in each campaign camp, and pass on down to the speech writers, to end this rivalry in self-debasement.

Justice for Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a speech by Mr. Julius Epstein, secretary of the American Committee for Investigating the Katyn Massacre.

This speech was recently delivered on the Justice for Poland radio program, which is sponsored by the Western Massachusetts Branch of the Polish-American Conference. It is a vigorous, forthright statement, which should commend itself to the entire American people.

KATYN AND THE VOICE OF AMERICA

In 1943, I was working as editor for the Office of War Information. Among my duties was the reading of the Nazi press. One day I came across an issue of the Volkischer Beobachter, Hitler's own newspaper. In that issue, a protocol was published, signed by 12 international scientists at Smolensk, U. S. S. R., stating that the Polish officers whose bodies had been found by the German Army in the woods near Katyn, had been murdered by the Soviets in spring, 1940. The scientists' protocol enumerated all the reasons which had led the members of the commission to this conclusion.

I was immediately struck by this protocol. Although I was well aware that this protocol was published by Hitler's and Goebbels' newspaper Der Volkischer Beobachter, a newspaper, which besides Stalin's Pravda and Izvestia, of course, had probably carried more lies than any other newspaper in the world, I immediately had the impression that this time Goebbels was not lying, simply because the truth was on his side.

Had not the Polish Government in exile in London asked the International Red Cross for an investigation on the spot? And did not the German Government declare that it was willing to allow such an investigation? And was not the only reason that such an impartial investigation did not come to pass, the fact that Stalin did not permit the International Red Cross to carry out such an investigation? Was it not clear that Stalin would have welcomed such an investigation if he were innocent? Those were the thoughts which convinced me in a few minutes that the protocol printed in the Volkischer Beobachter told the truth about the massacre of Katyn. There were outstanding scholars among the members of the commission, among them Professor Naville of the University of Geneva, a Swiss, and therefore, a citizen of the neutral nation in World War II.

From that moment on, I have never lost my interest in Katyn. I read all books, articles, pamphlets I could lay my hands on regarding this subject. I studied the memoirs by diplomats and statesmen like Jan Ciechanowski, former Polish Ambassador in Washington; Stanislaw Mikolajczyk, Prime Minister and Vice Premier of Polish Governments in London and Warsaw; Arthur Bliss Lane, our former American Ambassador to Poland, and many others. I studied the Polish memoranda about Katyn, but also those made public by the Germans and the Soviets. When I thought I knew enough, I decided to write an article on Katyn. Since it was my idea that an American committee for the investigation of the crime should be formed, I wrote to some of the members of the so-called European Medical Commission who investigated the crime on the spot and whose protocol I had read in the Volkischer Beobachter. I asked them three questions: Whether there was any pressure by the Germans before, during, or after the investigation; whether they still believed in the Russian guilt; and whether they would be willing to appear before an American committee and testify in public. I got some very encouraging answers from some of the members of the medical commission. They wrote me that there was not the slightest pressure from the German side, neither before, nor during or after the investigation, that they still believed in the Russian guilt, and that they were willing to come to the United States as soon as they were invited.

This was good news, indeed. I mentioned this correspondence in my article at the end of which I suggested that an American committee should be formed for the investigation of the crime.

As you know, this committee has been formed under the presidency of our former Ambassador to Poland, the Honorable Arthur Bliss Lane, author of the outstanding book, I Saw Poland Betrayed. The committee made its debut at the Waldorf-Astoria on November 21, 1949. There, Ambassador Lane delivered a speech about Katyn and the formation of the committee and Max Eastman who was presiding at the press conference read Mr. Lane's letter to the Soviet Foreign Minister, Andrei Vishinsky. Mr. Lane's speech as well as his letter to Vishinsky are documents of great value. The world press in this hemisphere, as well as in Europe and other parts of the world, treated them as such, and many newspapers and periodicals printed the full text of both documents. However, the Voice of America, the propaganda and advertising agency of our own State Department, did not care to broadcast either Mr. Lane's speech or his letter to Vishinsky. It was neither the first nor the last time that the Voice of America refused to broadcast the truth about Katyn.

Let me tell you more about it.

It was on February 10, 1949, that I first offered a script about Katyn to the Voice of America. It took the Voice about 10 weeks to answer my offer. At last, on April 20, Mr. Charles W. Thayer, then head of the New York offices of the Voice, answered my letter. He bluntly rejected my offer with one sentence. He wrote, and I quote: "We have decided against making use of the material at this time." That was all. No reasons were given, no explanations advanced, why the Voice did not want to avail itself of the tremendous material gathered in a long and thorough research. The material I had offered to the Voice contained many facts never made public before.

About 7 months later, when I made preparations for the press conference of the American Committee for the Investigation of the Katyn Massacre, Inc., I again approached the Voice. As I mentioned before, the Voice of America did not care to make any use of the two documents made public by Mr. Lane. Some of the language editors, however, expressed personally their regret that they were not allowed to broadcast Mr. Lane's speech and his letter to Vishinsky. As they told me, they did not get the green light from Washington to broadcast those documents. Again, we were completely at a loss to understand the Government's attitude, for which no valid reasons were given. And what reasons could they have given for not broadcasting Mr. Lane's speech and his letter to Vishinsky, for not broadcasting these great documents at least to their most interested audiences, the Poles, the Russians, and the Germans?

In the spring of 1950 Count Joseph Czapski arrived in the United States. Count Czapski is well known, not only among the Poles. He is a writer and painter, and he is also a survivor of the massacre of Polish officers on Russian soil. He has widely written about Katyn and his own experiences to General Anders' representatives in the Soviet Union. The Voice of America, well aware of Czapski's importance, invited him to address his Polish compatriots. Count Czapski was anxious to get the truth about Katyn across the iron curtain. But who can describe his disappointment when he was told in the New York offices of the Voice that he couldn't even mention the word Katyn? I had the privilege of having luncheon with Count Czapski an hour or so after his conversation with Voice officials. I shall never forget how furious he was. I could not comfort him. The only thing I could do, was to tell him about my own experience with the Voice in connection with the Katyn massacre.

To evaluate correctly the very strange behavior of the Voice in respect to Katyn, we should never forget that the only thing broadcast by our Government were Stalin's lies of 1943 and 1944.

It is an undeniable fact that our Government has never told the truth about Katyn. From 1943, when the story broke, up to this very day when the cold war against Stalin has already become pretty hot in Korea, the Voice of America is suppressing the truth. Wouldn't it be about time to break this habit?

It may, therefore, be a good idea if you, my listeners of today, wrote short letters of protest against the suppression of the truth on Katyn by our Voice of America. The letters should be addressed to the Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, Department of State, Washington, D. C.

Your letters may do some good. They may even change the attitude of the Voice of America.

Whatever the success of your letters may be, the truth will become known as always truth prevails against lies. No government in all the world is powerful enough to kill the truth. The real Voice of America, the people's voice, will carry the truth about Katyn around the world.

Rearmament and United States Policy in Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 12 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address regarding rearmament and United States foreign policy in Europe, by Gen. L. D. Clay, at the Southern Governors' Conference meeting at Charleston, S. C., November 27, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a pleasure and an honor to be here tonight. South Carolina is so close to my home State that to be here is almost the same as to be home again. Moreover, I could receive no greater honor than to speak to the assembled Governors of the Southern States and to be introduced to them by Governor-Elect Byrnes.

It was my good fortune to know Justice Byrnes during the war years and for 4 months to serve as his deputy. I saw him daily, always seeking the right decision, wisely conscious of political implications in the broad sense of public responsibility but not in terms of party politics. Later I was to serve under him when he was Secretary of State and to meet him at a number of important international conferences. Frequently in Germany I would be asked what governmental experience I had and my reply was always "4 months working for Justice Byrnes was a liberal education in government." I learned not only to admire him as one of our few truly great men, but Mrs. Clay and I also formed a lasting and deep affection for Mrs. Byrnes and him.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

In speaking to you on national security in relation to the world situation, my sole justification is that I spent 4 years in charge of the Army's war production program and then 4½ years in Europe. I have learned that foreign policy and national security go hand in hand. Today the objectives of our immediate foreign policy are well established. It has become easy for all of us to feel that they are a reflection of the views we have always had. Of course, this is not true. Foreign policy must be flexible. The policy of today is a direct outgrowth of the events of the immediate past, and the policy of tomorrow will be influenced by the events of today.

To look back for a moment, when Germany surrendered in May 1945, we placed our faith in the United Nations and determined that we would find a way to work in friendship with Russia. Somewhat as a result of these policies, but also in response to public demand, we proceeded forthwith to demobilize our fighting forces. Today we recognize that our efforts to make the United Nations fully effective and to cooperate in friendship with Russia failed. Even though these efforts failed, it does not prove the policy wrong. We would not occupy the position of moral leadership which we hold in the world today if we had not made the effort to win Russia's friendship and to bring success to the work of the United Nations.

Many of our statesmen who endorsed and supported this program because they believed it right had misgivings as to its success. I remember well the deep concern over the future expressed by Justice Byrnes when he returned from Yalta where he had become aware of Russia's ruthless and ambitious desire to expand.

I had the opportunity while in Europe to watch the events which changed our foreign policy to our present concept. This change has come about during the last 5 years as a result of many important decisions. Secretary Byrnes first recognized the need for change if communism was to be stopped, and several of the most important decisions which brought about the new policy were made when he was Secretary of State. For instance, at Potsdam the Soviet government wanted to share in the control of the Ruhr and to obtain large quantities of capital equipment as reparations. Within the American delegation, some favored the destruction of German industry as a punitive measure and others because they believed it essential to prevent Germany from again becoming a threat to world peace. Still others believed that a divided Germany could not be an aggressive threat but that the division of Germany would prove troublesome to the world. Moreover, the destruction of Germany's productive output not designed for war purposes could not help but lower the standard of living in West Europe as a whole. The American delegation did agree in principle to the transfer of substantial amounts of capital equipment from West Germany, much of which was to go to Russia. However, Secretary Byrnes, cognizant of the inherent dangers, resisted the Russian effort to participate in the control of the Ruhr and made the delivery of reparations to Russia subject to Germany being administered as a whole.

In early 1946, it became clear that Russia had no intent to remove the barrier line which it had placed between east and west. Our effort to end the division of Germany had failed. However, Russia had violated the Potsdam terms and thus we stopped the further delivery of heavy equipment to Russia in accord with these terms.

This was the first firm display of intent by the United States. It was met as anticipated with outbursts of indignation from Russia. If this decision had not been made, the Soviet Union would have increased its own industrial capacity while the economic disorder which would have occurred in west Germany would have made fertile soil for the growth of communism.

Shortly thereafter, Secretary Byrnes became convinced that there could be neither appreciable economic recovery nor progress in building the form of democratic government in a Germany divided into four zones. Thus, he invited each of the other occupying powers to amalgamate with our zone. There resulted the Anglo-American zone to which the French zone was added later. This made possible the increase in productivity in West Germany which was essential to the economic recovery of Western Europe. It led to the establishment of a West German Government of limited sovereignty. The people of West Germany had hope that they would be received again among the countries of Western Europe and faith that their destiny was to the West and not to the East.

In the fall of the same year, Secretary Byrnes chose Germany as the place to state, in a speech at Stuttgart, in terms that could not be misunderstood, that American troops would remain in Germany as long as the troops of any other foreign powers were there. I still believe this to be the most important single statement of American policy made since the end of World War II. It received far more attention at the time in Europe than at home. It was our promise of security to millions of people who had seen first-hand the Communist expansion which had dominated Eastern Europe and who knew not where it would stop.

These decisions were made with the approval of both major political parties. Other great democracies had for years kept foreign policy out of party politics. In this country, Secretary Byrnes was the first to see the necessity for a bipartisan foreign policy and to take steps to bring it about. No greater contribution could have been made. Today, the heat of election campaigns just ended threatens the continuance of the bipartisan policy. To all thinking Americans there can be no place for party politics in the development of foreign policy. There can and should be honest differences of opinion with respect to its execution.

These early decisions accepted by both major parties marked the real change in policy which established our intent to prevent the further expansion of communism through its use of the threat of force as a means to a political end.

Later, when General Marshall was Secretary of State, we extended military aid to Greece and Turkey and embarked on a program of financial aid to those countries in Europe who were willing to work together in the common good. Still later, when Mr. Acheson was Secretary of State, we signed the North Atlantic Pact and promised military aid to the free countries of Europe who were willing to rearm in the cause of freedom. Thus, we established our present European policy.

As I understand this policy expressed in simple terms—perhaps oversimplified—it provides economic and military assistance to most of the governments of Europe which are now free from alien domination so that they may remain free, and encourages them to work together to develop sound economies individually and collectively while concurrently improving their capacities to defend their freedoms. We have announced our intent to maintain the position which we now hold, and to continue and increase our armed forces in Europe to defend this position as long as necessary. We have provided and continue to provide financial assistance under the provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act in the understanding that the nations receiving this aid are working together to improve their economic status. We have become a party to the North Atlantic Pact, thus for the first time pledging our military resources in common defense against aggression. We have started the shipment of arms to help the countries of Western Europe to rearm.

This policy expresses the realization of the American people that we can no longer live alone. We have no selfish purpose. Our people want to keep freedom alive in the world and they believe sincerely that when the full strength of the free countries is restored their influence will be such that communism can no longer threaten to enslave the world.

Thus, the objectives of our foreign policy are worthy of the best traditions of our people and deserve their full support. However, how long can we wait for their accomplishment? We have extended liberal financial assistance to Western Europe for several years, yet we still do not have a Western Europe prepared either to defend itself or even to contribute materially to its own defense. Meanwhile, world conditions have deteriorated. While we do not call it war, we are engaged in a struggle in Korea which has cost us more casualties than any wars in which we have been engaged except World Wars I and II and our War Between the States. We know not where trouble will start elsewhere. In Western Europe and in the United Kingdom, instead of renewed determination to get ready, we hear increasing talk of possible appeasements.

Of course, all of us who have seen Europe in recent years know that the funds made available under the Economic Cooperation Act created the hope in Western Europe which doomed further political exploitation by the Communist Party to failure. There has developed a closer cooperation among the Western European countries not only in the Organization for European Economic Cooperation but also in the Council of Europe, even though decisions in these bodies require the unanimous consent of governments. Moreover, five countries did place certain of their armed forces under a common chief of staff. The planning for military cooperation among the North Atlantic Pact countries is proceeding under the promise of American aid. Perhaps progress measured in terms of past history is unbelievably fast; measured in the light of present world conditions, it is slow, dangerously slow.

Economists determined that neither the funds made available under the Economic Cooperation Act nor counterpart funds would be used to develop productive facilities for military weapons. They believed such use would have retarded economic recovery. I am not sure that this argument is sound. The reasonable use of productive facilities for armament purposes need not adversely affect the soundness of the over-all economy. In Europe and in this country, prosperity has been achieved even when substantial portions of national productive output were used for military purposes. Whether sound or not, we must recognize that precious time has been lost in strengthening Europe.

Economic recovery was not an aim in itself but only a part of a broad program to restore the great, free countries of Western Europe to their proper places in world affairs. Henceforth, there must be full coordination in the use of all funds made available to Western Europe whether for military or economic purposes. They must be used to insure accomplishment of our objectives.

Perhaps military progress is being made which we do not know about. Still, is it not timely that we do know definitely and specifically what Western Europe is doing to rearm, and when we may expect positive results? Unless we can be sure that rearmament is taking place, should we not ask ourselves if any of the money being used to strengthen Europe could be employed more effectively in increasing our own strength? There is nothing more important to the success of our fight for freedom than to have the wholehearted support of the Western European nations. Their support is worth the expenditure of great sums by the United States. However, in expending these sums, we have the right to ask and to be assured that their expenditure will bring results.

Another question which concerns all of us is the part Germany is to play in Western Europe. There are reasons for other countries to be apprehensive over the rearming of Germany. However, the present Western German government has favored its return to the family of Western European nations and has indicated a willingness to play its part in such an association. We cannot expect an enthusiastic desire on the part of the German people to rearm. They have suffered severe punishment from war. Moreover, they have not yet been told that they are expected or even that they will be allowed to rearm. It has been suggested that they would be permitted to place some troops in a European fighting force on a limited and inferior basis. Even today those in Germany who advocate rearming are termed "militarists" while those who are opposed are termed either "cowards" or "traitors to freedom" who would trade with Soviet Russia.

I believe the people of Western Germany to be opposed to communism and to want freedom and association with the peoples of Western Europe. It is late now for a clear-cut decision to be made and announced which will be received with enthusiasm in Western Germany. It is even later if the decision is to rearm Germany, because months are required to recruit, equip, and train effective forces. However, if this is the decision, and the fight if it comes is to include the defense of Western Germany, then I believe we may obtain effective participation. In any event, we cannot expect wholehearted support in war from those who join us as second-class associates. Let us lose no further time.

Perhaps it is oversimplification again to say that in the world of today there is only one real threat to world peace, and that all those who are willing to join together to oppose this threat can contribute to world peace and are welcome associates. However, this seems to me the realistic viewpoint.

I have not had the opportunity to serve in Asia and am not qualified by experience to speak about our Asiatic policy. I wish that I fully understood what it is with respect to Formosa. I would like to know that we have determined that under no circumstances will we permit Formosa to be taken by Communist China and its soldiers either killed or forced to enter the Communist army.

There appears to be substantial differences in view among the free countries with respect to the treatment of Communist China. The United Nations has ruled that our forces will not enter Manchuria, which was sound in principle. Moreover, they ruled that our planes will not cross the border to attack troop movements, supply centers, and the airports used by enemy aircraft engaged in attacking our forces. It looked as if this action had accomplished its purpose since for this or some other reason the opposition of the Chinese Communists had not reached the proportions anticipated, although the events of the last few days may prove otherwise. Nevertheless, there was risk in this decision, largely to our troops. In limiting the range of activity of our airplanes, we made it possible for the enemy to group men and materials freely which has increased the efficiency of enemy operations with consequent increase in casualties among our own troops.

This was a decision of the United Nations. However, we must remember that its effect is to be borne almost entirely by our troops.

I hope that nothing that I have said may be construed as favoring a preventive war. Frankly I do not know what preventive war means. No matter how war comes, once it comes we have entered again into a world conflict which will result in the loss of hundreds of thousands of lives and in untold suffering and misery to millions. Such a war would not end the struggle between communism and freedom. The defeat of Russia would not necessarily destroy communism. We must bring about a proper balance in military strength which will make war unprofitable to any aggressor and hope that in the stable period which will follow that the advantages of freedom will become clear and that there may be even a return of reason to the madmen who now threaten world peace.

We may have time now, but accomplishment is urgent. Russia has not been ready for war, as otherwise world war III would be with us now. Nevertheless, as more and more satellite troops are pushed into action we are coming dangerously close to major war. Our great strength as a Nation is such that we can prepare to defend ourselves from direct attack for some years to come. However, we know that the destruction of freedom anywhere may lead to its eventual destruction everywhere. We do not want to limit our defense to our own shores. We want to feel that we are preparing for the defense of freedom and that we will be joined by all others who want freedom. The right of any people to be free cannot always be guaranteed by other peoples. It comes to a people only when they are prepared to sacrifice and to fight for their freedom. No matter how much we may wish to do so, we can defend freedom elsewhere only in common cause and common purpose. It is time now to determine those countries and those peoples who are prepared fully to join us in the mutual defense of freedom and at the same time share with us all of the sacrifices which may result. We cannot delay our decisions or divert our effort to obtain the support of those who are unwilling to declare their intentions now.

In order that we may play our part, we have embarked on an extensive program of rearmament. We must improve our own strength and also the strength of the free people who are willing to use our aid and their own efforts in common cause. We are prepared to expend large portions of our national income to produce war equipment. What is even more immediately upsetting to our economy, to gain time we must divert substantial portions of our peacetime industrial output into military purposes. There will result some reduction in our standard of living, which because of large inventories will not be felt for some time. We may have to carry this program on for many years, but this we must not do at the expense of our standard of living.

We must expand our industrial output rapidly to provide not only for defense but also to maintain our present standards. We should reduce our output of consumers goods as little as possible, cutting off first those expenditures which are not immediately necessary but which call for productive output and scarce materials. If we increase our productive output rapidly we must expect some inflation. We should not be too alarmed if it is kept within bounds and relatively consistent with the rate of expansion in productive output. The more we pay as we go, of course, the less the inflation. We must apply brakes as required, but we should apply them gently. The sudden application of all braking power might seriously retard productive expansion, even though it did make possible the meeting of our immediate defense needs. The American people will accept gladly controls needed to direct scarce materials into war production. However, they want controls which will not limit or retard our efforts to expand production and which will have as their purpose to distribute and not to maintain scarcities.

Somehow it seems to me that the problems facing our economy and our Government officials who are concerned with it are more difficult now than in wartime. This comes about because our effort for defense is not the all-out effort required by total war. This makes it as essential to have a bipartisan policy for national security as for foreign policy and for the honest differences of opinion which come about to concern only the execution of this policy.

The cost of our Armed Forces is very high. This comes from a pay scale designed to attract volunteers during a period of prosperity. The Congress should give prompt consideration to universal military service in which the compensation can be less because it does not need to be designed to attract volunteers and because the service is rendered by all as an obligation of citizenship. The conditions of today would require a period of service sufficient to maintain a well-trained Army—perhaps at least 2 years. There would also be required a permanent cadre composed of those who would remain in the armed services as a career to provide the older and highly trained men needed to add stability.

To you who face the problems of State government, these are not new questions. The world situation of today has made national security of greater importance than at any time in our peacetime history. Moreover, the term national security somehow does not seem fully descriptive. Major war cannot come to the world anywhere in which we would not be involved. Therefore, since we want peace, we must now think in terms of international security. We, and those who believe as we do, must proceed with utmost dispatch to raise and equip the fighting forces which may make peace possible, but which, if war does come, will bring early victory.

Throughout the free world we are accepted as a leader because the free peoples know they have nothing to fear from us. We are determined to be worthy of our leadership. We may have many differences among ourselves as we progress toward realization of a free world. However, Russia would be ill-advised if it believes that these differences shall ever cause us to fail or to falter in the cause to which we are committed.

Yugoslavia Backs Appeal on Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. RICHARDS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of December 7, 1950:

YUGOSLAVIA BACKS APPEAL ON KOREA—ENDORSES REQUEST OF 13 ASIAN NATIONS THAT THIRTY-EIGHTH PARALLEL BE NOT CROSSED BY REDS

The Yugoslav Government wholeheartedly supports the appeal on Tuesday by United Nations representatives of 13 Asian nations to Communist China and the North Korean regime to announce publicly that their forces will not cross the thirty-eighth parallel.

The first announcement of the Yugoslav position on this appeal came yesterday in an address by Dr. Ales Bebler, permanent Yugoslav delegate to the United Nations, who spoke in the afternoon at a luncheon under auspices of the Churchman Associates, Inc., at Town Hall, 123 West Forty-third Street.

"This is our last chance for a peaceful settlement which could last a while," Dr. Bebler declared. "That is why our Yugoslav delegation backs so heartily the move of the 13 Asian nations last night."

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

DANGERS IN KOREAN SITUATION

If the Chinese Communists and North Koreans tried "to occupy the entire peninsula of Korea, they might create such an international tension that if it did not result in war between the United Nations and the people of China, it would add so much to international tension that we would come closer to a new world war," he said.

"This is a great horror for us all," he continued. "This is the great need for which the United Nations has been founded. This is the great thing for which we must fight. We hope humanity will not have to go through the new experience of a world war."

The office of the Yugoslav delegation to the United Nations made public last night an official statement on the Yugoslav position, saying:

"The Yugoslav delegation to the United Nations backs wholeheartedly the appeal made last night by 13 Asian delegations to the Governments of the People's Republic of Korea and of the People's Republic of China to declare that their armed forces will not cross the thirty-eighth parallel.

"We feel that such a step is the best way to prevent the Korean conflict from spreading. The world has had ample opportunity to see that the Korean problem as a problem of unification of the Korean Nation cannot be solved by the use of armed force and that every attempt to do so leads further toward a general war. This has always been the attitude of the Yugoslav delegation."

RECALLS VISIT OF CLERGYMEN

In opening his address, Dr. Bebler took note of the presence of three members of a group of Americans composed of clergymen who visited his country in 1947 as guests of the Yugoslav Government. He told them that "your visit when our country was considered part of a world hostile to the United States took great courage to find out the truth about Yugoslavia and tell that truth to the United States."

The three at the luncheon were the Reverend Dr. Guy Emery Shipley, who was the group's spokesman, the Reverend Dr. Phillips Packer Elliott, who presided at the luncheon, and Dr. Edmund Devol, physician, and the group's only lay member.

Dr. Bebler echoed the plea of Dr. Joza Vilfan, deputy foreign minister of Yugoslavia, who preceded him as a speaker, for "more behind-the-scenes, more tête-à-tête conversations, more undramatic, calm, and factual analysis" in a search for urgent solutions of world problems by the United Nations.

Dr. Vilfan emphasized the activities of the United Nations in economic and social spheres. He said the "age-old problems of mankind, health and sickness, knowledge and ignorance, prosperity, and poverty," had for the first time in history been taken up in the Economic and Social Council and the secretariat "with the help of the world's best experts, with the idea that these problems have to be considered as the common problems of the international community, for which a common solution must be found."

Tito's Brand of Communism Seen Lesser of Two Evils

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein an excellent news article which appeared in the columns of the Andover Townsman, Andover, Mass., on December 7, 1950, entitled "Tito's Brand of Communism Seen Lesser of Two Evils." I respectfully request permission to insert this item in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this time, since the House is today considering the passage of H. R. 9853, which is a bill to promote the foreign policy and provide for the defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia. This write-up by John Fisher is a sincere and pointed reason or reasons which I know may assist the membership of the House in voting for the passage of this legislation. It is an excellent statement with a truthful analysis of our present situation now existing between the United States, Russia, and Yugoslavia. The article above-mentioned follows:

TITO'S BRAND OF COMMUNISM SEEN LESSER OF TWO EVILS

A life preserver for sinking Yugoslavia will continue to be a subject of debate, despite the suspicion and hostility toward Tito expressed by influential congressional leaders and many others.

Already stopgap famine aid was sent by President Truman even before the short session of Congress convened. But in addition to this food, western manufactured goods and eventually modern military equipment will be required to support Tito in his struggle for survival.

The time has come for a realistic appraisal of our attitude toward this controversial figure.

A great many Americans are perplexed over the question of assisting an avowed Communist, who not so long ago imprisoned a Catholic archbishop and whose flyers shot down American planes. Public opinion recoils at many of the brutal features of the Belgrade dictatorship—and justly so.

But a nation in jeopardy often must choose the lesser of two evils. Many wise statesmen maintain that Yugoslavia must not be examined separately. It should be considered in relation to the whole Communist problem with Russia as the motivating force of this anticapitalist system.

WEAKENING GRIP OF SOVIET

Unpalatable as all forms of modern Marxism are to democratic idealists, none could immediately endanger American survival were it not for the dread power and the determination to destroy the United States held by the leaders of the Soviet Union. These baleful men alone have the military might to menace the free world.

Any policy that weakens their grip is a measure of national security for the United States. Judged in this light, we stave off war—or in the event of war add 32 Yugoslav divisions to our side—if we hold Tito's head above the waves.

Were the American public better briefed on the Russian attitude toward Tito, it could more readily understand why he should not be allowed to go under.

For several years it has been one of my editorial duties to read the world Communist press and to keep tabs on Red broadcasts. In both mediums the Tito clique—as Titoists in all countries are described—is second only to the United States as the target for Russia's most vehement hatred.

The United States of America is the one force now able to block Russian domination of the entire world. Tito—and the anti-Russian nationalism which he inspires—is the most serious internal threat to Soviet domination of Communist satellites.

TITOISM CROPS UP EVERYWHERE

Stalin knows that he dare not attempt to liquidate the United States unless he can be sure of a solid alliance with China, Poland, and other countries behind the iron curtain. He knows from recent startling experience that local Titoism—which placed national self-interest above Russian imperialism—cropped up in nearly every Communist Party outside the Soviet Union and, despite re-education programs and bloody purges, still persists.

For example, Fritof Lager, secretary of the Swedish Communist Party, in a recent report to Moscow, admitted that Tito clique agents were poisoning the minds of Swedish Communist intelligentsia. Henrich Fritz, member of the Austrian Politburo, also reveals that vile dens of Titoists in Vienna pour out streams of anti-Soviet literature on dollar subsidies received from Americans.

So long as Tito keeps on his feet, anti-Soviet Communists everywhere will be encouraged to balk Russian selfishness; a selfishness whose most sinister manifestation is military agression.

It infuriates Russian Communists to have Tito maintain that they, the Russians, are Marxist heretics because they contravene Marx's principles to respect the rights and independence of small nations. Such charges undermine the faith of non-Russian Reds everywhere.

UNITED STATES AID ANGERS MOSCOW

Moscow also explodes in anger every time the United States moves closer to Yugoslavia. The Kremlin calculates that without our aid, Tito might not be able to ward off famine, resulting from this year's crop failure, and the consequent economic depression in which revolt could succeed.

The drought, the worst in Yugoslav history, and the inflation of the dinar have seriously curtailed the peasant contributions to the nation's food supply. According to Belgrade official figures, the corn harvest is 35 percent below that of 1949 and sugar is even lower. Fodder is so scarce that farmers are slaughtering their cattle and selling the meat in the black market. Even Tito discloses that grain bins will be bare by February.

When it was announced that the United States would ship emergency food, Russian propaganda declared that Tito had deliberately planned to ruin the peasants and that now, by accepting American grain, he was purposely binding Yugoslavia to the "war chariot of the American imperialists, who will profit to the extent of millions of dollars from the starvation of the Yugoslav people. This is the foul crime for which the Yugoslav people will call their hangmen to account."

RUSSIAN AGENTS AT WORK

An ominous consequence of the crop failure has been a revival of organized revolution. Numerous conspiracies already have been nipped in the bud by Rankovic's hard-boiled secret police.

Belgrade accuses several captured outlaws of being members of the Soviet Army. Although anti-Communist nationalists, as well as pro-Soviet Reds, deny this particular charge, there is no doubt that Russian agents along the border and inside the country are instigating revolt.

"Our goal," frankly admits Pero Popivoda, writing in the official Cominform paper, "is to overthrow the counterrevolutionary, Fascist Tito clique."

In an effort to justify rebellion by proving the Tito brand of communism is spurious, Popivoda alleges that Tito, during the war, schemed with British and American agents to get rid of orthodox communism. "Due to the foul and criminal actions of Tito and his Anglo-American instructors," he adds, "more than 10,000 of the prewar party membership of 12,000 were killed."

"Because of this Fascist terror, the leadership of the Communist Party fell into the hands of spies, assassins, and imperialist hirelings. The people realize that Yugoslavia can be wrested from the clutches of imperialists only by overthrowing the Fascist regime."

So it's either support Marxist Tito or see him replaced by another Communist sworn to enmity against the United States.

Let the Punishment Fit the Crime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the defeat of our Armed Forces in Korea, the greatest military defeat in our history, is the undeniable result of Secretary of State Dean Acheson's persistent and fallacious policy and defunct judgment of appeasement and containment of communism in China which has brought the greatest humiliation and loss of prestige the United States has ever suffered.

No one can today accurately appraise or estimate the terrible drastic future this defeat portends for the United States and the rest of the world.

Acheson stands indicted as a complete failure in the performance of his duties and in the execution and administration of his great responsibility as Secretary of State before the American people.

Acheson has been aided and abetted, supported and encouraged by President Truman, who has directed and approved his actions and who is responsible for his appointment and his remaining in the important office of Secretary of State. President Truman is, therefore, equally responsible for the greatest humiliation and military defeat this Nation has suffered in the Korean War, which President Truman declared and committed the United States to prosecute without the consent or approval of the Congress.

We Members of Congress cannot permit this faulty judgment and demoralizing, degenerating administration of the executive branch of our Government to continue. The people of this Nation have exhausted their patience. They are angry, they are fearful of the survival of the United States as the great and powerful Nation it has always been and as it emerged the greatest Nation in the world following World War II.

We Members of Congress, responsible as we are to the people of the Nation, must give heed to their demands. Let us not forget, and let the day never come when this Nation is not governed by the consent of the governed. That means that we are the responsible representatives of the people who sent us here by and with their consent and approval.

That also means in my opinion that we should demand by resolution that President Truman speedily remove Dean Acheson from the office of Secretary of State and if he fails to do that, that impeachment proceedings be instituted to remove both Acheson and Truman.

The people of this Nation will hold the Congress responsible if this is not done. They will not be satisfied with anything less.

Fascism and Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD P. CASE
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, one of the ablest of our younger American authors is Peter Viereck, associate professor of history at Mount Holyoke College. A historian of the first rank and the 1949 winner of the Pulitzer prize for poetry, Dr. Viereck is also a brilliant writer of books and essays on political subjects.

With the permission of the House, I am inserting as a part of my remarks, first, an article by Dr. Viereck which appeared on October 26, 1950, in the New York Herald Tribune and, second, a letter dated November 3, 1950, from Dr. Viereck to the editor of the same newspaper.

The article and letter are as follows:

FASCISM AND COMMUNISM—PROFESSOR VIERECK SAYS BOTH MUST BE FOUGHT IN AMERICA'S POLITICAL WARFARE

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

The time has come for press and pulpit to speak out an unpopular truth, evaded by those who depend on votes and popularity. The blunt fact is that too many Americans are forgetting the central emotional and intellectual experience of our era; the crusade—let us not be ashamed of so uncynical a word—the great crusade against Nazi inhumanity. This tiny, almost invisible moral flaw is a focal infection poisoning our body politic.

It is likewise poisoning our relations with Europe. The Communist big lie, that America backs only reactionaries or Fascists, has not convinced Europe's non-Communists. But it has left them with the uneasy feeling of a wife whose husband is accused of infidelity. Though believing nary a word of it, she craves constant reassurance. We have not sufficiently reassured a Hitler-ravaged Europe of our anti-fascism. This is the greatest weakness in our psychological warfare. It undermines the Atlantic Pact and is used by Communists to neutralize two different non-Communist groups:

1. First, the herd of defeatists, the non-Communist—sometimes capitalist—appeasers of Russia. Their democratic indignation against the sole arsenal of democracy, their virtuous lament about "reactionary America" with its imaginary "Fascist witch-hunt against liberals" is an impertinence concealing a loss of nerve. Their sophistry of equating Russia and America as equally imperialistic is an unconscious alibi-in-advance for panicky futile neutrality; perhaps even for lucrative collaboration with an awaited Red army.

2. The second group is Europe's finest—the graduates of the anti-Nazi underground, whose gallantry a dozen Marshall plans cannot repay. As shown by Mayor Reuter's role in West Berlin, these influential leaders can raise the anti-Soviet morale of Europe overnight. Only their prestige and magnetism can inspire the needed self-sacrifice for our side. But first we must win their full trust. In the New York Herald Tribune of October 1 this was stressed in a sensationally important letter from Count Max Salvadori, the famous underground hero who parachuted behind Mussolini's lines and whose voice of urgent warning represents millions of his fellow veterans of the underground. The Voice of America must do more to persuade them of our fidelity to the anti-Fascist sacrament that united them and us before 1945. Our foreign policy must also take them into account by reversing our decision to end denazification trials in Germany. (I refer to the underground of genuine democrats, not to those who served Hitler obsequiously so long as Russia was his ally. The proper adjective for Communists is not anti-Fascist but Stalinist Fascist.)

In 1945 General Patton forced undemocratic Germans to see with their own eyes the skeletons in a local concentration camp. In 1950 democratic but forgetful Americans ought to force themselves to think of these skeletons. Only five brief years ago nazism was still gassing innocent millions and turning their fat into soap, their gold teeth into foreign exchange. When American soldiers put a stop to this pastime, so that Western Europe today is free, did they "die in vain" for "stupid idealism?" So says the new school that blames today's Soviet menace on our war with Germany. But Russia's ideology and growing strength made her expansion inevitable in any case. Only our learning the price of isolationism and appeasement the hard way against Hitler has educated us into our timely Atlantic Pact and Korean intervention against Stalin. If, through too narrow a version of anticommunism, America now minimizes its anti-Hitler war, it minimizes the noblest and wisest act in its history. "Who," to echo the chant of the Charles Beard school, "got us into war?" As a historian, I wish the answer were:

"It is we, the American people, who got ourselves in. We got in because we happen to be human beings and, therefore, prejudiced against tyrants and torturers. Because we are the product of 2,000 years of Christian and Hellenic traditions, compared with which Hitlerism was an obscene word scrawled on the walls of civilization, which had to be wiped off. Because we are our brother's keeper. Because—despite Hitler's and Stalin's appeasers—this small globe can no longer be half-slave, half-free."

Unfortunately for America's claim to greatness, the above is not a sufficient answer to why we got in. We had no choice but to fight because Japan attacked us, and Germany declared war. * * * Suppose Japan had not attacked. Further, suppose our isolationists had won our elections and had accepted their humble niche in a Hitler-ruled world, as some anti-Communists now advocate. Our Nation would have disintegrated, morally and materially. Evidence of this is the partial disintegration that was already taking place before Pearl Harbor restored American unity. The issue of 1939–41 was how to halt, before too late, the "mein kampf" program of Germany, mistress of the globe by the victorious sword of a master race. How did America react to this issue?

On the one hand, America's anti-Fascist majority guarded the light in those three dark years. But let us unflinchingly recall the other, more embarrassing aspect of our own country. While Paris fell and London reeled, a propaganda machine, ironically named America First, was advocating neutrality toward monsters whose mass murders were unequaled in history and whose victory would hardly have left America unmolested. (The majority of isolationists and America Firsters were men of personal integrity, unjustly slandered as Nazis. Nevertheless what counts historically, as with Henry Wallace's 1948 campaign, is: Who was the real gainer from their misdirected love of peace?) With a nudge of vulgar knowingness, our largest circulating newspapers advocated the realism of making a deal with the wave of the future, otherwise known as the bitch-goddess Success.

It was as if the vermin of a thousand drains had crept up into the sunlight and were basking there. A fifth-column magazine, legally circulated, advertised a new kind of blackjack, quaintly called the kike-killer. German bundists held joint meetings with nativists Ku Klux Klan to make the world unsafe for democracy. An un-Christian cleric, with a radio and newspaper audience of millions, was caught plagiarizing whole passages of Goebbels, but went right on inciting to pogroms and civil war, publishing the Elders of Zion forgeries and threatening American democracy with what he called the Franco way. (Had Hitler won, had we entered too late to stop him, then these terrorists might now be ruling the United States.) One morning the police discovered—have we forgotten this too?—that a Hitler-worshiping gang of dead-end kids, frenzied by Christian-front propaganda, were stocking a secret arsenal of bombs and dynamite against Jews and Communists. Meanwhile, the Communists themselves, during the Hitler-Stalin pact, outshrilled Hitler in calling our leaders anti-German warmongers.

In retrospect, all these forgotten realities look like a surrealist dream. Surely this was not our own lifetime. Surely these stories are the quaint papyrus of some little comic-opera kingdom that died of its own sordidness and silliness a dozen centuries ago. Meanwhile, 5,000,000 victims were roasting in the crematories. * * *

Today whenever Americans pardon Nazi criminals in Germany or award an official Library of Congress prize to a Jew-baiting Fascist traitor (as if poetry were exempt from ethics!) or elect to public office racist agitators, then Europeans tend to assume the motive is lack of democracy or even is facism. Their assumption is incorrect. America's real sin is a subtler one: indifference. In our vast anti-Fascist majority, this postwar indifference to fascism stems not from lack of democracy, which America practices sincerely, but from what Dante calls moral sloth.

Moral sloth is hardly an auspicious atmosphere for effective anticommunism. Only the spirit that stopped Hitler can stop Stalin. Anti-fascism is creative humaneness, the answer of human dignity to brute force. A rebirth of the anti-Fascist spirit will be the salvation of the west, the answer to Spengler's pessimism. The sacrament of 1939–45, its exaltation and dedication, must not become mere lip service to freedom; it must again, in Wordsworth's phrase, be "felt along the heart." Without it, we can preach our anti-communism to Europe and Asia "with the tongues of men and angels" and yet have no more effect than "a sounding brass," "a tinkling cymbal."

When a Fascist Franco or a domestic Nazi like Gerald K. Smith, a charming Vichy diplomat, or an efficient Nazi general step forward with an expectant smile to offer us their services against Communism, coyly impresarioed by those patriots of the yellow press who were isolationist toward Hitler and interventionist toward Stalin, then let public opinion—no longer amused—thunder back at the whole crew of them: "Crawl under your stones again; we do not want you!" Memories of the battle against Fascist appeasement by America's bipartisan interventionists in 1939–41 must today reunite conservative and liberal America as the battle of Agincourt united England on St. Crispin's Day:

"He, that shall live this day, and see old age,
Will yearly on the vigil feast his friends
* * *
And gentlemen in England, now a-bed,
Shall think themselves accursed they were not here;
And hold their manhoods cheap, while any speaks
That fought with us upon Saint Crispin's day."

For life in human society is an unending St. Crispin's Day, no meaningless vanity of ego and mean-spirited self-interest, but a battle where every slightest political act is a responsibility of infinite moral significance.

THE ETHICS OF EZRA POUND

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

The position of really serious, non-Philistine opponents of the Bollingen Award gets so misrepresented in most periodicals that the following must be stressed: None of us (with one overpublicized exception) was impugning the committee's motives nor indicting all modern poetry. For us the issue is whether, as some "new critics" believe, form and technique can be considered apart from content and meaning. Thus, in the Atlantic Monthly, October 1949, I protested vigorously against articles absurdly accusing the Bollingen committee of Fascist sympathies and concluded: "The sympathies of the committee were not with Pound's politics but with the widely held unhistorical and unpsychological argument that artistic form can be considered apart from its content and moral meaning."

No thought control; there must be no censorship of Pound's right to publish anything whatever. But must he also get a government-connected prize for it? Perhaps yes, if it were for his brilliant, earlier, more distinguished works. Unfortunately this honorably motivated award was solely for one book: his Pisan Cantos.

Poems of esthetic intention must be judged only esthetically, regardless of their author's politics. But Pound's prize-winning Pisan Cantos are not intended as purely esthetic. Theirs is a political message that Mussolini was martyred and World War II caused by Jews: "the goyim" (non-Jews) "go to salable slaughter" for "the yidd * * * David rex the prime s. o. b." This is politics, not serious poetry, and hence not exempt from America's ethical, nonesthetic condemnation. Whether from a fashionable coterie-protected poet or a mere "low-brow" Gerald K. Smith, such influential racists propaganda against World War II must be protested by those to whom a simple human compassion for Hitler's millions of tortured victims is the deepest emotional and moral experience of our era. What, indeed, is our very necessary zeal against communism but this same heart-breaking distress over inhumanity?

Tito Says He'll Back UN Decision in Event of Conflict With Red China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. RICHARDS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of November 7, 1950:

TITO SAYS HE'LL BACK UN DECISION IN EVENT OF CONFLICT WITH RED CHINA

(By C. L. Sulzberger)

BELGRADE, YUGOSLAVIA, November 6.—If complications arising from the Korean War should result in an outbreak of hostilities between the United States and Communist China, Marshal Tito said this evening, Yugoslavia will adhere to any United Nations definition as to which was the aggressor nation and will abide by the ensuing action voiced by that international body.

Yugoslavia's Premier was definite in this assertion. In an interview with this correspondent, he said that it was still difficult to assess the attitude on Korea of Mao Tse-tung's Chinese Communist government. He added that not even the United States appeared to have adopted any precise stand yet; that he was not in a position to gage the accuracy of reports from Korea or to evaluate the scope of the situation.

The marshal was asked what his country's stand would be should a deteriorating situation bring about hostilities between the United States and Communist China. He replied:

"My attitude is, of course, the same as that of our delegation to the United Nations. If such a situation as you mention should develop, we would take a stand against any and all aggression. I should not like to be misunderstood. It is the United Nations itself which must decide who is the aggressor. Our stand will be the same—that of the United Nations. We will adhere to that body's decision."

Marshal Tito recalled that his country had agreed to recognize the Chinese Communist Government and had evinced a desire to exchange envoys with Peiping. There had been no reply from China, but he said he could judge from the Communist Chinese press that Mr. Mao's attitude was not very friendly. To this he added:

"We know why. It is the same in the case of all countries having a close relationship with the Soviet Union. They all have a uniform policy on Yugoslavia, because Soviet policy toward this country has not changed, and they cannot have an independent view."

Internationally speaking, these statements by Marshal Tito have an exceptional importance because, as he commented, Yugoslavia remains a truly Communist state based upon the tenets of Marx and Lenin, although opposed to the efforts by the Soviet Union to revise those precepts. Furthermore, it may be recalled that Yugoslavia, with 32 divisions, has the largest army in the part of Europe outside the Soviet orbit.

TITO WOULD KEEP OBLIGATION

The marshal was asked whether Yugoslavia would be prepared to earmark certain of her armed forces to be placed at the permanent disposal of the United Nations to combat aggression when and where it might occur.

"This means a matter for the future," he replied. "When our country undertakes an obligation, it keeps it. Our country is not very enthusiastic about symbolic help, because it means nothing and can only lead to trouble. I can only confirm Kardelj's stand at the United Nations. [Dr. Edward Kardelj, Yugoslav Foreign Minister, has supported United Nations decisions on Korea.]

Marshal Tito continued:

"The character of aggression must be defined. We are on the side of those countries that oppose aggression as formulated by the United Nations. Thus our stand is clear."

During the interview, which lasted an hour and a half, Marshal Tito spoke with complete frankness on a wide variety of subjects. His views were expressed in Serbo-Croatian and translated by a government interpreter, but it was evident that the Marshal's knowledge of English is now fairly considerable.

He looked healthy and fit, unworried by the cares occasioned by the Cominform's political war against Yugoslavia, its economic blockade, or the difficult food situation caused by this year's drought.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Wearing a gray army uniform with red stripes on his trousers, and no decorations, he talked with great cordiality and openness.

The discussion took place in his home in a Belgrade suburb, an unpretentious villa. Coffee, plum brandy, and Macedonian cigarettes were served. Two dogs, an Alsatian that he got from the retreating Germans during the war and a bird dog, wandered about the antechambers. Beside his desk stood a bust of Lenin—and none of Generalissimo Stalin.

Aside from expressing his views on the far eastern crisis, the marshal made the following points:

1. Yugoslavia has no desire to retain the Greek children who were brought to the country during Greece's civil war, and Belgrade hopes that the International Red Cross can supervise the return of those children desired by their parents.

2. Yugoslavia has no territorial claims upon Greek Macedonia, nor does she desire frontier alterations, but she would wish to see certain minority rights granted to the Slavonic elements in that territory.

3. If it is in the interest of international relationships and will not cause unrest among Yugoslavia's internal population, the Belgrade government will release Archbishop Aloysius Stepinac, at present imprisoned as a war criminal. The possibility of releasing the cleric exists now. He might be sent to a monastery, or there could be another solution, but he would not be permitted to serve as a prelate in the country.

4. Yugoslavia is ready to purchase arms from the western powers for national defense, and in an emergency would ask for material aid wherever she could obtain it.

5. Despite Moscow's propaganda, Yugoslavia does not consider that the Marshall plan has been catastrophic for Europe; instead, it has afforded great help to certain countries, such as Italy and France.

6. While the tempo of the Yugoslav revolution has in no sense slowed, a broad new amnesty of political prisoners will soon be forthcoming.

TRANSIT TO GREECE HOPED FOR

Of relations with Greece, Marshal Tito said:

"Railway communications between the two countries have not yet been established, but it is not our fault. We have sought to restore them, in order to use our free zone in in the port of Salonika. I hope this matter will soon be settled with the Greek Government."

Talking in extreme temperate terms of Greece, Marshal Tito indicated that he was anxious for a settlement of the outstanding questions. He would like the Red Cross, with its great reputation, to handle the repatriation of Greek children whose parents wish their return. It is necessary for the Red Cross to supervise this, he said, because of the Cominform's propaganda allegations that Yugoslavia is turning over to "Fascist reactionaries" children whose parents were in Rumania, Czechoslovakia, and other lands under Soviet control.

"As far as Macedonia is concerned, we have not asked for, nor do we consider requesting, revision of the existing order. We do think of the Slavic minority in Greece. It does exist, and we cannot allow that subject to be forgotten—first, for reasons of principle; and second, because the Cominform, especially Bulgaria, continually attacks us on this issue. But we have in mind no territorial claims. In contrast, Bulgaria, with the full knowledge of the Soviet Union, has pretentions on Yugoslav Macedonia."

On Albania, he said:

"Press reports that Soviet experts and instructors are being sent there are based upon fact. But they cannot create a large army there because the country is too small. They are certainly strengthening Albania's economy for their own purposes. Albania continues to behave provocatively upon our border and to shoot across at our patrols. Furthermore, Tirana is making plain again its designs on the Kossovo and Metchije regions of Yugoslavia."

On the question of Austria and Greece as neighbors, he declared:

"We are ready any day to normalize relationships. They are not bad right now with Austria, and are improving daily. We hope the same will occur with Greece and I think that will be soon, although to date there has been little understanding on the part of Athens."

Complete Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial from a recent issue of the Daily Evening Item, Lynn, Mass.:

RUSSIA'S REAL AIM

The Russians mean to conquer us.

They have been announcing that intention in their writings for a long time, just as Hitler did in his book, Mein Kampf. Unhappily, too many of us have not wanted to face this brutal truth.

Now events in Korea and elsewhere in the world are compelling us to accept it as the great cardinal fact governing our lives.

Russian talk of peace is meaningless. It is contradicted by Communist action in Korea and Communist action in the United Nations. When the chips were down on a UN resolution that would have promoted early peace in Korea Russia voted "no."

The Kremlin has no idea of negotiating a lasting peace or any other kind of settlement that would hamper its plan for global conquest. Russian leaders believe Communist society represents the wave of the future and that we in the west are a dying civilization. So frevently are they convinced of this that they are never troubled for long by individual reverses. They believe time works for them.

Obviously that doesn't mean they're content to sit back passively and wait for us to crumble. They exert a constant pressure against us, probing for weak spots. That's why they went into Korea in the first place; they had it marked as a soft point.

It should be abundantly plain to every American, furthermore that every Soviet success emboldens Moscow to more daring adventures.

Most important of all, it brings nearer the day when Soviet rulers may be willing to undertake a decisive phase in their struggle with the West. No men undertake a war unless they think they have a good chance to win it. The critical moment is the one when they at last believe their prospects are bright.

Knowing all this about the Russians, what must we do? First, we must divest ourselves once and for all of wishful thinking about the likelihood Russia will change its objectives. The Kremlin's purpose is unalterable—to destroy us—and everything it does serves that end and no other.

We must then resolve to do everything possible to compel Russia to postpone the decision that means general war. That means a high state of military preparedness for ourselves and our Allies, real protection both for America and the crucial industry of Western Europe. It means accepting controls, sacrifices, hardships at home.

We do not have much time to make up our minds to do this. The areas of the world left to free men are diminishing. Our chief military advantages—the A-bomb and a strategic air force—also are diminishing relatively as Russian power gains.

The price of failure to do all these things now—while the Russians presumably are still deferring the big decision—will be wholesale war.

We might get it anyway. It might come through accident or Soviet miscalculation of our strength and theirs. Or Moscow might conclude that a long stalemate induced by our growing power would ultimately work to the ruin of Communist leaders. They might in desperation choose a war of doubtful outcome rather than risk their necks at home by waiting too long.

These eventualities we cannot guard against. But in duty to ourselves and free people everywhere, we must behave as if accident and mistake will not govern. We must act to show the men in the Kremlin that they cannot win. Or to put it a better way, that we will not be defeated.

Masonic Address by Hon. Burnet R. Maybank, of South Carolina

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 12 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an address I delivered at Landmark Lodge, No. 76, Ancient Free Masons, at the one hundredth anniversary meeting of the lodge, in Charleston, S. C., December 11, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

Tonight we honor ourselves by gathering here to honor some of the early craftsmen who helped to build the noble structure of Masonry in South Carolina.

It is a noble structure, and we, who are the beneficiaries of the work done by these pioneers, may sometimes forget the debt of honor and gratitude that we owe to them. It is most appropriate, therefore, that we take time out from our busy activities and responsibilities to pay tribute to the services of the members of Landmark Lodge, No. 76, Ancient Free Masons, which was organized 100 years ago tonight.

Celebrations of this sort are only partially successful if they only look backward and contemplate what has been done in the past.

It is equally important that, as we honor and admire the accomplishments of our predecessors we draw inspiration and courage from those accomplishments as a part of our own equipment to carry on the work they have pioneered. We can honor them, of course, by taking part in this celebration and in discussing what they have done for Masonry in South Carolina, and particularly in considering the unfavorable conditions they often encountered; but we can pay to them a more sincere tribute and prove ourselves more worthy to wear their mantle by basing our future activities and efforts upon a firmer understanding and appreciation of the loyalty and devotion that characterized their services and made of their achievements the record we are here to pay tribute to tonight.

There has long been controversy as to the origin of Masonry. In the eighteenth century, and in the first half of the nineteenth, Masonic writers laid great stress upon the possible origin of the society in the remote ages of the past. Later research has tended to show that most of these claims to the legendary antiquity of the order are without definite historical basis, but they are interesting. Besides, there may be some truth in some of them, because there are many facts in human history that cannot be definitely established by scientific methods, but neither can they be definitely disproved.

Among these legendary claims to the ancient origin of the Masonic fraternity is one to the effect that the history of the human race was the story of Masonry, beginning with the migration from the Garden of Eden. Others have claimed that the society is the successor of ancient mysteries coming from the oriental peoples. Another theory is that the rites of Masonry played a part in the construction of the Temple of Solomon. Still others have held that the order had its beginnings in the civil strifes in Great Britain in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

The Encyclopedia Americana says that the consensus of reliable historical opinion affirms that the premier Grand Lodge of England, organized on June 24, 1717, "is the mother of all regular Masonic lodges of the three craft degrees, and, therefore, peculiar interest centers in the landmarks, legends, and authentic narratives pertaining to the English rite itself, as well as the American rite, the daughter thereof, so to speak."

Regardless, however, of the antiquity of the origin of Freemasonry, it is a fraternity composed always of men of leadership and influence in their communities—men who contribute to the upbuilding and advancement of the educational, religious, and cultural interests of their communities.

In taking part in activities of this sort, it is to be noted that members of the Masonic fraternity always utilize the outstanding Masonic quality of fraternity. Masons recognize the value of cooperation, of working together in undertakings that are for the good of all. They are, therefore, always to be found supporting the leading movements designed to contribute to the improvement of conditions and the development of their home towns and their States. These activities they carry on, not as Masons, but as citizens who have adopted the high principles of Masonry and have made them a part of their equipment for doing their share in civic undertakings—equipment that lifts them above the level of selfish and mercenary motives.

The first lodge of Masons in South Carolina was organized in Charleston on October 28, 1736. This was just 19 years after the organization of the premier grand lodge in England, which is referred to as "the mother of all regular Masonic lodges of the three craft degrees." For many years there were two grand lodges in South Carolina. One was the Grand Lodge of the Most Ancient and Honorable Society of Free Masons, and the other was the Grand Lodge of Ancient York Masons for the State of South Carolina. Between these two organizations much discord and dissension developed, which did neither any good.

One of the outstanding incidents growing out of this rivalry occurred in connection with the visit of George Washington to South Carolina in 1791, shortly after he became President. On his arrival in Charleston the Grand Lodge of Ancient York Masons wrote him a letter expressing respect for his public and private character, as well as the relation in which he stood with the brethren of the society. The letter contained this concluding paragraph:

"With fervent zeal for your happiness, we pray that a life so dear to the bosom of this society, and to society in general, may be long, very long preserved; and, when you leave the temporal symbolic lodges of this world, may you be received in the Celestial Lodge of light and perfection, where the Grand Master Architect of the universe presides."

No such recognition was accorded General Washington by the Ancient and Accepted Masons. And after Washington's death in 1799, a civic procession in his honor took place in Charleston, in which 250 members of the Ancient York Masons took part, but there is no record of any recognition of Washington as a Mason by the Ancient and Accepted Masons.

Albert G. Mackey, for many years an officer of Landmark Lodge, in his History of Freemasonry in South Carolina, refers to the bitter feud between the Ancient and Accepted Masons and the Ancient Yorks, pointing out that each denied the legitimacy and the regularity of the other, and that each grand lodge fostered a hostile feeling toward the other. And Mackey expresses the view that the failure or refusal of the grand lodge of Ancient and Accepted Masons to participate in the ceremonies in honor of Washington is to be attributed to the fact that he was an Ancient York Mason, and that his masonic claim was not recognized by the Ancient and Accepted Masons. They mourned him as citizens, but could not admit his right to masonic funeral honors. In this, Mackey holds, they were consistent. Neither the fear of unpopularity nor the persuasions of patriotism would permit them to abandon the ground they had taken, along with their mother lodge in England, that all Ancient York Masons were irregular and clandestine.

The masonic feuds in Charleston played a part also in the visit of Marquis de Lafayette in 1825. The marquis had been informed of the differences, and avoided offending either of them by pleading lack of time to accept or take part in any ceremonies in his honor.

This rivalry between the two grand lodges was directly responsible for the organization of Landmark Lodge, No. 76. It became so bitter at times that prominent members of each faction recognized the necessity for a reconciliation and union of the two as the only means of preserving effective Masonry in South Carolina. An effort was made to effect such a reconciliation as a result of which a special communication of the grand lodge was held on December 11, 1850, at which a warrant of constitution was granted to John Alexander Gyles, Theodore S. Gourdin, and William Alston Gourdin "to open and hold a lodge to be designated as Landmark Lodge, No. 76, under our jurisdiction, at Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, or within three miles of the same." It was to be a lodge "to which all Masons might look for guidance and instruction in the true and undefiled work of the craft."

The new lodge faced a delicate situation in undertaking to compose the differences that divided Charleston Masonry for so many years. It was highly successful during its first 10 years, but when the War Between the States broke out most of the members of Landmark took part in the conflict, from which many never returned. A dispensation was obtained in 1862 which permitted the lodge to suspend for 2 years, and as the temple was within range of Union shells, the records and other effects were sent to Columbia for safekeeping. They were stolen or burned when Sherman entered and destroyed Columbia.

In July 1865 a few members who had survived the war undertook to restore the lodge. They were denied a dispensation to reopen the lodge until dues to the grand lodge were paid. The amount involved was between $60 and $70, a sum which the members could not pay. A loan was arranged, the dues were paid, and Landmark Lodge was restored to active life. It has continued to thrive and prosper to this good hour.

It may be of interest to refer briefly to some of the changes that have taken place in South Carolina during the hundred years since Landmark Lodge was organized. In 1850 the population of the State was 668,507; it is now more than three times that figure—2,117,027. Charleston in 1850 had a population of 42,984. Two years earlier, in 1848, the city's population was 26,451—a gain of 62 percent in 2 years. That rate of growth has not been kept up, as we all know.

In 1850 South Carolina had only very limited industry. There were 18 cotton mills employing about 1,000 workers, and the census of 1850 shows a decrease in the number of employees.

As of July 1 of this year, there are 283 textile mills in the State of South Carolina, employing 137,416 people.

Other industries that have flourished in the State since the blot of reconstruction was removed include pulp mills, brick making, lumbering, foundries, refineries, and fisheries. The growth of cattle raising and dairying is rapidly transforming agricultural conditions in the State.

The improvements in the living conditions of our people in the past 100 years have probably been more pronounced than in any similar period in our history. In 1850 our people had no telephones, no electric lights, no electric refrigerators, no automobiles, no radios, no television, nor many other conveniences that have become commonplace with us. Neither the State government nor the Federal Government had done anything toward providing the people with roads, and provision for public education was quite limited. There was no Government development of power for the benefit of the public, no rural electrification, no Federal land bank, no insurance of bank deposits or building and loan shares, no insurance of loans for building homes, no unemployment insurance, no social security. These and many other benefits now enjoyed were unknown and undreamed of when Landmark Lodge, No. 76, was organized.

It may be appropriate at this time to make a brief reference to some of the developments going on in these dangerous days as they relate to our city, our State, our Nation, and the world. In so doing, I am recognizing the fact that we, as Masons, are interested in broader fields than those pertaining to Masonic affairs alone.

As I am sure everyone in South Carolina is aware by now, the Atomic Energy Commission has anounced that it has selected this State as the home of its great new production plants to be designed, built, and operated by the du Pont Co.

This is important news, not only for South Carolina, but for our neighboring States and for the entire southeastern United States as well.

The construction of this vast new production facility on a 250,000-acre tract in Aiken and Barnwell Counties will make South Carolina one of the most important atomic energy centers in the United States—and, therefore, in the whole world.

What this will mean to South Carolina in future years—when at least part of the almost limitless potentialities of atomic energy have been fulfilled—can only be guessed at now. But it is nevertheess safe to say that we have been peculiarly fortunate in having been given this opportunity to play—at this very early stage in atomic energy development—so important a role in so vital and promising an enterprise.

What the new plants will mean to South Carolina in the more immediate future is somewhat easier to imagine. The magnitude of the building job to be done here can be visualized when one realizes that the Congress has already appropriated $260,000,000 to start construction at the new site. Just how much more will be spent on construction it is not possible to say right now, but I can assure you it will be considerable.

This building job—and the operational job that will come afterward—will mean new opportunities for employment and new opportunities for South Carolina businessmen. It is expected, for example, that at the end of 6 months 8,000 construction employees will already be on the job at the new site.

But aside from the obvious material benefits that will accrue from having this great production enterprise in our midst, I, as a South Carolinian—especially in these perilous times—am proud of the contribution our State has been given the chance to make, not only to the possible future well-being of our country, but to its defense as well.

It is, I believe, a well-accepted fact that the future realization of the potentialities of atomic energy for good will be at least partially governed by the activities to be carried on at the South Carolina plant of the Atomic Energy Commission, but—far more important than this—the very future of democracy and the American way of life may well also be at stake. For the materials to be made in that plant, while having a possible future peacetime application, can also be used in our defense—and perhaps decisively so—against the evil forces of tyranny and aggression now loose in the world.

This raises the question of just what it is that the Government plans to do in its new Savannah River plant. Secrecy of necessity in these times surrounds much of the work of the Atomic Energy Commission. It is partly because of this, I suppose, that some people have a misconception of what is to be manufactured in the new plant.

The new plant has been called a "hydrogen bomb" plant. Without violating any security provision, I can say that this definitely is not true. The new plant will not make bombs—either hydrogen or atomic. What the plant will do, like the great production plants at Oak Ridge, Tenn., and Hanford, Wash., will be to make atomic energy materials that can be used either for bombs or for peacetime power production purposes. The plant will be so designed that, if hydrogen bombs are proved to be feasible, it will also be able to make materials that can be used in them.

It is unfortunate but true that whenever a huge enterprise such as the new Savannah River plant is undertaken some people are bound to be inconvenienced or worse. There are, for example, some 1,500 families living in areas in Aiken and Barnwell Counties—many of whom have lived there all their lives, as did their fathers before them—who will have to move to make way for the production facilities.

I profoundly regret that this has to be done, but I can assure you that the Government will take every possible step to see to it that the lives of these people are disrupted as little as possible.

In this connection I would like to make clear to anyone who is directly involved that relatively few properties in the area will be affected in the immediate future. Almost all the townspeople and farmers who are not located in the zones designated as areas I and II in the maps publicized last week should not, according to present plans, be affected before the end of 1951 and should therefore go about their normal business, including the growing of crops.

Both the Atomic Energy Commission and the du Pont Co. have representatives here in the South. They are here to get the new project underway and to do it with the least possible disruption to the lives of the people living in this area and the least amount of confusion, delay, and frustration in the handling of people who wish to apply for employment or do business with the new project.

Among the Government agencies taking a leading role in the helping of people who must move because of the new site development is the Department of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture has had a representative in the vicinity of the new site now for a week or more, and he is setting up a system whereby people who live in the affected areas may receive information on other areas they might wish to move to and may have assistance in making applications for loans.

As an example of the type of assistance the Department of Agriculture is undertaking to give, I have been told that lists are being prepared of those persons who will have to be relocated and who will require assistance. These files will contain information on just what type of land and housing each person will need at his new location. As a corollary to this, the Department of Agriculture is also obtaining listing of places in Aiken and Barnwell counties and adjoining counties which are suitable for evacuated families to resettle in. Until announcements are made about these listings, people wishing information about the availability of homes and lands in adjoining areas may contact their local county agricultural agents. They have offices in the county seats.

I have also been assured that the people in the affected areas who normally handle farm loans have been alerted to give the most help possible to people who will be required to move because of the new atomic energy plant. The procedures for folks now living on the affected areas and who desire funds for the purchase of new lands elsewhere are these:

1. If the farmer has credit of substantial equity, he may apply for a loan for the purchase of new lands to the National Farm Loan Association office serving the territory in which he wishes to relocate. The name and address of this representative may be obtained from the Farmers Home Administration county supervisor in the county seat of the home county of the applicant.

2. If the farmer does not have credit of substantial equity, he should apply for a loan to the Farmers Home Administration county supervisor in the county in which he wishes to relocate. The county supervisors for Aiken and Barnwell Counties will know the names and addresses of the county supervisors in other counties.

The Department of Agriculture is also gearing its loan agencies to be of help to those people in the affected areas who may need to borrow funds for operating expenses during the moving period. People wishing to apply for loans for operating purposes may apply to the Production Credit Association or the Farmers Home Administration, or, of course, to their local banks. Information on loans from both the Production Credit Association or the Farmers Home Administration may be obtained from county supervisors.

There is one thing about this project right now that everyone should keep in mind and that is that this is a very early stage in its development. For example, it has not yet been decided what sort of facilities will be erected to house the construction workers on the reservation. The Atomic Energy Commission has made up its mind that it will not build a Government town for permanent employees such as Oak Ridge and Richland, Wash., and that is one of the reasons that the South Carolina site, where there are neighboring towns, was selected for the new plant. The Atomic Energy Commission as of now also does not know what concessions, if any, it will be necessary to award in the reservation area.

Because at present we are in a very early stage in the plant's development, it is important to guard against acting in a financial way upon rumors and erroneous reports. I have been assured by the Atomic Energy Commission that as new plans develop, the people in the affected areas will be kept advised. It is only common prudence, I believe, for everyone affected by these plans to obtain accurate and authentic information from the Atomic Energy Commission, the du Pont Co., or the Corps of Engineers before they take any kind of action that involves prices or property.

In addition to this information I have sent to every newspaper and every chamber of commerce in South Carolina an up-to-date list of the names of officers representing both the Atomic Energy Commission and the du Pont Co. In addition to listing each officer, his position and address, the list also provides other pertinent information concerning job applications, contracts, and subcontracts, concessions, land acquisition, and housing. This information will be corrected and brought up-to-date as frequently as possible.

I have taken some time to give you as much information as is presently available on this new plant. While we, as South Carolinians and Americans, are pleased to have this gigantic new industry in our State, we must at the same time pause and consider the urgency of this project. We must not overlook the basic need for which it is being constructed.

While we have every hope that the product of this plant may ultimately be used to further raise our standards of living in a peaceful world, the primary aim at the moment is to produce as quickly as possible an arsenal of superior weapons and matériel with which to protect ourselves against our enemies.

That is why we are finding ourselves confronted almost daily with more stringent controls of all kinds over our domestic economy in order to build plants such as this one. At the same time we maintain a constant flow of matériel and troops, it is necessary to divert many peacetime goods and services into military channels.

As chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, I sat with other members for almost endless days and nights when we considered and passed the Defense Production Act. This act is the basic legislation which provides the authority for complete mobilization of business and industry if it should be required.

Since the passage of the Defense Production Act, I have been elected chairman of the Joint Committee on Defense Production which was authorized in that act for the purpose of reviewing the use of the authority granted by the act. I have been in close touch with the administrators and department heads who are charged with administering the law.

Just before leaving Washington I held a conference with officials of the National Production Authority. I was anxious to learn more about their present thinking with particular reference to any changes in their present system of priorities and allocations. The NPA is currently operating on the basis of requirements of military need as advised by the Munitions Board.

You businessmen who deal with any goods which require any strategic materials, for instance, are aware that NPA has thus far controlled priorities and allocations on a system of across-the-board percentage cuts. Just for example, one of the more recent orders last week was a restriction on the use of aluminum for civilian production.

Beginning January 1, a manufacturer who uses aluminum will be allowed 80 percent of the amount he used during the base period of January 1 to July 1, 1950, for any products destined for civilian use. Now, beyond that restriction the use of his allotment of aluminum is left entirely to the manufacturer. If he wishes, he may use his entire supply for the manufacture of one item, or he may proportion his supply and continue to manufacture his entire line in a lesser quantity if he so desires.

Perhaps an even more dramatic example is the case of copper. We found very recently that copper was being used at a rate of 115 percent of the available supply. The additional 15 percent may be a little startling at first, but I think you can readily see that this excess could come only from stockpiles and inventories. The last order with reference to copper issued by NPA directed a 20-percent cut and made certain types of copper available only for military use. Now, there are two examples of the manner in which NPA is presently attempting to supply the needs of the military with the least possible disruption of our civilian requirements. Up until now this system has been adequate for the purposes of limited mobilization. We must realize, however, that in the event of an all-out mobilization drastic changes must necessarily be made.

In my opinion there can only be one solution. We will be forced to enter into a program of end-product limitation. Secretary Sawyer has told me that the people at NPA are already working on such plans so that they will be available at any moment should our military requirements dictate such action. Of course, after that the next logical step will be a controlled materials plan. In that event NPA will have the sole responsibility of doling out material for specifically approved products.

It was originally thought that it would not be possible to plan and administer a controlled material plan earlier than July 1, 1951. However, I have just been advised that because of this advance planning by the NPA staff, if it should become necessary the program could be put into effect by the end of the first quarter of next year.

I asked these officials if they had any primary goals or objectives. I was curious to know how they felt about administering the authority of the Defense Production Act. I was told that they have set their sights on three goals, and I was pleased, as I believe you will be, with the sincerity of purpose which they have set for themselves. They list their objectives in this order:

1. Assurance that the Military Establishment has available in the necessary amounts an adequate stockpile of materials in short supply. This would include such metals as nickel, steel, copper, zinc, chrome and cadmium and such nonmetals as benzine, rubber and soda ash.

2. Make sure there is an equitable distribution of the available supply of critical materials.

I was assured that this goal is intended primarily for the protection of the small-business man who all too often in the past has found himself either unable to obtain a just proportion of critical materials, or even unable to obtain any of the supplies he needs to continue in business.

3. Encourage increased productivity. This is nothing more than an effort to obtain greater production from existing labor and machinery. It would be the means by which we would greatly increase our existing production capacity.

I think these three goals could well be summed up by comparing the NPA to a switchman on the railroad. The switchman has orders to clear the track and give the right-of-way to a military train. His orders also direct him to feed the civilian train from the sidetrack into the main road as quickly as the military express has cleared his block.

Of course, it is impossible to tell you what demands will be made upon you as an individual or upon your business or even upon your family tomorrow or next week or next month. We can only take advantage of any time that we may have to lay our plans wisely and pray that they will never be needed.

In the maelstrom of confusion that now envelops the world, with peoples everywhere uncertain, apprehensive, and terror-stricken, the remedy, the way out, is no direct or well-marked path.

Your Government is dealing with powerful forces that it cannot accurately evaluate. We do not know their ultimate objective. We do not know to what extremes they will go to accomplish their designs.

Any sane person who has ever seen war close up wants no more of it, will use every effort and resource to avoid it. But the final decision is not in our hands.

For my part, I will use every honorable device to avoid a widespread war. There are hundreds of men and women in and out of the State and Federal Government who are striving as I am to keep the armed conflict from spreading. If these efforts meet with success, then the peoples of the earth can, without fear, face their immediate future with hope and confidence and employ their labor and talents for the betterment of all mankind.

I have already expressed my hope that South Carolina's atomic energy plant may soon be devoted to the production of this vast new force for the peacetime use of our scientists, our doctors, and our engineers. Rapid strides are being made in the development of this enormous new energy.

Last July it was reported to the Congress that American atomic energy production operations are proceeding at the highest rate in history, and production of the fissionable materials U-235 and plutonium—which in the long run determine the number of weapons that can be made—set a new record for the first 6 months of the year. This means that a general speed-up all along the processing line has been achieved and the Hanford and Oak Ridge plants are operating more efficiently.

We in South Carolina have now been given the opportunity of helping to swell this American atomic might even more.

I hope you share with me the confidence I have that in this vital field of atomic energy our country is growing steadily in readiness for whatever may come. I pray that the day may come when we may convert our atomic swords into atomic plowshares. But meanwhile I thank God we have the atomic swords with which to defend ourselves from the forces of atheism and darkness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, I know that you, sir, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] and all his old friends left in the House, will be glad to see this editorial which follows from the Odgensburg Journal in northern New York about our old friend, Bert Snell. I see Bert every few months in Potsdam. At 80 he is still hale and hearty, takes an active interest in the affairs of the country and reads the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD religiously. He has more or less retired from active business but keeps his office in Potsdam and whenever I can find him there I, naturally, seek his advice.

Many of you older Members have often inquired how he is. It has been difficult for me to tell him of all your messages so I now ask you all to salute a great statesman and a great American on his eightieth birthday.

Bert Snell became a Member of the House November 2, 1915. He was appointed a member of the House Rules Committee December 1917, and was made Chairman of Rules in January 1924. He succeeded John Garner as minority floor leader January 1932, and served as same during the Seventy-second, Seventy-third, Seventy-fourth, and Seventy-fifth Congresses.

The editorial follows:

THE NORTH COUNTRY HONORS BERT SNELL ON HIS EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY TODAY

Northern New York honors its most distinguished citizen today when Bertrand H. Snell is 80. In his lifespan Bert Snell has won distinction in public life and in many fields of business. His life is a monument to the fundamental, but now sadly neglected, virtues of ambition, hard work, imagination, and thrift. Most men would be content to have become a national figure in politics, and one of the three or four who ran the country, or to have built a successful lumbering, power, cheese, oil business, or engineering college. Bert Snell did all of these things.

He was born in Colton 80 years ago today. He graduated from Colton High School, and Potsdam State Normal School in 1889, from Amherst College in 1894. In Amherst at the same time were several young men who were destined to go far in later life. Among them were Calvin Coolidge, Dwight Morrow, Harlan Fisk Stone. Coolidge became President of the United States, Dwight Morrow a Morgan partner in his thirties and Ambassador to Mexico, Harlan Stone Chief Justice of the United States.

In the same year he graduated from Amherst Mr. Snell got a job as a bookkeeper with the Racquette River Paper Co. Eight years later he resigned as secretary and general manager of the company, and at that time sold his interests to George W. Sisson. He then entered the lumber business and organized the Canton Lumber Co., with which he was actively identified until 1908. In 1910 he purchased a power site at Higley Falls, on the Racquette River, where he spent 3 years in developing a hydro plant, one of the first water-power developments in the Northeast, and the only one owned and operated by one man. It was later leased to the Aluminum Co. of America to supply power to their Massena plant, and subsequently purchased by them. In 1907 Mr. Snell became associated with the Phenix Cheese Co. in New York City and was vice president until 1917, when he was elected president and general manager. He retired from the firm in 1925, when he sold his interest to the Kraft Cheese Co., and the company became Kraft-Phenix. He had built Phenix Cheese from a small company into one of the biggest in the world.

In 1915 Mr. Snell was elected to Congress after his historic battle against the late Maj. William Daniels, of Ogdensburg and Halbert Stevens, of Malone. He rose to be chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee, minority leader, and would have succeeded as Speaker of the House had he not retired in 1938. He was permanent chairman of the Republican national conventions which nominated Herbert Hoover and Alf Landon for President. For many years he was one of the three of four most powerful men in Washington and long dominated the Republican Party in New York State. He could have had the nomination for Vice President of the United States almost any time and could have been nominated for President if he had really wanted it.

He retired from Congress to devote his attention to his oil-producing business in Kansas which he built from nothing into a large and prosperous company and which he sold 3 years ago to Phillips Petroleum Co. Mr. Snell was always deeply interested in his home town of Potsdam and in Clarkson College and State Teachers College there. He was president of the board of trustees of Clarkson for many years, and now heads its finance committee. He gave Snell Field and $150,000 for Clarkson to buy the State teachers' college building. Always a builder, he was largely responsible for the growth and development of Clarkson from small beginnings into the important place it holds today among the engineering and business schools of the country.

Bert Snell has always been generous of his time and money to help his home town, and he had much to do with making Potsdam the beautiful small city it is today. He has always been a good citizen and a constructive builder for his community. Potsdam and all of northern New York can well honor today its son who has achieved so greatly and who has brought so much honor to this north country.

"United States Air Force Combat Cargo Wing Dropped Out of Air To Help Marines Escape From Changjin Reservoir Trap in Korea"—News Dispatch From First Marine Division at Koto, Korea

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, the war that is now taking place in Korea has proven beyond all doubt that each generation of American youth gives birth to its own heroes, men who give dramatic exhibitions of the bravery of American troops in battle action.

The Friday papers of December 7 carried one of the most thrilling stories of the rescue of United States marines from their encirclement by the Chinese Reds that has come to my notice in the entire Korean campaign.

Mr. Speaker, it was a news dispatch by Marguerite Higgins to the New York Herald Tribune. Miss Higgins, as you will recall, is the young lady newspaper correspondent who was dismissed from Korea some several months ago under the assumption that no woman could stand the vicissitudes of life under fire in the front lines. Dissenting from that opinion, General MacArthur, upon hearing of the order, countermanded it immediately.

This news article, headed With First Marine Division at Koto, discloses that Miss Higgins did not alone remain in Korea, but as of last Friday, was in the very midst of the fighting, working in and around the First Marine Division, which was then bearing the brunt of the bloody attack being leveled against our forces.

In describing her flight in the second seat of a fighter-bomber, several hours after the Marine spearheads had emerged from the mountains, Miss Higgins told of flying over the reservoir area where one could still see marines sitting on the strip at Hagaru:

The biggest battle ahead is to wrest the dam from the enemy and to hold the ground around it so that the engineers can lay the bridge brought in by the Air Force. Without the bridge—the marines would have to leave behind their vehicles and most of their heavy equipment.

The 8 spans of the 16-ton bridge—

Miss Higgins went on to say—were dropped to the embattled marines by eight Flying Boxcars of the Three Hundred and Fourteenth United States Air Force Combat Cargo Wing. This—was the world's first air drop of a bridge and was only one of the many fantastic feats marking the desperate effort to bring to safety the bruised remnants of the badly mauled leathernecks.

She said—

Mr. Speaker, I have heard no story coming out of Korea that could possibly thrill the imagination of the membership of this House quite as much as this story telling of how our American fliers had dropped an 8-span, 600-foot aluminum bridge capable of carrying the heaviest tanks and guns used by our troops.

Mr. Speaker, I would not be fair to myself, in paying homage to our great Air Force and our Marine Corps, if I did not tell of the fact that this tactical bridge equippage is of a type and construction designed by the United States Corps of Engineers, which corps, as the dispatch sketchily recited, laid it across the reservoir.

This action, to my mind, typifies the tremendous coordination and the complete unification of the armed services that has been brought about in these last 18 months, not alone in the administration but in the combat forces of our armed services.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, no man can say that it does not prove to the *n*th degree the splendid tactical support that has been afforded by the United States Air Force to all of our ground troops in Korea, our Army as well as to our Marine Corps.

Well, Mr. Speaker, at any rate, our marines got the bridge that was dropped to them by the Air Force fliers on Friday last and they got out of the trap, crossed the reservoir, and I am happy to note that today's papers tell of their arrival now at the Hamhung beachhead after their epic escape from Chinese encirclement.

Mr. Speaker, I wish every man and woman in these United States could read the thrilling news dispatch written by Marguerite Higgins of the New York Herald Tribune, and particularly do I hope that my every colleague in this House will read it. It is because of that fact that I now ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a news dispatch from Korea, reading as follows:

[From the Washington Post of December 8, 1950]

SIXTEEN-TON BRIDGE IS AIR-DROPPED TO HELP MARINES CUT WAY OUT

(By Marguerite Higgins)

WITH FIRST MARINE DIVISION AT KOTO, December 7.—Undaunted leathernecks today completed their escape from the Changjin Reservoir trap and broke a bloody trail through snowy mountain passes to Koto, nearly halfway to the coastal plain.

"It was bad," said Maj. Gen. Oliver P. Smith, division commander, "but not so bad as we expected."

Under an umbrella of fighter planes swooping and diving to protect the lead and tail of the 10-mile-long caravan, the marines, with tactics similar to those of the pioneers, fought their way into this bleak plateau city, streaming in from 5 this morning until 10 tonight. Here they joined other Marine and Army units with whom they will attempt the final plunge to the sea.

To help in this final escape through a wall of Chinese, the Air Force today dropped an entire treadway bridge. It will replace a dynamited span across a dam about 3 miles down the road—a dam still in enemy territory.

The world's first air drop of a bridge was only one of many fantastic feats marking the desperate efforts to bring to safety the bruised remnants of the badly mauled leathernecks.

Outstanding in the day's activities was the evacuation by fighter-bombers of the wounded from the tiny sod strip at Koto.

The strip is being lengthened by night by Marine bulldozers in hopes that twin-engine C-47's will be able to land Friday. But today Marine torpedo bombers, L-G's, and helicopters removed more than 250 wounded and frostbite cases.

Just as the Marine commanders had promised, the leathernecks came out of their fight as an organized unit bringing with them all important equipment, their wounded, their dead, and even a band of 200 Chinese prisoners of war. The enemy tried to block their path with a series of ambushes and roadblocks involving attacks with white phosphorus mortars, machineguns, and rifle fire.

Even as spearheads of the caravan reached Koto early this morning, the Fifth Marine Regiment still at the Hagaru plateau on the top of the Changjin Reservoir was fighting a stiff action to repulse Chinese attempts to annihilate the rearguard. The Chinese attacked at night and stabbed through outer defenses but were thrown back at dawn when air cover came.

Flying over the reservoir area at 9 a. m., one could still see marines on the strip at Hagaru setting afire surplus ammunition and exploding three wrecked airplanes. Flames shot into the sky, casting a bright haze over the unrelieved gray-black plateau that curves up into rugged snowy peaks.

Only 2 hours later with the marines a mile out of Hagaru, columns of Chinese had already moved in and could be seen from the air boldly rummaging through the ruins.

As a propaganda move the marines left behind in Hagaru nearly a hundred wounded Chinese prisoners of war whom they had provided with best medical equipment and care available.

"We are hoping," said Col. Ray Murray, of the Fifth Marines, "that this may induce the Chinese to treat our prisoners with increased kindness."

Hundreds of North Korean citizens of Hagaru packed up and came along with the marines, according to Col. Bankson L. Holcomb, Marine division intelligence chief. "They came up to us and actually asked us to burn their homes so the Chinese could not get them."

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

This correspondent flew to Koto in the second seat of a fighter-bomber several hours after marine spearheads had emerged from the mountains. Despite casualties which compared to the past week were moderate, morale had risen since I talked with marines at Hagaru.

"If we got this far," said First Lt. F. C. Trumble, of Los Angeles, "I know we can make the rest. At least, a hell of a lot of us can."

With an estimated Chinese division still facing them, the marines will consider themselves out of a trap when they reach Sangtongni, about 17 miles away, where the mountains end and the coastal plain begins.

Since leaving the reservoir the marines have covered yesterday and today approximately 10 miles of mountain roads.

The biggest battle ahead is to wrest the dam from the enemy and hold the high ground around it so the engineers can lay the bridge. Without the bridge, the marines would have to leave behind most of their vehicles and heavy equipment.

The eight spans of the 16-ton bridge were dropped to the embattled marines by eight flying boxcars of the Three Hundred and Fourteenth Combat Cargo Wing. They were directed to the drop zone by ground controllers. The marines reported that the spans were received in "good shape."

At Koto, where General Smith was on hand to direct proceedings, special warming tents were set up to thaw out the marines, most of whom had walked or ridden at least 12 hours in snow and ice. A bright noonday sun kept temperatures well above zero and as a result frostbite cases were fewer.

A fighter-bomber standing on its nose at the end of the runway was testimony to the hazards of the operation which the Marine fliers undertook today. Their flights from Koto to the coast took about 30 minutes per round trip.

When the last fighter-bomber, which holds nine wounded, took off at dusk, many loaded ambulances were still waiting on the fields. Capt. Alfred F. Caleb, Jr., of New Orleans, who himself flew 10 round trips, observed: "It was terrible to see the look of disappointment on the faces of the wounded when we said we could not make another trip today."

TWO HUNDRED CHINESE SURRENDER TO ENCIRCLED MARINES

WITH FIRST MARINE DIVISION, December 7.—The marines encircled on Hagaru Plateau were amazed 2 days ago when 200 Chinese walked in and surrendered for no apparent reason.

They explained that they were "tired of the war," their feet hurt, and they had not eaten for 3 to 5 days.

One came in barefooted with feet frozen solid like refrigerated meat. "Why did you let yourself get in that condition?" he was asked.

"Because," he answered, "I knew that after my feet froze I would no longer feel pain."

Address by Dr. Ruth M. Steese at Dedication of Soldiers' Monument, Mifflinburg, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 12 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address delivered by Dr. Ruth Miller Steese, past State president of the American Legion Auxiliary of Pennsylvania, and national chairman of the Committee on Historic Shrines of the Dames of the Loyal Legion of the United States. The address was delivered at the dedication of the Soldiers' Monument at Mifflinburg, Pa., on November 11, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"In remembrance of those who gave their lives and as a tribute in honor of those from Mifflinburg and vicinity who served in the Armed Forces of the United States during all wars."

To dedicate this memorial of stone, bearing those highly significant and thoroughly understandable words, permanently engraved in bronze, is an esteemed privilege on this very thought-provoking occasion.

The occasion and the time are alike deeply significant. Almost 175 years ago in this, our very own State, a small band of American patriots, dauntless, fearless, courageous young men, met in Philadelphia, wrote, signed, and adopted the Declaration of Independence, which became in reality the birth certificate of the United States of America. These men were businessmen and farmers, doctors and lawyers, all men who thought strongly and loved deeply those ideals which in time were to be captioned our peculiarly American ideals.

This particular group of men demonstrated a wisdom and a courage without equal in all history. They were neither evasive nor indecisive. There is absolutely no form of appeasement to be found in the Declaration. When these men, our founding fathers, signed this famous document they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and most important of all, their sacred honor, to the cause of American independence and freedom.

In the War for Independence which followed and which came as a direct result of the signing of the Declaration our forefathers fought for their dream for America. They were not interested in making these newly born United States of America into a mighty and great world power; they were never interested in her material wealth and success. But they were interested in her to the point that they were willing to fight for her freedom, for the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience. They were willing to fight for the preservation of that so well portrayed in the old Pilgrim theme:

"Ay, call it holy ground
The soil where first they trod.
They have left unstained what here they found—
Freedom to worship God."

The War for Independence was not a world war as we visualize them today, but it was a war with very definite international results for that war caused peoples everywhere to think in terms of liberty, equality, and democracy.

The signers of the Declaration of Independence, those immortal names which constitute America's first roll of honor, are long since dead, but their immortal words echo today just as strongly as they did 175 years ago. Let us listen to them once again:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The years passed, and less than 100 years ago, our Nation was torn asunder by the War Between the States. Brother was alined against brother, and the fate of this youthful Nation was at stake. Once again men rallied, this time to save the Union and the principles upon which it was founded. From that war with its horrors and its bitter lessons, came another challenge, another challenge equally applicable to us today, here in Mifflinburg—right now. For from that war with its sacrifices and casualties, came the necessity for the national cemetery at Gettysburg—and the words of the man of destiny, Abraham Lincoln, will echo down through the halls of time—

"We cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract.

"It is for us, the living—to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom."

Yes; the birth and preservation, and the rebirth of freedom, have ever been a challenge to those who went forth to fight and to give their lives.

Again, time passed on, and we entered World War I, whose conclusion we mark in a well-termed Armistice, today.

We entered that war, following the challenging message of our then war President, the late Woodrow Wilson, who in the House of Representatives, in April 1917, uttered those never-to-be-forgotten words:

"It is a fearful thing to lead this great, peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free.

"To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace that she has treasured. God helping her, she can do no other."

We ended that war with the armistice of 32 years ago, that war was to be the war to end all wars and make the world safe for democracy.

And again time marched on, and less than a quarter of a century later—within the memory of every one of us, we were involved once again. Why—because once again, we realized that every principle upon which we had been founded and for which we had fought in the past, had been jeopardized. We knew that liberty itself had been crucified, law had been overthrown, and the little peoples of the world had been enslaved, robbed, and murdered. Once again we fought for the inalienable rights of mankind.

And time marched on. What of today. What of the events of the last few months. Another world crisis, more deadly, more inhuman, and more uncivilized than ever before, is upon us under the name of the Korean crisis. No one can foresee the outcome. But we do know—and oh, how we know, that our very own boys, the sons and daughters of this community are serving, some within the territorial limits of the United States and some on foreign soil.

This brief outline of some of the ranking events of our national history serves to remind us of those to whom we refer when we silently and reverently read these significant words, "in remembrance of those who gave their lives and as a tribute in honor of those from Mifflinburg and vicinity who served in the Armed Forces of the United States during all wars."

"Those who gave—and those who served"—who is there except the Great Commander in Chief who can call the roll of all those who fought at Valley Forge and Bunker Hill? Where is the complete roster of those who struggled for days at Gettysburg? The honor rolls of Chateau-Thierry and the Argonne are alike incomplete, while the hills and the valleys, and the depths of the seas treasure the priceless but unmarked remains of the men and women of World War II. The story of Korea is the bloodiest page of our national history, and who is there among us who would not say that those, our men in Korea, those our very own men from Mifflinburg and vicinity in Japan and Korea, this very day, are there for one purpose—to help preserve the one Nation which is the hope and dream of the entire world—to help preserve for posterity, the inalienable rights of mankind.

On this day, November 11, 1950, when we here publicly dedicate this beautiful memorial—when we briefly review the past—when we thoughtfully and purposefully live the present—and as we look with wonder and hope into the future, we should do so with a personal feeling of the deepest responsibility. Today, when we quietly call the roll of the hundreds and the thousands of men and women who have answered the call and given their lives, when we consider the hundreds and the thousands who will have to answer a similar call in the future, let us remember this one fact—there is no call that the soldier hears, absolutely no call that he hears—that does not call as persistently and consistently to the civilian behind the lines, to the civilian back home who supplies the soldier's needs. Soldier and civilian have been cast together in the role of the defenders of this, our native land.

Let us on this Armistice Day, consider and ever remember that we, you and I, are the blood brothers of our American soldiers in Korea and on the various war fronts today.

It is always all too true, that it is the soldier who must always meet the challenge, it is he who must carry on, who must march on, and must fight on, if need be till he fall, and there is nothing that can match the resolute courage of our American soldier as he faces death in defense of this our country and her ideals, as he faces death for you and for me.

And yet, our American soldier was not born to this destiny; he was not ordained to this destiny. That soldier, fighting for you and for me, over there or here at home, is just the boy who lives next door, just the boy from our own home, just a typical, young American lad molded from typically American clay. He is not a superman. But if he is great—and thank God, so many thousands of them are, it is because he has been face to face with a great crisis—he has been face to face with a mighty challenge, and he, our American soldier, has met the test.

And so as we meet here today, we the representatives of Mifflinburg and vicinity, people representative of every way of life, let us quietly remember and consider that merely to honor those who have and will serve is not enough. What we need today, in this year of 1950, is the soldier's patriotism translated and transplanted into civilian patriotism and action. Someone has said that the noblest memorial to a hero is not reverence to his dead bones, but a reproduction of this heroism in a new generation.

Today, we see before us, this beautiful boulder taken from our very own mountains, with its bronze hewn from deep down in our own American earth, all planted into our own American soil, with the evergreens pointing to the heavens and telling the age-old story of life and of death, of death and of resurrection.

As we in this solemn service, dedicate this memorial, typical of the material wealth of America to the youth of America which has ever fought for the preservation of the idealism which is America, we should remember and ever consider that it must be for us, a day of consecration, of personal rededication to the greatest task remaining before us—a 1950 version of Abraham Lincoln's rebirth of freedom.

Today, as in the days of 1776, we can say with Thomas Paine:

"These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country, but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheaply, we esteem too lightly; it is dearness only that gives everything its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange, indeed, if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated."

Are we the summer soldier and the sunshine patriot, or do we face today and the future with the determination of the men and the women who have answered the call to service—who have gone forth to fight for us—and never to return.

I ask you to think on these things, as we now, seriously and solemnly, reverently and prayerfully, with an ever-present consciousness of the Divine presence, dedicate this beautiful boulder, with all its historic heritage, with all its prophetic significance, grounded in the very soil of America, lifting its head to the skies in the heaven, everlastingly, "in remembrance of those who gave their lives, and as a tribute in honor of those from Mifflinburg and vicinity who served in the Armed Forces of the United States during all wars."

Peiping's Expansionism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, December 12 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Peiping's Expansionism," which appeared in the New York Times of Friday, December 8.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEIPING'S EXPANSIONISM

In both words and deeds the Chinese Communist regime is showing a belligerent self-confidence. Its attitude toward the United Nations has been arrogant from the beginning. Its reaction to the British overtures in the matter of recognition has been little short of contemptuous. Its treatment of the United States has been frequently provocative. Coupled with those attitudes there is now the evidence of a program of very considerable expansionism. Communist China is pushing out—into Korea, into Tibet, against Indochina. Pressure positions are being set up whose impact will be felt in India, Burma, and Thailand.

Some of this expansionism, with its strong overtones of xenophobia, might possibly be ascribed to the more or less expectable explosive character of a new, or newly awakened, nationalism. But it is China's tragedy that the developed strength of this revolutionary China is being used at the direction of a foreign power. China is not expanding on behalf of a new China but on behalf of the Soviet Union. That course is as unhealthy for China as it is dangerous to the rest of the world.

It has several times been suggested that Communist China's expansionist ventures to the south may have been designed by the Russians as compensation for the northern and western areas of China that have been put under Russian control by the regime of Mao Tse-tung. This explanation is not adequate for the Korean venture. In the latter case the Chinese Communists are obviously taking a dangerous course of action whose benefits, if it is successful, will accrue to the Soviet Union and not to China.

What should not be lost sight of is the close ideological identification of Peiping with Moscow. The Russian leadership, the North Korean guerrillas and the Chinese Communist divisions are all part of the same force, and it is that force, not China, that is in explosive expansion. It will probably be proved to the Chinese, eventually, that on balance China has lost vastly more to Russia than she has gained from Russian help to the Communist regime. The Chinese Communist leaders will eventually go down in history as the men who sold out their country to the foreigners, in this case the Russians, rather than as those who rescued China from foreign imperialism.

Must Think of Ourselves

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, December 12 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, on December 6, 1950, there appeared in the Topeka Daily Capital an editorial entitled "Must Think of Ourselves."

Here is an editorial which analyzes bluntly and realistically the situation which we find ourselves in, not only in Korea, but in relationship with our allies.

The Topeka Daily Capital is owned by a distinguished former Senator from the State of Kansas, Arthur Capper; and it is most helpful to have the views of this great daily paper in the Midwest on this vital question which is troubling the minds and hearts of millions of Americans.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MUST THINK OF OURSELVES

Twice the United States has sent troops to Europe to save England from an enemy. It was argued on those occasions that this was actually in the interests of the United States, since if Britain had been conquered the United States would be next to fall.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

This may have been correct. No one knows. But what everyone does know is that saving the world for democracy was a goal never achieved.

The fortunes of the English-speaking nations are bound together, and unquestionably we have much to gain by keeping the British afloat. To an even larger extent, however, the British have everything to gain by supporting the United States.

Now we find ourselves at a point of conflict with the British on the vital issue of how to oppose communism effectively. With the British giving at least lip service within the UN, we sent troops into Korea to put down Red aggression. The British had pledged themselves within the UN, as had the United States, to protect free peoples everywhere in the world. In theory, so had more than 50 other nations.

However, each nation has its special problems and objectives. The small, virtually defenseless countries have had to aline themselves on one side or the other. Some have looked to the United States and Britain to supply the concentrated strength to fight off communism. Others have decided that the Reds in time will dominate the world, and they have allowed themselves to be included within the Communist orbit.

The intervention of the UN in Korea was hailed as a showing of UN determination to resist aggression, and it may have encouraged some wavering countries to believe that they would be protected if and when the Communists invaded their territories.

Back in those brave days when there was so much talk of the blue UN flag rising to take its stand against the Red banners, a great deal was said of international unity. But, it has developed since, it was to be a one-sided unity.

Many of our allies seemed perfectly willing to continue the battle against Communists in Korea as long as American troops were being used, with little help from other nations.

Now, the Chinese Communists threaten to annihilate or at least to push the UN forces completely out of Korea. And instead of rallying to the cause to which they dedicated themselves, the British and French and some of our other allies instead wish to settle by appeasement.

It is not clear whether the British wish to give the Chinese Communists everything they want, but it is apparent that they have something like a "peace at any price" program in view.

If the United States withdraws its forces to the thirty-eighth parallel as some of the appeasers have suggested, there is no assurance that the advancing Chinese Communists will stop at that line.

If the United States agrees to the admission of Red China into the United Nations, as the British and French ask, American prestige would be gone in the Pacific. Furthermore, Russia would have one more powerful ally in the United Nations set-up.

And if the United States allows the United Nations to dictate when and where the atom bomb shall be used—if it is to be used—this will be the final surrender on the part of this country to interests elsewhere.

Britain and France of course want the United States to fight for those countries in Europe, and to abandon the Pacific to the Communists. This would expose our own country to future attacks from the back door, by way of Japan, Formosa and the Philippines.

Perhaps it would be best to pull out of Korea. It would have been better if we had never gone into that country in the first place, since we received only light support from our allies.

But if the United States does withdraw, it should not be for the purpose of sending our troops and military supplies to Europe to assist allies who show a shocking unwillingness to help us.

If defense is a mutual enterprise, it should work both ways. If this system breaks down, the United States—for its own protection—would seem to have no other course but to defend itself and allow the Europeans to look after their own interests.

This may be isolationism, but the British and French and some of our other friends in Europe are attempting to isolate themselves from the problems of the Pacific—no matter what this may cost the United States.

It is hoped that our Government will not permit Mr. Attlee to dictate what shall be done and that, instead, our spokesmen including the President, will make it clear to him that the time has come to consider American interests.

While the American people hope to continue to cooperate with our allies for mutual benefit, the practice of placing American sacrifices first and American salvation second must be stopped.

If we can't work together, then we must work separately.

The War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 12 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "A Parent Speaks Out," published in the Idaho Daily Statesman, of Boise, Idaho.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PARENT SPEAKS OUT

We are taking the liberty in today's editorial column of printing a letter to the editor which we have just received. Ordinarily, we would have held it for publication in the regular Sunday section for that purpose, but there is in this letter, we believe, a great deal for statesman readers to consider without delay.

It was written by a Boise parent with a son in Korea. And that being the case, it is, we believe, remarkable for the tone of restraint in which it is written, and for the sensible analysis of a critical situation which it presents:

"It has been my unfortunate lot during the past several months to be in a state of mind which has caused me to observe keenly the unconcern, indifference, and apathy of the public in general relative to the conflict in Korea.

"It is saddening to realize this condition has prevailed in the National Capitol and in the minds of our leaders.

"Business and politics, both national and world-wide, have had priority.

"For five long months our boys in Korea have been fighting without rest, and over 31,000 casualties have been incurred.

"No thought has been given relative to procurement and supply to their commander of additional troops for reasonable and essential relief, nor for possible reserve.

"These boys have withstood tropical heat and now bitter cold, they are battle weary, their physical and mental condition is at a low ebb, they are trapped, harassed, and hopelessly outnumbered due to restrictions and handicaps imposed on their commander.

"There is no aid available for them from their own country, and they are through dire necessity to be left to their own pitifully inadequate resources to fight to an inevitable defeat, huge casualties and possible capture by the enemy with subsequent transportation to confinement and a living death.

"At long last the men in Washington have taken cognizance of the situation and are in process of talking, conferring, appropriating money and planning an all-out war, consummation of the same to be some time in the future.

"At-once action, however, must be delayed in a number of plans or projects pending approval of our moral supporters, fellow members of the United Nations, and after heedful consideration of the disapproval of Communist delegates.

"In the meanwhile time is fleeting, every minute, every hour means life and death to those in Korea.

"History records the fact that Nero fiddled while Rome burned; in a like manner inaction is the tempo in Washington, while our men are dying in Korea.

"I believe today that our men in Korea are to be sacrificed to attain the same results occasioned at Pearl Harbor, namely—a disaster so vast the Nation will be aroused and the too-little-too-late program of armed might will be approved unconditionally.

"The only known at-once aid available to our boys in Korea is the offer of Chinese Nationalist troops, which offer was spurned by the men in Washington.

"Troops of other allied nations are fighting in Korea, Nationalist China is a member of the United Nations, why their aid was refused is incomprehensible.

"If for fear of incurring the wrath of Red China and declaration of war therewith, that reason is now invalid.

"A request is made herewith to those reading this letter that they send at once telegrams to Washington, urging and demanding acceptance of the offer of Chinese Nationalists troops to be used at once in aid of our forces in Korea.

"This may not win the war, but would at least restore a part of the confidence of our boys in their home folks' efforts in their behalf, and revive in small measure their lost hope."

This letter, as printed, will go directly from The Statesman offices to the Idaho congressional delegation.

This Is It—Let's Face It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM M. COLMER
OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I submit herewith a most timely editorial from the Chronicle Star of my home town, Pascagoula, Miss.

This editorial reflects sound thinking and I recommend it for the consideration of the President and his advisers. The Congress gave the President powers for across-the-board controls at the last session. I hope that he will now use them without further delay. Otherwise, ruinous inflation faces us and will result in further playing into the hands of the Kremlin if we do not take immediate and drastic action to stop it. The editorial follows:

THIS IS IT—LET'S FACE IT

In pussy-footing around the issue of establishing domestic controls, the President and Congress are doing a disservice to the United States in what is probably the hour of its greatest peril.

At this point there is little use in rehashing and blaming. Mistakes have been made, both by the incumbent Congress and President, his advisers, and those that preceded them. Ever since the end of World War II we have been fighting a "cold" war. Last July it became a "hot" war when the Korean action opened. Call it a "police" action if you wish, but the casualty lists out of Korea stamp it "war" in our estimation.

We are fighting Russia and we know it. Perhaps we made a mistake when we went into Korea. Perhaps we didn't. History will answer that for future generations. The Russians would like nothing better than to involve us and the United Nations in a long, exhaustive struggle with the Chinese hordes that would bleed us white and make us ripe for plucking at a time of Russia's choosing. That, obviously, is the Communist plan.

In the United States we have largely been following a business-as-usual policy while the struggle on which our survival hinges mounted to the point where we are teetering in the edge of a third world conflict for which we are not ready.

We have the atom bomb, but not much else. We know also that Russia has it, but not in what quantities. But the fact that Russia does have it largely offsets our only equalizer.

In the present struggle lies not only the answer to whether or not there will be freedom in the world, but also whether or not we will survive as a nation.

Credit controls on the purchase of new automobiles, or the extension of rent controls for a 90-day period are not the answer.

We are in a struggle that will be long, bitter, costly, and bloody.

We think the American people largely realize that. We sometimes think Congress and the President don't. Bombast and hot air based on political prejudices do not help but actually damage the situation in denying and undermining unification of purpose.

Facing a bitter war for survival, we are actually having difficulty in passing an excess-profits tax to drain off war-swollen profits.

The only answer to the inflation we are witnessing, which is now almost at the runaway stage, is control of the domestic economy, as unpleasant as it may be—controls that will go all the way down the line. The steel industry grants a pay raise and then passes on to the public a price rise in steel that will return them threefold the amount paid in increased wages. On the strength of the steel raise automobile prices go up, refrigerators, washing machines, and every other item containing steel. Then, rightfully, comes the demand for more wages on the strength of the increased cost of living. It's a vicious spiral that has no end unless the brakes are applied through controls.

We are lagging on the home front, while the fires of war are mounting around us. We don't believe there is any justice in youngsters dying on a frozen Korean battlefield while we continue our business-as-usual policy and ride the wings of rampant inflation.

There will be more young men dying during the coming years. Their sacrifice can at least partly be matched on the home front. It is high time that the people, Congress, and the President take some steps in that direction.

Choose the Fortress America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, December 12 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, an editorial from the Topeka State Journal under date of December 4, entitled "Choose the Fortress America," appears to me to be most timely at this hour. I believe it will express the feelings of us all as we ponder the grave situation with which we are faced in the Korean war. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHOOSE THE FORTRESS AMERICA

Those persons in this country who are spoiling for world war III on a get-it-over-with basis seem to be saying there are only two possible choices. Either we choose war or appeasement, they say.

Don't be misled into that way of thinking. No sane person could want total war. No honorable person should consent to appeasement, which approximates moral surrender to the evil forces which threaten our lives.

There is a third choice which is neither war nor appeasement. We can choose to keep America strong, standing stoutly and immovably on our principles, making no deals and preserving here an island of liberty, a tower of strength, upon which the future may lean with hope in our survival. We should withdraw our forces from Asia and after that from Europe.

We have got to face the fact that it isn't what we might wish to do that counts most right now, but what we are able to do and keep on doing far into the long future. We have got to face the fact as a nation that we have neither the resources nor the manpower either to prop up or to fight the world. We should not play the sucker and we must not play God. We are not a master race and we are not invincible. War would not stop communism in other continents, any more than appeasement would stop it. Our choice then if we wish to keep liberty alive is to do just that—keep it alive. We should keep America too strong economically, militarily, and morally to be attacked and we should be contemptuous of all expedient bargains with communism or any ism. America must not commit suicide to please her enemies.

The get-it-over-with school of patriotism should consider the probable cost of any world war III in terms of the known cost of World War II, for the next should be more ruinous to both sides than the last.

Tallies made by international agencies, the American Government and university researchers show that in the last war 49,000,000 persons were under arms for the Allies, against 21,000,000 for the Axis. The total loss of life on both sides, civilian and military, was 22,000,000, with 34,000,000 wounded and unknown millions more crippled mentally or emotionally.

The cost of World War II in human terms was the greatest waste, but consider too the material cost. Over $1,116,000,000,000 were spent on this orgy of hate, resulting in the destruction of one tyranny only to pave the way for another which is worse. Property damaged or destroyed in World War II was valued at $231,000,000,000. The cost to the American people alone was $330,000,000,000. And it is now estimated that the cold war has cost the American people another $100,000,000,000 to date, with dozens of countries calling on us for more, more, more.

The get-it-over-with school is advocating that we kill our Nation. We would have to establish a tyranny in this country to wage any world war III to a military conclusion. We would have embraced in some form the same evil we set out to defeat. The process was begun in World War II and world war III would complete it.

Do you want that? Or as the lesser of the evils from which we are given as a nation to choose, will you choose a fortress America? The voice of the people must be raised in demand, and quickly, for they are being led straightway to doom.

Future Pacific Peace Tied to Fishing Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, during the negotiations of the terms of the Japanese peace treaty, the subject of the American Pacific fisheries should be an important matter for consideration. I am inserting herewith in the RECORD two excellent editorials dealing with this subject which recently appeared in the Seattle Times. They are as follows:

FUTURE PACIFIC PEACE TIED TO FISHING RIGHTS

Another strong plea for adequate protection of American Pacific fisheries resources has been made by Edward W. Allen, of Seattle, chairman of the International Fisheries Commission and an authority on international law. Speaking at the dedication of the University of Washington's new million-dollar fisheries center, Allen declared that in drafting a peace treaty with Japan the leading fishery nations of the North Pacific have an opportunity either to create international good will or to court trouble that will threaten the future peace of the nations bordering the Pacific Ocean.

If, as has again been proposed recently, the United States and its Pacific allies go ahead with plans for concluding a Japanese peace treaty without Russian obstruction, the question of the coastal fisheries on both sides of the ocean must be made a matter of specific provision in the covenant.

As Allen pointed out, the American and Canadian fisheries of this coast—sardine, herring, coastal tuna, halibut, salmon, and others—already are being utilized to the optimum degree, and in some instances more, by American and Canadian fishermen. Intrusion of the Japanese into any of these fisheries would offset agreements between the United States and Canada which now assure perpetuation of these resources against depletion.

On the other hand, the Japanese have their own coastal fisheries which are entitled to protection against foreign encroachment. The treaty, when it is drawn up, should guarantee the rights of Canada and the United States, and of Japan as well, to the fisheries of their respective coastal waters.

The present worsening of world international relations may make the question of an early treaty with Japan somewhat hypothetical. Yet it might serve useful purpose to expedite the treaty, to give Japan freer status, as an anti-Communist nation. In any case, the American State Department in its negotiations—whenever they begin—cannot afford to ignore the advice of the chairman of the International Fisheries Commission.

SETTLE IT NOW

Meeting in Seattle, the Pacific Fisheries Conference has gone on record emphatically favoring full guaranties to protect American Pacific fisheries when a treaty of peace is concluded with Japan. The conference asserts there is an element in the State Department "that seems eager to have this treaty signed without any reference to fishery limitations."

To omit such a provision from the treaty would be sheer folly. What better opportunity could be offered for reaching full agreement with Japan on this issue? Why wait until Japan, freed from its "unconditional surrender obligations," is in a position to haggle over a question which need not even be subjected to negotiation?

Japan is entitled to its own fishery resources; the United States and Canada to theirs. As the Pacific Fisheries Conference contends, the treaty should settle the matter once and for all.

Isolationism Lingers in Our Immigration Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement before the annual dinner of the Association of Immigration and Naturalization Lawyers, Hotel Pierre, New York City, Saturday, December 9, 1950:

ISOLATIONISM LINGERS IN OUR IMMIGRATION POLICY

Because the whole subject of immigration and naturalization has been of the most special kind of interest to me for as many years as I have been in Congress, I am particularly pleased with having been given this opportunity to talk to you. It is a great comfort for me to talk to a group like yours on this subject because I know I will not be talking into a vacuum and that I will not, consequently, be restricted to limitations placed on me necessarily by a lay audience.

I am convinced that the whole subject of immigration and naturalization must be approached through the broad fundamental concept that the free movement of people, just as the free movement of trade and the free movement of goods and capital, is the functional part of international relations. National legislation pertaining to immigration has been regarded always as an integral part of the rules of conduct indexing every nation's attitude toward international policy. This concept is even more applicable to our legislation since the United States has, since its birth, been regarded not only as a place of asylum and sanctuary for people seeking freedom, but also as the land of opportunity for those who were unable to find economic security in their native lands. No immigration problem can be properly approached until we understand that the opening or the closing of our doors to immigration is a reflection of this Nation's attitude toward world problems.

Our immigration policy has always been considered by the rest of the world as the most expressive indication of our readiness—or our unwillingness—to cooperate with the community of nations. Admitting the refugee, the destitute, and the valiant who came to our shores to search for new opportunities meant to the outside world that we were ready to cooperate. Closing our doors has always been interpreted by other nations to be another barricade behind which we retreat to isolation. Unless Congress takes cognizance of this fact all the efforts of the United States to win friends and influence nations must diminish to that extent. To be a leader in the United Nations and to pursue our present immigration policy is to play an irreconcilable and contradictory role.

Indicating through speeches and declarations that we are an integral part of the rapidly shrinking free world, and at the same time imposing new restrictions in the field of immigration, is sheer hypocrisy. If we want to cooperate and not isolate ourselves from the rest of the world, we have to realine our tariff policy; we have to encourage the free movement of capital; and we have to foster the free exchange of goods. And—by the same token—we cannot hamper, but we must encourage the free movement of people.

I have tried to sketch for you a few ideas in order to give you a picture of my basic point. I firmly believe that our immigration policy is intimately connected with and should be in line with our international policy. This, however, is not an avowal of an indiscriminate "open door policy"—a policy which would be completely unrealistic. Domestic problems of manpower, employment, production, consumption, and available space must, most certainly, be included in our approach to our immigration policy.

To leave these factors out of consideration would make no more sense than blinding one man to give another sight.

I do, however, advocate a sound national immigration policy consistent with and worthy of our position in the world. I cannot escape the fact that we are far from achieving such a policy. We are operating under two old and obsolete basic statutes, the acts of 1917 and 1924, upon which a shaky structure of amendments has been superimposed throughout the years. Both statutes, together with their amendments require most urgently a complete revision—not cosmetic surgery—but true rehabilitation.

That act of 1917 was enacted during the First World War. What prompted the legislators to curtail immigration and to provide for immigration quotas was the fear that destitute masses of population would want to leave war-ravaged Europe and swamp this country with millions of newcomers. Legislation based on fear is never good legislation.

The act of 1924 was enacted at a time when isolationism was riding high. It was enacted shortly after this country had refused to join the League of Nations created by Woodrow Wilson, and when it had turned its back on the problems of the world of which we are a part. Legislation based on blindness to reality is likewise never good legislation.

New conditions created by the Second World War have prompted more of us to plan and hope for immigration legislation in better keeping with this Nation's international participation. The antique acts of 1917 and 1924 are anachronisms. Instead of recognizing this, however, we keep moving in ever-constricting circles because once again we are being pushed backward by fear. I specifically refer to the eight sections—sections 22 through 30—of the Internal Security Act of 1950.

The eight sections of the act of September 23, 1950, are not only a classic example of the defects of hasty legislation passed in the confusion of the last hours of a congressional session, on the eve of an election. It is more than that, and it is worse than that. But, it is also an example of legislation that backfired.

In discussing these sections of the Internal Security Act, I wish to make it clearly understood that by no stretch of the imagination am I defending or apologizing for political ideologies which throughout the years have caused untold human suffering. In pointing out the unworkability of these sections, I am concerned primarily and exclusively with individuals as individuals and with the effects of these statutes upon the conduct of our foreign affairs.

You live with this new legislation and each one of you, I know, is familiar with the hardships and the inequities that they have set loose. They feed on human error and human fears. They feed on the helplessness of the young caught in Fascist and Nazi clutches. They affect the servicemen's German brides who in their youth belonged to Hitler youth organizations. They affect Italians who at the age of 10 were members of the Fascist youth organization. They affect German businessmen sent into Washington by the ECA because they were members of trade organizations affiliated with the Nazi Party. German immigrants are denied admission because with millions of other Germans they were collectively incorporated into the German labor front. Spaniards and Argentinians, without consideration for their individual worth, are being trapped in the net of these sections. In other words, the basic fallacy in these sections is the same kind of fallacy that is tearing the world apart today—the fallacy that people are not individuals but categories.

These sections define totalitarianism so very broadly that practically anyone who has ever been a citizen of any totalitarian country may run afoul on one or more of its provisions.

For instance, it forbids entry to persons who have distributed or disseminated totalitarian literature. That could exclude anyone who ever worked as a newsboy or as a bookstore messenger in Italy, Germany, Austria, or Spain. It might even subject to deportation an alien who had worked in any American public library, since the works of Josef Stalin and Adolf Hitler are included in the books circulated by them.

The departments charged with the enforcement of the new law have been placed in a truly unenviable position. On the one hand, should they show leniency, even in hardship cases, they could certainly expect criticism, alleging lax enforcement or even violation of the act. On the other hand, they are immediately put under pressure to admit certain persons because they are relatives of American citizens, or because they are famous artists, officials sent by friendly governments, or because they are imigrants who, having been granted immigration visas, have sold their belongings, liquidated their affairs, and have no place to which to return.

In this predicament many stop-gap decisions have been made, not all of them fortunate. As, for instance, the decision to admit temporarily persons applying for permanent residence, thus destroying their long-awaited visas or even destroying reentry permits duly issued to aliens returning to their unrelinquished domiciles in the United States.

It would certainly be preferable to base the interpretation of the excluding provisions of the Internal Security Act on existing judicial and administrative construction and rulings as they have accumulated through the years—unchallenged. I would like to draw your attention to the fact that excluding provisions of the act of 1917 and the act of October 16, 1918, were based on what both statutes defined as "membership in or affiliated with" certain organizations. Now, the new statute of September 23, 1950, in spelling out the names and enlarging the lists and the definitions of the proscribed organizations, has retained without change, the language "members of or affiliated with" such organizations. The preservation of this language was intentional, because the Congress did not want to destroy the existing jurisprudence.

I could refer you to a great number of decisions interpreting constructively membership and affiliation, but I am certain that you know most, if not all, of them. The basic thought underlying this jurisprudence is, briefly, that membership has to be voluntary, active, and effective and that affiliation has to occur knowingly, willingly, and voluntarily.

It appears to me that if the Congress wanted to eliminate from our midst the subversive element, the active advocates of totalitarian forms of government, it did not want to close our doors to those immigrants or visitors who, as children, had to wear fancy shirts of various colors or who, as adults, under threat of imprisonment, or of starvation, or of violent death, nominally joined the many auxiliaries of the totalitarian parties. The Congress wanted to close our doors to those who as Nazis or Fascists, actively, knowingly, and willingly helped in the perpetration of the most appalling crimes ever recorded in human history and who—if permitted to live among us—would undoubtedly spread the totalitarian poison of hatred and intolerance. In my opinion, and I repeat it once more, the Congress certainly wanted the administrators of the law to look at the record of the individual himself, and not to classify him automatically as the component part of an objectionable group.

But, the Communists who are singled out to be actually hurt by this new law have not been hurt at all.

The intelligent and sound interpretation of our 1917 and 1918 deportation laws, combined with the interpretations of the 1940 Smith Act has provided completely adequate bars for members of truly dangerous subversive groups. The spelling out of the name of the Communist Party in the new law did not change anything. Long ago our administrative regulations effectively construed the language of existing statutes and barred Communists from entering this country. Those who have entered it have done so surreptitiously, and they are, of course, liable to deportation. Energetic enforcement of the existing laws would certainly permit us to get rid of the undesirable element.

The enactment of this ill-advised and untimely bit of legislation dramatizes the need for the broader reform of our entire immigration system. I will not hesitate to call it an urgent and imperative need. The obsolescence of our statutes has become more obvious, and the step backward taken by Congress on September 23, 1950, makes the whole situation simply untenable.

I have, therefore, recently accelerated the work on a revised, comprehensive immigration and naturalization code. It is probably too early to impart to you all the details of this proposed legislation, but I would like to give you several salient points of our still incomplete draft.

Frankly, we do not intend to depart at this time from the principle of national origin and the quota system. Many of us would like to see some reconstructive work done in these two antique pillars of our immigration policy. But the existing realities, the necessity of lining up enough votes in Congress for the passage of such law, forced upon us the decision of deferring an attempt at a departure from these two basic principles.

However, within the framework of the principle of national origin and of the quota system, we intend to provide for as much selectivity as possible. We intend to provide for a special top priority, or preference, for aliens possessing certain skills. We intend to strengthen and to extend the principle of preservation of family units. We propose to grant nonquota status to alien spouses—and that means spouses of both sexes—of American citizens and to grant nonquota status to all alien children under 21 years of age, of American citizens.

This would include the Chinese children omitted in the act of 1946, which granted nonquota status to the Chinese wives of American citizens.

The existing discrimination against women will be removed. A female permanent resident would confer first preference status upon her husband just as such male resident confers it today.

Further, we want to correct the unfairness contained in section 4 (a) of the 1924 act which grants nonquota status to the wives of American citizens regardless of the date of marriage, but which grants such status to the husbands of American citizens only where marriage took place before January 1, 1948.

We also want to correct the unfair provision of section 12 (a) of the 1924 act which permits a wife accompanying her husband, to be charged to the quota of her husband if the quota of her own country of birth is exhausted and if her husband's quota would be more beneficial. This provision would be amended to grant the husband the same benefit if the quota to which he is chargeable is exhausted and his wife's quota is current.

Section 4 (d) of the same act grants nonquota status to the wife and minor unmarried children of an immigrant entering the United States as a minister of any religious denomination, or as a professor. This provision assumes that there are no women ministers and no women professors. Of course, it has to be amended so as to eliminate this discrimination.

We intend uniformly to define the term "minor child" as applicable to children under 21 years of age so as to correct certain misinterpretations stemming from the various State laws.

Of course, and I probably don't have to add this, we intend to incorporate into the proposed legislation the entire Judd bill repealing the remaining racial restrictions and providing for immigration quotas for Asian and Pacific people.

We intend to simplify the procedures under which aliens temporarily in the United States might have their status changed to that of permanent residents and we certainly intend to do away with the cumbersome "pre-examination" procedure and with the 24-hour duration trips to Canada or to Mexico.

Procedures governing the admission of visitors, businessmen, students, artists, and tourists, will be improved and by that I mean simplified. As far as possible, we want to revise the famous long questionnaires, which even the most desirable visitor has to fill out in many copies and on many occasions, before his passport is adorned with the consul's stamp and signature.

As you can see, this is quite a job cut out for us. I don't expect easy sailing with this project. I know, though reasonable as many of the proposals will be, the opposition will be strong and perhaps at times bitter. But the job must be done, and nobody understands that as well as you do.

I want you to know how much I have appreciated your help in the past and that I know I can look forward in the future to your usual intelligent and constructive appraisal of the forthcoming immigration work in Congress.

The Truman Excess-Profits Tax an Economic Blunder

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, two articles, one by David Lawrence and the other by Samuel W. Bell, appeared in the New York Herald Tribune December 12, 1950, each referring to the proposed excess-profits tax. It is evident from these articles that the defects and snags in the Truman proposal are becoming more and more obvious to the legislators in both branches of the Congress.

Under leave to extend, heretofore granted, I am inserting these articles in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my remarks:

BUSINESS URGES STRAIGHT RISE IN TAXES UPON CORPORATIONS

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON, December 11.—American businessmen are urging higher taxes as a means of paying for the rising costs of defense, but they want straight increases in corporation taxes instead of excess-profits taxes.

This is because the increase in corporation taxes will bring in more revenue to the Government and will be more equitable to all kinds of business.

The excess-profits tax, on the other hand, will not affect adversely a great number of corporations with a large amount of invested capital or with a high average of earnings in the base years from 1946 through 1949. The principal reason why some of the larger companies, too, prefer a straight increase in corporation taxes is because of the complicated procedures under the excess-profits taxes, which make them difficult for the taxpayer to calculate, producing litigation, and expensive for the Government to administer.

MIDDLE-SIZED BUSINESS

The major part of the opposition to the excess-profits-tax legislation, however, is coming from middle-sized businesses. These are the businesses which make up the greater part of the membership of such organizations as the National Association of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce. Thus, W. Stuart Symington, chairman of the National Security Resources Board, in a copyrighted interview in United States News and World Report recently said:

"I went out recently to talk before the National Association of Manufacturers. That's a good organization and it's a lot different from what it was years ago. Over 53 percent of their current membership employ less than 100 people; and over 84 percent employ less than 500 people—and 500 is considered a definition of small business. Their president has some 200 production workers up in Keene, N. H. I was much impressed with that aspect of the change in NAM."

The definition of small business at 500 employees is a significant one. Most people think of small business as the filling stations or small retail stores with a few employees. But middle-sized business is the backbone of the American competitive system. It is the middle-sized business which is trying to compete with the so-called "oligopolies," as Chairman CELLER of the House Judiciary Committee calls the leading three or four companies in an industry.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

There are only a few hundred of these leaders even if all the industries are totaled up. Certainly the bulk of the membership of both the United States Chamber of Commerce or the National Association of Manufacturers, running into many thousands, is middle-sized or small business. Yet the demagogs who are anxious to bring about a system of state socialism in America and who are doing everything they can to undermine the American competitive system by encouraging concentration of business in a few companies, charge any groups of business as big business and use terms such as "selfishness' and "greed" to upbraid all groups which oppose fair and inequitable systems of taxation.

The excess-profits tax is a benefit to a special group. It is a special privilege, because it permits the more successful companies—the leading ones in each industry—to pay a lower rate for every thousand dollars earned than do the less successful businesses.

LOBBIES FOR PROFITS TAX

The excess-profits tax would not have any standing in Congress at all except for the drive put on by the labor organizations and their lobbies here. The idea back of the drive was to get the excess-profits tax passed so that the larger businesses especially would reduce their resistance to wage increases. During the last few weeks these same labor organizations have cried out against price increases and have called for rollbacks of prices but not a single labor union has called for a rollback of the big increases in wage scales given since the Korean crisis began.

Wage and price stabilization by the Government have been overdue since last summer, and if the excess-profits-tax law is passed, the controls should become effective immediately as one means of offsetting the inflationary pressures that will ensue. The labor groups have already gotten theirs, so there is little danger of a rollback. The new wage and price stabilization agency will, of course, be empowered to take care of wage inequities, which is but another name for wage increases.

The excess-profits tax passed by the House will do far more damage to small as well as middle-sized business than any of the previous wartime laws, because the provisions are far more inequitable and damaging to competitive enterprise.

SENATORS HIT SNAG IN EXCESS-PROFITS DRAFT—COMMITTEE HOLDS A SECRET SESSION, GETS NOWHERE IN REVISING HOUSE BILL

(By Samuel W. Bell)

WASHINGTON, December 11.—The Senate Finance Committee, meeting behind closed doors, ran into a snag today in its first attempt to frame an excess-profits-tax bill on the basis of the $3,000,000,000 measure recently passed by the House.

President Truman, in his recommendations to the lame-duck session of the Eighty-first Congress, asked for excess-profits taxes estimated to yield at least $4,000,000,000 in the first year, retroactive to July 1.

The Finance Committee, whose members are on record in favor of enactment of an excess-profits tax at this session, held its first executive meeting after a week of hearings.

Except for the labor spokesmen, all the witnesses appearing before the committee, representing business and industry, opposed an excess-profits tax. If the Government really needs revenue for national defense, they argued, it should resort to an additional increase in the regular corporation-income tax. This, they added, would provide more revenue and impose less handicaps on industrial expansion.

Senator EUGENE D. MILLIKIN, of Colorado, ranking Republican member of the committee, who is pledged to the enactment of an excess-profits tax before the present Congress dies January 3, acknowledged that the committee faced a difficult job.

"However, we hope to complete a bill by the end of this week," he said, after a 3-hour session of the committee.

Senator WALTER F. GEORGE, Democrat, of Georgia, committee chairman, announced there was "nothing to report" after today's adjournment of the committee's secret session.

Death Knocks on Freedom's Door

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, when crisis mounts on crisis and tragedy stalks our forces around the world, the "man in the street" at home is conscious of our peril if the leaders of Government are not. I have received a letter from a constituent, Mr. William Roy Johnston, of the Danville Metal Stamping Co., Inc., Danville, Ill., expressing the grave concern of the people at home over the danger of drifting toward the abyss of world war III.

Mr. Johnston encloses some clippings of pertinent articles taken from the daily press reports in the Danville Commercial-News and a reprint of a timely editorial from the Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial-Appeal. Groping as we all are for a path of strength, he urges that these articles be brought to the attention of every Member of the Congress. Under permission granted by the House of Representatives, I am including them in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They are:

LEGION CHIEF WARNS UNITED STATES COULD LOSE

HERRIN.—National American Legion Commander Erle Cocke, Jr., said Sunday the atomic bomb should be a military weapon and not a diplomatic weapon.

Cocke told the fourteenth annual session of the Egyptian Past Commanders' Club that MacArthur should be empowered to use the bomb when a military target presents itself. Neither diplomatic nor humanitarian aspects should stand in the way of its use, he said.

America should realize that war is a matter of survival and "it's extremely possible we could lose," Cocke said.

He urged clear thinking in the present crisis, asserting "the Russians have cataloged the American people well; the greatest dangers we have to face are fright, fear, panic and shock."

ATTLEE LIKELY TO ASK TRUMAN TO TURN BACK ON MACARTHUR

(By Lyle C. Wilson)

WASHINGTON.—It is not likely that Prime Minister Clement Attlee will be able to avoid asking President Truman to turn his back on Gen. Douglas MacArthur. He represents not only the United Kingdom but unofficially all of Western Europe and free Germany as well.

MacArthur is neither hero nor superman to Western Europeans. Many of them already regard him as an architect of disaster.

Western Europe wants an end to the Korean War one way or another—but an end to it. They fear American and United Nations strength diverted there in prolonged fighting would expose Europe to easy Communist conquest.

The British Government and large elements of the British people have become distrustful of American Far Eastern policy and of MacArthur's leadership in Korea.

MacArthur and the leaders of Western Europe are poles apart. President Truman is on the spot if not in the middle. MacArthur's position is clear. Of Europe's go-slow demands in Korea, he said in a message to Hugh Baillie, president of the United Press:

"If the fight is not waged with courage and invincible determination to meet the challenge here (in Asia) it will indeed be fought and possibly lost on the battlefields of Europe.

"Any breach of freedom in the East carries with it a sinister threat to freedom in the West."

Last August he prepared but suppressed at Mr. Truman's request an even more emphatic statement of Far Eastern strategy. It said in part:

"Nothing could be more falacious than the threadbare argument (of) those who advocate appeasement and defeatism in the Pacific."

Neither Attlee nor his friends in Western Europe would agree that they advocate either defeatism or appeasement. But by MacArthur's widely proclaimed standards their ideas would represent a tremendous retreat from what the general calls invincible determination to meet the Communist challenge.

Mr. Truman must make the ultimate decision on what American policy shall be. But the United Nations has first chance to say how the democratic world shall react to the entirely new war in Korea.

[From the Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial-Appeal as reprinted on the editorial page of the Dansville (Ill.) Commercial-News]

DEATH KNOCKS ON FREEDOM'S DOOR

When General MacArthur was winning in Korea he was the Western World's hero. Today he is a bum to some of those who yesterday were praising him.

When the United States intervened against Communist aggression in South Korea, the anti-Communist world lauded it for its high idealism and courage. Wordily was it acclaimed as the great white hope for peace. But that was June and love was in the air.

This is December and Red China is pouring her faceless hordes across the Yalu from the frozen plains and hills of Manchuria. And chill is over everything.

The frost reaches into the stilled heart of the American riflemen—dead where a Communist bullet left him.

And the chill of the great Red fear has reached to the hearts of those who have been claiming our friendship, our largesse and our support.

So have we come to a time of grim and terrible counting.

The United States is at war with communism's geopolitical heart—Russia. If it is not so officially it is so in fact and it is war to the death. There is no middle ground. There can be no appeasement. There is no turning back.

Those who are not with us are against us. And those who have said they were with us have done too little, in civilization's behalf. For it is civilization's survival not merely our freedom, which is at stake.

There was hardly a major newspaper in Britain which failed to editorially lambaste MacArthur. That from them.

There isn't a so-called ally in the United Nations which will stand up and in the great anger of righteousness, say to the Chinese Red delegates, "This is enough. Get out."

History records no greater obscenity than this spectacle of Red Chinese accusing the United States of aggression.

Meanwhile the Red hordes roll on and United Nations forces—such as they are—fall back and back.

They may have to leave Korea—if they can. "Ah," say the foolish ones, "they can't do that; we can't lose face."

Lose what? You don't lose what you've already lost.

If only withdrawal can save those troops, then withdrawal it must be that an end can be put to this terrible tragedy.

Or we can, through strategic bombing, lay waste to every city and community in Manchuria—or make desolate the great centers of China proper.

Atom bomb or fire bomb. What does it matter if this scorching must be done? And it should be done if that will save American soldiers now trapped before the Red juggernaut.

For our allies—Britain, France, and the rest—let them put up or shut up. And "put up" means troops in force rather than token forces—a battalion here—a skeleton brigade there. The situation needs divisions—needs them more desperately even than the laggards say they need our dollars.

So Western Europe is still the focal point for potential Russian assault. That's what the chancelories of Europe are saying.

They would let freedom die in Korea. And with it 125,000 American fighting men.

Let them think again. There could be such a thing as giving top defense priority to Western Hemisphere security.

Because there could be direct attack here across the roof of the world.

While the sands of western civilization's era run out, there is continued dalliance in Washington—gross ineptness, if not worse, in the State Department, supineness of leadership in the White House and lack of mobilization administrative experience in the Defense Department.

The debacle in Korea is still a "police action," according to the White House mind to which everything else bureaucratic, military and civilian, is geared.

Small minds, indeed, plot the future in this most dangerous of all American hours.

Perhaps a greater confidence—a greater cooperation—would have been inspired among our allies had Washington made it plain that it would muster all which is potential American might and use it if necessary to maintain Western prestige and position in the Orient.

But it didn't. The appeasing and timid minds prevailed and now come the Red harvest of indecision—of too little—too late.

And the clock ticks on.

And death knocks on freedom's door.

United States Stands Alone

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, many of my constituents have sent me letters and some of them have enclosed the editorial which is entitled "America Stands Alone" and which reads as follows:

United States Forces—feebly supported by demoralized South Koreans and mere token brigades from UN powers—are fighting desperately to avert complete defeat and disaster against an overwhelming number of Chinese Communists.

What was believed to be a victory march into North Korea turned out to be a deadly trap in which uncounted thousands of Americans were caught. The fate of many of them is still in doubt.

General MacArthur, who about a week ago, was exuding confidence and optimism, leading the American people to believe the war in Korea was all over but the shouting, could voice little optimism at the week end.

We are fighting an undeclared war with Communist China, MacArthur told press correspondents, and our divisions are outnumbered by seven to one.

What the enemy may lack in fire power—and they don't lack for much—they have made up for in such masses of expendable troops that their drive has been irresistible.

Our adventure in Korea, so blithely undertaken, has become an American tragedy.

President Truman ordered American troops to meet the North Korean Reds and secure South Korea from Communist conquest, in the name of the United Nations. It was described as a United Nations police action, and was approved by the UN. That was about as far as the UN went, however. It has backed up our effort with words, but with neither men nor material in sufficient strength to be of any effectiveness.

Why are our forces in Korea outnumbered seven to one? Why does ignominious defeat and the prospect of all-out war with China and Russia confront us? Because our so-called allies in the United Nations betrayed America and betrayed the Organization dedicated to preventing aggression and maintaining peace.

American boys are dying, freezing, and undergoing torture in Korea because the nations sworn to take united action against the aggressor have broken their pledge and deserted.

In the hour of greatest peril to the survival of freedom in the world, the so-called United Nations have washed out on their obligations. Their failure to act constitutes confession of moral and physical cowardice of the worst order.

That is why the Americans have been overwhelmed.

The other United Nations countries could, if they had been willing to stand by their word of honor, evened the scales against the Communists. Instead, they prefer to let Americans die while they utter monotonous platitudes.

Prime Minister Attlee has flown to Washington to confer on the Korean crisis. More words; more subterfuge. Mr. Attlee will counsel moderation and forbearance. He will counsel appeasement—anything to save Britain's skin and particularly the rich crown colony of Hong Kong.

We may have no choice but appeasement, because we are alone in the world, surrounded by outright enemies or faithless friends.

We should get out of Korea and forget Asia. We should let the Asiatics write their own ticket to Hades, if that is what they want. We should let Britain worry about Hong Kong and the French save themselves, if they can, in Indochina.

It's time to abandon the role of the Great White Father to all the world. Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson may glory in that role, but the people do not. It never has got us anything in the way of friendship or help in time of need, and never will.

If it is to be that America must come to grips with the arch-conspirator of communism—Soviet Russia, then let's conserve our strength for the real test of survival and choose the battleground. The whole Korean affair has been a Stalin booby trap from the very beginning. Moscow calls the tune and we dance. It ought to be the other way 'round.

Jewish War Veterans' Challenge to the Kremlin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY J. LATHAM
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following statement by Henry Albert, national commander of the Jewish War Veterans of the U. S. A., who is one of the distinguished leading citizens of my home county of Queens, New York:

JEWISH WAR VETERANS OF THE U. S. A.
Hon. WARREN R. AUSTIN,
Chief of the United States Mission to the United Nations, New York, N. Y.

DEAR AMBASSADOR AUSTIN: We address ourselves to you on behalf of the more than 100,000 members of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America.

Our organization was formed 55 years ago by American veterans of the Jewish faith who served in the War Between the States. Like our fellow American veterans of all faiths, we hold war in utter abhorrence. That is why our organization reposed its prayers and its hopes in the formation of the United Nations organization and has observed with great pride our country's leadership in continuing efforts to establish a just and lasting peace.

We share with our delegation to the United Nations the deep-seated conviction that genuine peace and security for the humble people of the world cannot be bought with the false coin of appeasement. Thus, we have witnessed with sympathy the patient efforts of our United Nations delegation to convey to the representatives of the Soviet Union the truth about our country's policies and objectives. With deepening dismay, we have seen each fresh attempt at reasoned explanation countered by a renewed vilification of our country's motives and repeated charges of aggressive intent by what the Soviet representatives have been describing as "the ruling circles of the United States."

Sir, it is this characterization that has impelled us to write to you. We construe it to apply to those who speak and act for our country in its relation with the rest of the world. In the United States such powers are delegated. They cannot be seized; they can only be conferred by an electorate which alone has the right to determine who shall speak and act for the United States and how these powers shall be exercised.

The Soviet representatives know this to be the truth, just as they know that access to this truth has been denied to the ordinary citizens of their country. They must therefore know full well that when they impute aggressive intentions to "the ruling circles of the United States", they draw an indictment against millions of Americans.

Among these, the Soviet representatives must know, are 14,000,000 American veterans of the Second World War. The blood of hundreds of thousands and the toil of uncounted millions more of the American people was given freely to hasten the liberation of mankind from the terrible yoke of Nazi and Fascist oppression.

This, too, is a fact that is being denied the ordinary citizens of the Soviet Union. It is being denied, as well, to the people of China, who, together with the people of the Soviet Union were, not so long ago, the grateful beneficiaries of these sacrifices.

How, then, can the representatives of the Soviet Union justify the denial of these truths in a world which desperately needs to summon up again the spirit and will for mutual respect and dependence that saw the freedom-loving nations through the dark hours of the Second World War?

We ask this question of the Soviet Union representatives: What motives impel the ruling circle of the Soviet Union to reiterate the falsehood that those who were the devoted friends and allies of the Russian people yesterday are their enemies today? What is the meaning of this vast and monstrous insemination of hatred if not to engender a blind will to destroy those whom the Russian people are not permitted to know or understand? What other conclusions can be drawn but that the instrument of the program, which has been used to liquidate all who dared to harbor independent thought or private faith is now being applied on a world scale?

The ruling circle of the Soviet Union deludes itself and cruelly deceives the Russian people if it counts on bogus peace petitions to veil Soviet aggression from the gaze of the millions of people who have come to recognize the relationship between the Russian dove and the Trojan horse.

This relationship is becoming plainer each day in direct proportion to the mounting aggression of international communism.

Like the camarilla of Nazis and Fascists who dreamed of world dominion, the ruling circle of the Soviet Union overestimates the number and worth of those who are ready to betray the free democracies. For the traitors are being rooted out and their betrayals are being dealt with by free courts.

We who address ourselves, through you, to the representatives of the Soviet Union include descendants of men who fled Czarist Russia to escape the genocidal fury of the pogroms.

We say to the Soviet representatives:

In the 30 years of your rule you have demonstrated by abundant example that only in America, and in democracies like America, can those who once knew tyranny and oppression look for a future of freedom and justice. Man's hope for a secure and peaceful world remains in the hands of the free nations.

This we believe, and we challenge the representatives of the Soviet Union to make known to the ordinary citizens of their country our conviction that only the leaders of the Soviet Union stand in the way of security and freedom for all mankind.

Kudzu, Cooperation, and Know-How in Clay County, Ala.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM HOBBS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, kudzu has been truly called the foot-a-day vine. It really grows, under favorable conditions, a foot a day, after it gets its start. Its crowns or joints that are clipped and used for planting, and the vines and other crowns which come in them at regular intervals have been found to be one of the best water storage systems and natural dams for soil-erosion prevention. Gullies that once were torrents after every heavy rain, taking off the top soil, have been filled and the torrents completely stopped. The roadside drainage ditches that used to be considered essential have been largely abandoned in fields that are covered with kudzu and the drainage becomes adequately provided by the thirsty kudzu vines as the rain water is turned onto the land instead of off it into ditches. Corn has been successfully planted in fields along with kudzu. The kudzu kills off the grass or weeds which might otherwise take away sustenance from the corn, and stores dew and rain and shades the roots of the corn stalks, increasing the size and productivity of the stalk.

From the time the demonstration area of 50,000 acres was established in 1935 by the Soil Conservation Service under the leadership of Carl Morgan, soil conversationist, the cooperation of the Civilian Conservation Corps, the county farm demonstration agent and Extension Service all through the years has been excellent and the vast majority of the farms in Clay County have been sold on the benefits of scientific agriculture. Having seen the transformation of the landscape of Clay County from a picture of bare red clay hills and gullies to young forests, verdant pastures, improved row crops, and thousands of acres of kudzu at work wiping out gullies and killing erosion, I asked George M. Burns, expert of the Soil Conservation Service, affectionately nicknamed "Kudzu" Burns, to write an article giving the high lights of the history of Clay County agriculturally during the time he has lived there. He has very graciously done so and it is my pleasure to extend these introductory remarks by including the article he has written. I only wish that it were possible to include the pictures he sent with his article; and that every Member of the Congress could see the luxuriant growth of kudzu on the banks of the driveway from Connecticut Avenue down to the Kennedy-Warren garage, right here in Washington, which appears dead now, of course, but which will come to life with the spring.

The article follows:

(By George M. Burns, Soil Conservation Service, Ashland, Ala.)

I have watched a farming miracle unfold in Clay County, Ala., during the last 22 years. Land that was dying 22 years ago is restored to productive health. Its proper use and treatment provide income from several crops and farm products instead of one. Our people are living better. Our children have better schools and a chance to attend full time. We have much more money in our two banks.

These changes resulted from the sweat and toil of farm people and the down-to-earth help of paid agricultural workers. We had the support of businessmen, bankers, school people, civic club members, county officers, and others.

In my mind, three dates mark milestones in these changes.

The first date is 1928, when the Lineville State demonstration farm was started. There I came face to face with the same hard row that Clay County farmers were hoeing. On this farm our hill land had been whipped with cotton, and was washed and gullied. Bottom land was wet and overgrown with alders and willows.

The second date is 1935. That year a Soil Conservation Service CCC camp was opened at Ashland. It was named Camp Hobbs, in honor of Congressman SAM HOBBS who always has been and still is extremely interested in soil and water conservation because it helps people on and off the land.

The third date is 1939. Farmers that year organized the Piedmont Soil Conservation District and took over responsibility for their own conservation program. Clay County is one of five counties in this district.

My part in this work has been as manager of the demonstration farm for 7 years, as a conservation farm planner in the CCC camp, and, since the district was formed, as work unit conservationist for the Soil Conservation Service in the Clay County part of the district.

All through the years we have had wonderful teamwork by agricultural agencies. Our county agricultural workers council meets once a month to study what we need to do during the next month or so to help farm people. Then we work together to do it.

You will know how far we've advanced when I tell you where we stood a few years ago.

When I went to Clay County in 1928, we were growing cotton on about 32,000 acres. We know now that most of that cotton was on land too steep or too poor or too badly eroded for row crops. As our land washed away under cotton, we put more of it under mortgage in order to live. Every year we had to back off from more land because the gullies got too big to cross. You know what all that meant to farm families, and to merchants in Ashland and Lineville.

By 1935 we had made the demonstration farm a model of the best land use and conservation we knew at that time. The cropland was terraced and in a high state of cultivation. The bottom land was cleared, fenced, and in a good pasture sod. The farm had about $4,000 in the bank.

Few changes had been made on other farms in the county. We had State money to terrace the demonstration farm, for clearing, for fencing, for fertilizer, for lime, and for seed. Other farmers didn't.

The cotton acreage had dropped from 32,000 acres to about 18,000 by 1935. Erosion, low prices, and acreage controls were mostly responsible for that.

Our two banks had $478,287 on deposit in 1935, and $348,327 on loan.

Our public schools had terms of 6 or 7 months, instead of 9 months. That's all we had money for. Every school had a recess of about a month to let the children pick cotton.

Our farms had no improved pasture. It was considered a waste of money to put fertilizer on pasture.

We had no perennial hay crops. I suppose every farmer pulled corn fodder to feed his work stock and cut a little tops or hay for his milk cow. Any man who failed to pull fodder would have been considered shiftless by his neighbors.

Without pasture and perennial hay, we had little or no income from livestock.

Those were lean times.

All of us are proud of what we have in Clay County in 1950. Of course we know that we still have a long way to go before every acre is used properly and given the conservation treatment it needs.

Our farmers planted only 4,050 acres of cotton this year. That's less than one-fourth of the 1935 acreage. Yet, our 1950 cotton allotment was 9,335 acres. Most of the crop this year is on land suited to cotton.

Our two banks have $3,304,569 on deposit, and $903,689 on loan. We now have nearly $7 on deposit for every $1 in the bank in 1935. Our bankers are lending money with livestock as collateral now.

Every public school has a 9-month term. County Superintendent M. G. Satterfield told me the other day that he saw no reason for any county school to turn out for cotton picking this fall. Last year, some of the schools turned out a half day every day for about a month.

I know of 14 rural churches that have been rebuilt in the last few years, and of at least 10 that have been remodeled or improved.

We have about 10,000 acres of improved pasture. County Agent W. H. Cowan and I estimate 8,000 acres of cover crops are being planted this fall for winter grazing and soil improvement.

We have around 20,000 acres of perennial hay crops holding and building the land and feeding livestock. We have 13,000 acres of kudzu, 6,500 acres of Sericea lespedeza, and 500 of alfalfa. Fodder pulling has almost disappeared.

We have 10 grade-A dairy farms and 165 grade-B dairy farms. Their milk sales at Talladega and Dadeville will bring between $130,000 and $150,000 to our county this year. One farmer is selling $800 worth of milk a month and buying only $20 worth of feed. He grows the feed and hay where cotton used to be planted.

County Agent Cowan tells me that at least 100 farmers have one or more registered dairy animals. Five years ago, six farmers had registered dairy cattle. We have a good many registered beef-type bulls. Five farmers are growing registered beef cattle for sale. Our hog production is picking up.

We are planting fewer acres to corn now than in 1934, but our acre yields are about doubled. In 1934, we had 38,093 acres of corn in the county and averaged less than 12 bushels an acre. This year the yield may be as high as 25 bushels an acre from 30,000 acres. Last year we actually made 21.6 bushels to the acre.

We have many paying crops that we did not have when I came to Clay County. They include: Kudzu, sericea, crimson clover, Kentucky 31 fescue, Ladino clover, Caley or wild winter peas, bicolor lespedeza for bobwhite food, blue lupine, crotalaria, hairy indigo, and button clover. Each is fitted into whole-farm soil and water conservation programs. More than that, they are paying off in grazing, or hay, or seed crops for cash, or a combination of all three. SCS nurseries provided the seed or planting stock that started most of those new plants.

Seed production is putting folding money in farmers' pockets. Last year more than 10,000 pounds of sericea seed worth 25 cents a pound were harvested. We have a $37,000 seed cleaning plant in the county.

Looking back over the years, I consider highly significant the changes we have made in the approach to conservation farming.

Our Lineville State Demonstration Farm was a good demonstration of soil-conservation work on uplands and drainage and pasture planting on bottomlands. We had many field days for farmers to see what we were doing, but on-the-ground work directly involved only one farm.

When CCC Camp Hobbs was opened by the Soil Conservation Service we could work on any farm whose owner agreed to cooperate with us in a complete soil and water conservation program. In exchange for the farmer's cooperation we gave him technical, on-the-ground help with his erosion and land-use problems. We gave him seed, trees, and other planting stock, and the labor of CCC boys. Kudzu and pine trees were two of the tools we used to tie down thousands of acres of badly eroded and gullied land. Terraces were built on the better cropland. Soil building rotations were started. Kudzu was planted in outlets to take terrace water without washing. Land suited for pasture was fenced, cleared of scrubby trees and brush, fertilized, limed, and seeded.

The work of Camp Hobbs has meant thousands of dollars to Clay County farmers in the past 15 years. It will continue to pay off as long as the conservation work is maintained. But the initiative came from a Federal agency which required farmers to cooperate with it in order to get complete-farm conservation plans, planting materials, and labor.

Working through Camp Hobbs, we learned that many different measures were needed in various combinations to hold and improve the land. We learned from practical experience that each acre must be used according to its capability and treated according to its needs. Camp Hobbs trained SCS technicians who have helped countless farmers since that time.

But most important, I think, is that the work through the CCC camp proved to farmers that erosion could be controlled and land improved at a profit.

Farmers liked the new way of farming. And we had a complete change in our approach to soil conservation when farmers organized the Piedmont Soil Conservation District.

Five farmers were named supervisors to direct the local soil and water conservation program. O. L. Cotney of Lineville was one of the first district supervisors, and still serves on the board. He and other supervisors called on local, State and Federal agencies and local people to work out the district's conservation program. Then the supervisors asked the United States Department of Agriculture for help from all its agencies who could contribute to the district's own program.

After Camp Hobbs was closed, we of the Soil Conservation Service continued to work in Clay County helping farmers plan and carry out whole-farm soil and water conservation programs. We gave and are giving the farmers technical, on-the-land help, and the landowners are applying the measures themselves. The PMA, formerly the AAA, has helped to pay for a part of the cost of some of the measures.

But we of the Soil Conservation Service were and are cooperating with the locally organized and controlled soil conservation district which represents the farmers of the county.

My work with Clay County people has been and is pleasant and satisfying. I'd like for you to go back with me to a few of the many things that have given me great pleasure.

One day I met W. E. Carpenter, president of the Farmers and Merchants Bank, on the street in Lineville. "You've ruined one of my best customers," Mr. Carpenter told me jokingly. "J. P. McCain used to borrow from me all the time. Now he has a bank account."

Mr. McCain was one of the first farmers to start a complete-farm soil conservation program. He worked hard at it. But even he was a little reluctant to plant kudzu. He put it on a hillside at the back of his farm where it couldn't be seen from the road. At least 750 farmers and agricultural workers have gone to the back of his farm in a single year to see how that kudzu was making hay and grazing on steep, gullied land.

Kudzu was one of the first plants that we found that could wrap up the old red gullies in a blanket of green. The SCS nurseries gave farmers thousands of kudzu crowns. We bought crowns from the older plantings. Then we tried growing kudzu from seed.

Back about 1938 I remember that Mr. Carpenter received and locked up in his bank vault 100 pounds of kudzu seed shipped in from Japan. Twenty 4-H and FFA members made a note to the bank and took the seed to grow into kudzu seedlings. Every note was signed by a member of the Lineville Lions Club. And I remember that every note was paid on or before the date due. Those boys grew 350,000 kudzu seedlings that year—enough to tie down 700 more acres.

The 4-H and FFA boys are still helping. This year they are growing about 375,000 bicolor lespedeza seedlings for wildlife plantings.

Clay County became known as the Kudzu Capital of the World. Publisher C. L. Proctor puts this slogan on the masthead of his Lineville Tribune, "World's leading kudzu-growing county."

We're proud of our kudzu. But we're just as proud of all the other plants and all the other measures that go to make the complete farm-soil and water-conservation program we have in Clay County.

We've had visitors here from 8 foreign countries and 25 different States to see and study our soil- and water-conservation work.

Congressman HOBBS has been a regular visitor through the years. Two years ago, while looking over conservation work in the county, I heard a farmer remark, "This is the first time I ever saw a Congressman in the middle of a kudzu field." I've known Congressman HOBBS to visit as many as 32 soil-conservation farmers in a single day.

The opportunity that soil-conservation farming opens for our children is one of the greatest sources of pleasure. I remember that the Reverend W. R. Ingram, Baptist minister and farmer in the Barfield community, told me that soil conservation helped put his younger children through college.

When I went to Clay County in 1928, farmers along Fox Creek near Lineville were trying to drain the bottomland without success. Under soil-conservation district leadership, this drainage job finally was completed. Thirty farmers worked with the district to improve drainage on about 1,000 acres. The SCS loaned a dragline to the district supervisors for use on the project. Our technicians designed the drainage system. The Production and Marketing Administration paid a part of the cost.

Before the drainage project was revived by the district, J. J. Clark was trying to sell his 240-acre farm. His best land, about 67 acres, was along the creek and too wet for use. After the job was finished, Mr. Clark told me, "That 67 acres is worth more to me than the rest of my farm." He quit trying to sell the place.

Soil-conserving measures and crops on the rolling land in Fox Creek watershed keep the drainage ditches from filling up with sand and silt.

James Hutchinson's success is a pleasure for all of us who have worked with him. A tenant farmer who owned only a pair of mules, Hutchinson was helped by the Farmers Home Administration to buy 66 acres in the High Pine community in 1943. I found 50 acres of idle land on his farm when I helped him make a conservation plan. T. T. Reagan, the FHA man, told me the other day that Mr. Hutchinson is paying off his FHA loans at the rate of $108 every 2 weeks. That's half of his milk check. Some of the best pasture on his farm was idle land 7 years ago.

Yes; I've watched a farming miracle unfold in Clay County, and helped it along where I could.

Today I can agree with District Supervisor Cotney when he says, "We'll see more changes in Clay County in the next 10 years than we've seen in the past 10."

Our Alarming Doctor Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the following article entitled "Our Alarming Doctor Shortage," which appeared in

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Collier's magazine of December 16, 1950, is must reading for every Member of Congress:

OUR ALARMING DOCTOR SHORTAGE—WE DESPERATELY NEED PHYSICIANS, YET THE LEADERS OF ORGANIZED MEDICINE WON'T LET CONGRESS ACT

(By Albert Q. Maisel)

(This article sets forth a serious national problem that, in another all-out war, could become a national catastrophe. Few will bother to deny the present shortage of medical personnel. Few will deny the actual and potential dangers of such a shortage. Few will question its obvious solution. The country's medical schools must have money in order to expand and to reduce the sometimes prohibitive cost of medical education. There is strong public and professional support for financing an expansion program with Federal funds. But the leaders of the American Medical Association are against the idea. So far they have blocked the passage of legislation which would make such a program possible. Collier's thinks that their stand is wrong. We appreciate the association's great contributions in maintaining high professional standards and protecting public health and safety. Yet, in this case their attitude seems narrow, and their case weak. Federal aid to medical education is not "socialized medicine." And as long as the danger of general war and atomic attack against our civilian population exists, the argument that Federal aid may lead to Federal control of medical education is academic, to say the least. We hope that the AMA leaders will withdraw their opposition. The Senate has already passed a bill which would provide money to end the doctor shortage. If the AMA continues its fight in the new Congress, we trust that the lawmakers will have the courage to enact the measure anyway in the interest of urgent necessity.—THE EDITORS.)

A tiny group of well-intentioned men has placed your health, and even your chances of Atomic Age survival, in the most serious jeopardy. These men mean you no harm. Indeed, they are the leaders of the American Medical Association, an organization sincerely dedicated to fighting disease and saving life.

Yet they must shoulder major responsibility for a shortage of medical personnel which is constantly becoming more critical. They are the one big obstacle in the path of congressional efforts to meet that shortage with Federal aid to medical education—a solution which has the backing of most medical school deans, of leading university presidents, of both Republicans and Democrats, and (by a unanimous vote) of the United States Senate.

The bill which embodies this solution was drawn up with the advice of AMA representatives; time after time it was modified to meet their objections, and in its present form it represents almost precisely what they wanted in the first place. Nevertheless, the American Medical Association's leaders have fought the measure to a dead stop in the House of Representatives.

By so doing, they have made it entirely possible that wounded American soldiers, in the future, will receive some second- or third-rate substitute for the marvelous medical services that saved tens of thousands of lives in World War II. Because of what they have done and what they have prevented from being done, civilian atomic-bomb victims may perish untended. Mothers, lacking a physician's help, may die in childbirth under the ministrations of incompetent midwives. Plagues and epidemics, which we all thought banished forever, may return to claim millions of victims.

These are not the dire and gloomy forebodings of neurotic alarmists or scare-pedding sensationalists. They are rather the considered private predictions of shocked and worried experts who, ever since the end of World War II, have been trying to get the organized medical profession to take steps to overcome a growing shortage of physicians, nurses, dentists, and public-health technicians.

Behind their shortage lies the fact that our medical and other health-education schools cannot expand for lack of funds. Many of them are so deep in the red that they may even have to fold up entirely.

The shortage of physicians has been recognized for years. In May 1945 for example, Dr. Victor Johnson (then secretary of the American Medical Association's Council on Medical Education and Hospitals) testified before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs that, while we would need 35,000 more physicians after World War II, our training program was geared to provide us with an increase of less than half this number by 1948.

Despite this warning of a growing shortage of doctors, even for civilian needs, we demobilized our medical schools, along with everything else, when World War II ended. Financial difficulties, and a desire to improve the quality of training, led college after college to cut back its student roster, often by as much as 20 to 30 percent. Instead of training more doctors than ever before, we began to train fewer. Our nursing, dental, and public-health schools all moved in the same direction.

AMA SECRETARY MAKES A FORECAST

In October 1947 Dr. Donald G. Anderson, the new secretary of the AMA council, stated, "We are prepared to contend that the maximum deficit that could possibly be forecast for 1960 does not exceed 15,000 physicians."

Anderson's words were couched in terms designed to minimize the problem. Yet they amounted to a startling admission. For according to the 1950 American Medical Directory, there are about 200,000 physicians for more than 150,000,000 Americans; an average of 1 doctor for every 750 persons. Since this includes doctors doing research and other work not directly connected with the care of patients, the actual number of persons per general practitioner is estimated to run as high as 1,500. Taking 1,000 as a conservative figure, what Anderson was actually saying was that approximately 1 in every 10 of us would be without doctors in 1960, or that all of us would be averaging 10 percent less medical service than we needed and were willing to pay for.

A similar situation of chronic shortage has been developing in the other health-service professions.

We have only 280,500 professional nurses. Right now, without allowing for the expanding needs of the armed services, 74,000 more are required. But enrollments in our schools of nursing have dropped to less than two-thirds of the wartime peak.

We have 75,000 practicing dentists. By 1960, the United States Public Health Service reports, we will need at least 95,000. But our dental schools can't train enough, unless their capacity is substantially increased. A continuing deficit of at least 5,000 dentists looms.

The same is true for nursing teachers, doctors of public health, sanitary engineers and all the other groups of specialized health technicians. Far from overcoming these deficits, we have been falling ever further behind in training new medical personnel.

In 1910, our medical schools graduated 4,440 students, producing one new doctor for every 20,000 of our population. By 1940 the number of graduates had increased to 5,097, but the growth of population had far outstripped the increase in doctors. In that year we produced only one doctor for every 26,000 of our people. In 1950 our physician output amounted to 5,553. But, once again, it did not keep pace with population growth. We produced this year only one new doctor for every 27,000 people.

Worst of all, our schools of medicine, dentistry, nursing and public health find themselves in a deep and growing financial crisis. Their costs have been mounting, but their income has not nearly kept pace.

This country's 79 medical schools, for example, had a total budget last year of more than $61,000,000. They had to spend an average of $2,577 for every student. But their tuition fees averaged only $548. Income from research grants, endowments, State appropriations, and all other sources still left a gap of more than $10,000,000.

More than three-quarters of the 44 privately owned medical schools have been operating at a deficit. Even a number of the tax-supported State schools have been running into the red. According to the American Medical Association, only 8 schools reported, a year ago, that they did not stand in urgent need of additional operating funds to meet essential costs.

The same situation has been hog-tying our other health education schools. Dental colleges, with an average tuition fee of $500 a year per student, have had to find $2,000 per year to cover the cost of educating each person. The schools of public health, with tuition fees averaging only $440, have actually been spending an average of seven times as much per student.

Even the American Medical Association's Council on Medical Education and Hospitals, when it surveyed the sorry situation of the medical schools more than 2 years ago, found that they needed an additional $15,000,000 a year to support their operations and nearly $200,000,000 of capital funds to construct urgently needed facilities.

In the words of Herbert Hoover, "Our medical educational system is woefully inadequate for the conduct of our national defense and our Federal hospitals for veterans and others. And it is doubly inadequate for the needs of the people generally."

In the event of all-out war, no other nonindustrial bottleneck will do more to endanger our chances for victory than these shortages of medical personnel. For we shall need more doctors and nurses than ever before in our history.

Our armed services will be compelled to drain the home front of tens of thousands of doctors. But home-front needs will be infinitely greater than they were in the past.

WHEN WAR RAVAGES THE HOME FRONT

Listen, for example, to the carefully weighed words of Dr. P. J. Carroll, dean of the School of Medicine of Creighton University in Omaha. "In the event of another world war," Dr. Carroll warns, "we shall not be able to leave the civilian population without adequate medical services as was done during the last war. There was no conflict or even a threat of conflict within our borders. The next war will be different. Our large cities will be enemy targets and a large part of our population will be evacuated. It will be necessary to disperse our civilian population in small concentrations, away from military installations. The greater the dispersion of our people the greater will be the need for more physicians."

It is this dilemma—the need for more doctors and nurses for the services, coupled with a multiplied need for the same doctors and nurses at home—that is giving sleepless nights to the experts of the National Security Resources Board and the other agencies whose duty it is to prepare for both mobilization and civil defense.

They have no hope of really solving the problem in the sense of having enough doctors and nurses both to meet all military needs and fully to protect civilian health. Our chance to achieve that goal has been frittered away in 5 years of inaction since the end of World War II.

The best they can hope for, today, is to arrive somehow at a formula that will equalize the shortage, a scheme that will go as far as possible toward taking care of military needs without leaving us utterly stripped of medical resources to meet ordinary civilian needs—plus the tremendous medical demands of atomic or bacteriological defense.

The experts have one other hope. Given a few years of even partial peace, the training of large numbers of doctors, dentists, nurses and technicians might be started—if the program got a great shot in the arm.

Faced with this alarming situation, the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, bitterly split between proponents of national health insurance and those who fight it as "socialized medicine," decided in the spring of 1949 to separate the problem of medical education from its long-stymied omnibus National Health Act. This, the Senators felt, might lead to something they all could agree on to aid the medical and other health education schools.

A bill was drawn up to provide Federal subsidies ($500 per student in the case of medical schools) to help meet current operating deficits. Additional sums were to be available for any school that increased its roster. And to aid the schools in expanding their physical facilities, grants of $5,000,000 a year were to be allotted for construction and equipment.

This bill was sponsored not only by such Fair Dealers as Senators JAMES E. MURRAY, of Montana, and CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida, but also by two outstanding Republicans, Senators ROBERT A. TAFT, of Ohio, and FORREST DONNELL, of Missouri. The Hoover Commission backed its principles. President Truman got behind it. The Association of American Medical Colleges anxiously urged its passage. Most of the State-owned medical schools supported it. The privately owned medical schools were almost unanimous in their endorsement.

Nevertheless, anxious to meet all possible objections, the Senate committee followed up its public hearings with a week-long series of conferences with representatives of the American Medical Association and the other health professions.

At these meetings, under the chairmanship of Lowell J. Reed, vice president of Johns Hopkins University, every conceivable objection to the original draft of the bill was freely raised and discussed.

A CONCESSION TO MEDICAL OPINION

The original measure, for example, provided for an advisory council representing the health professions, to be appointed by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service with the approval of the Federal Security Administrator. The representatives of the American Medical Association, however, objected to giving this much influence to Oscar Ewing, the administrator, whom they deeply mistrusted as a leading advocate of compulsory health insurance. Instead they asked that the measure provide for Presidential appointment of the Advisory Council. This change was made.

The early draft of the bill provided a ceiling of 50 percent on the proportion of the budget of any school that might be met by Federal subsidies. This ceiling was designed to preserve local interest in supporting medical education and to prevent the Federal subsidy from dominating the picture. Under the formulas for subsidy, the richer and larger schools would never approach the ceiling. But the representatives of the medical schools and of the universities felt that the 50 percent figure was essential if adequate help were to be given to the most needy schools.

The American Medical Association representatives, extremely fearful of so great a Federal participation in the support of medical education, held out for a ceiling of 30 percent. Ultimately the Senate committee compromised at 40 percent.

Still wary of Federal influence, the representatives of the AMA asked that the Advisory Council be granted a veto power over the actions of the Surgeon General in administering and alloting the subsidies. The medical school deans and the other educators, who long have handled research grants administered by the Surgeon General, felt no such apprehensions. But, to keep the peace, they agreed that the bill should be changed to require the Surgeon General to promulgate regulations only "after obtaining the advice and recommendations of the Council."

Going even further to allay the AMA representatives' fear of Federal domination, the conferees recommended empowering the Advisory Council to make reports directly to Congress. This provision was designed to prevent any possibility that a politically motivated Administrator might muzzle the Council. Any conflicts between the representatives of the medical professions and the Administrator would be brought right out into the open. Once again, the safeguards sought by the AMA were written into the Senate bill.

With the sole exception of the 40-percent compromise, every change requested by the representatives of the American Medical Association at these closed-door conferences was incorporated in the committee's final version of the bill—and the bill was sponsored by every Senator on the committee, with a single exception.

To protect the schools against bureaucratic interference with their teaching programs or their methods of operation, the bill contained rigid prohibitions against Federal "direction, supervision, or control * * * with respect to personnel, curriculum, or instruction."

When the measure was reported on the floor of the Senate in August 1949 a routine objection was raised to its immediate passage by unanimous consent. At this juncture both Senators PEPPER and TAFT, long bitter opponents on most other questions concerning the public health, stood up and urged their colleagues to support the measure. Two weeks later, when the bill again appeared on the calendar, it passed unanimously.

FEARED TACTICS OF LOBBYISTS

The worried deans and directors of the medical, dental, and nursing schools breathed a sigh of relief. For, they figured, if the American Medical Association were opposed to the bill its powerful Washington lobby would have shown its hand in the Senate, would have blocked this measure (as it had blocked many others) in committee or, at a very minimum, would have forced a debate and a counting of noses on the Senate floor.

For the AMA lobby is powerful indeed. It operates through two channels. Officially the AMA is represented by Dr. Joseph S. Lawrence, director of its Washington office. But the real power behind the scenes is the California publicity firm of Whitaker & Baxter which, for the last 2 years, has been directing the American Medical Association's well-heeled national education campaign—aimed at preventing passage of the administration's compulsory health insurance program. Lawrence and Witaker & Baxter are registered with Congress as lobbyists.

Many of the medical school deans, unversed in the intricacies of politics, felt so certain that the aid to medical education bill would easily pass the House that they authorized the enrollment of larger classes than their schools had handled at any time since the war. The number of freshmen admitted to medical schools jumped, in 1950, by 5.3 percent over the preceding year.

AMENDED TO MEET OBJECTIONS

In the House, the Biemiller bill, a duplicate of the Senate measure, again received bipartisan support. Representative HUGH SCOTT, of Pennsylvania, former Republican National Committee chairman and long-time opponent of socialized medicine, joined with Democratic Congressman ANDREW J. BIEMILLER, of Wisconsin, in sponsoring amendments to the original House bill to make it meet the AMA objections brought forth in the Lowell Reed conferences. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce promptly reported favorably on the altered bill.

By then, late in the session, it was necessary for the House Rules Committee to speed action on the measure if the whole House was to vote on it without delay. This procedure promised to be routine.

But suddenly the applecart was upset.

A small group of insurgent members of nurses' organizations in Georgia and North Carolina, and the owner of a private hospital in the latter State, got the impression that the measure would somehow set up the American Nursing Association as an accrediting body for all nursing schools—and thus force the closing down, for lack of accreditation, of some of the less qualified schools in the southern States.

On behalf of this group, Representative ROBERT L. (MULEY) DOUGHTON, of North Carolina, protested to the Rules Committee. The sponsors of the bill offered to amend the measure to overcome this objection. That satisfied DOUGHTON, and he withdrew his protest.

But the Biemiller bill had, by then, been labeled "controversial." The Rules Committee, fearful of setting a precedent that would throw a host of other controversial measures onto the House floor in the last 2 weeks of the session, withheld its approval. The bill was held up until Congress could meet again, in 1950.

Even after Congress adjourned, the American Medical Association's opposition had not crystallized. Early in December 1949, the House of Delegates of the AMA met in Washington and approved a report of its council on medical examination and hospitals which declared that, "While the council is not entirely satisfied with the bill, it does incorporate several modifications suggested by the council's representatives and it is a distinct improvement over any other bill for Federal aid to medical education that has been introduced."

The report added, "The council is aware that Federal aid to medical education creates definite hazards to the continued freedom and independence of the medical schools. With few exceptions, however, the medical schools and their parent universities have expressed the opinion that, unless additional aid is provided, medical education in this country cannot achieve its full development. The legislation which has been passed by the Senate contains safeguards that should protect the medical schools from unwarranted interference in their affairs by the Federal Government."

SUDDEN CHANGE OF SENTIMENT

Less than 2 months later the AMA completely changed its tune. At a conference of its national education campaign, Louis H. Bauer, M. D., chairman of the board of trustees, stated the AMA's position on pending legislation. The aid to medical education measure was added to the long list of bills which the AMA opposed.

Said Bauer, "As the bill is presently drawn, we feel it would give the Government a foot in the door—in fact, probably 2 feet in the door—for Federal control of medical education. There are certain very drastic amendments which will have to be made to that bill before we can approve it."

The strategy behind this shift in position was explained by Clem Whitaker, head of Whitaker & Baxter, who called the aid to education measure a "fringe bill" which, he said, "masked hidden threats."

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

"Instead of being confronted with the task of defeating a revolutionary program of Government medicine, embodied in a single proposal, or in companion bills," Whitaker continued, "we are now faced with a series of measures—disarming in language but dangerous in their provisions—some of which must be beaten and some drastically changed or amended."

In the face of this attack, the House sponsors of the aid-to-medical-education bill tried to go even further than did their Senate colleagues in meeting AMA objections. The Senate compromise which set subsidy maximums at 40 percent was dropped and replaced by the figure of 30 percent, which the AMA's representatives had originally asked for.

The clause guaranteeing academic freedom from Federal interference was revised and enlarged, at the suggestion of the AMA's Dr. Donald G. Anderson, so that every detail of protection could be carefully spelled out in the bill itself.

The provisions governing the promulgation of regulations were altered, again in keeping with earlier AMA suggestions. In the latest version of the bill, the professional Advisory Council would have to approve any regulation of the Surgeon General before it could take effect.

The AMA's friends on the House subcommittee kept it working over revisions until late last May, in what Representative BIEMILLER characterized as a stalling-twisting-turning-conniving policy of compromise and then oppose the compromise. Finally, with subcommittee approval won at last, the Biemiller bill came before full Interstate Commerce Committee on June 19 only to be defeated by a one-vote margin.

On June 25, employing a parliamentary device, BIEMILLER got the matter again before the Commerce Committee in the form of a new bill incorporating all the amendments that had been tacked onto the old one. Once again he lost out by a single vote. The committee decided not to consider the bill until after August 8, when—as it then appeared—Congress would have adjourned and gone home.

But the outbreak of the Korean war did two things. It changed plans for adjournment, and it served to highlight the urgency of drastic action to get medical education into high gear. When the North Koreans crossed the thirty-eighth parallel, our armed services had 5,844 physicians on their rolls. They needed about 1,550 more.

The Army, whose need was the most desperate, sent out a call to 3,000 Reserve lieutenants and captains in the Medical Corps, requesting their return to service. Only 200 replied, and of these only 15 volunteered.

By mid-August it became apparent that voluntary enlistments of physicians and nurses would never begin to meet the service's needs, even for a limited mobilization. The Defense Department found itself compelled to run to Congress for the hurried passage of a doctors-draft bill. First on the list were 7,500 young doctors and dentists who had received their medical education at Government expense while deferred from active military service during World War II. But the draft bill was not limited to these men alone. It authorized the President to order a general registration and induction of physicians up to the age of 55 and of dentists through the age of 45.

To meet the needs of a 3,000,000-man force, the armed services will have to drain from civilian life substantially more than 5,000 physicians and proportionately large numbers of dentists, nurses, and technicians.

Thus the initial stages of the crisis anticipated by the proponents of the aid to medical education bills are already upon us.

Any further expansion of the armed services will require additional levies against our already short-handed civilian health personnel. All-out war, on a global scale, will require well over 42,000 of our youngest and most active physicians.

Facing up to this crisis, Representative BIEMILLER led a strenuous campaign in Congress all through last July and August to get the aid-to-medical-education measure reported out to the House. Day after day he read into the RECORD endorsements of the bill's passage: By Dean George W. Bakeman, of the Medical College of Virginia; by Dean Murray Kinsman, of the University of Louisville; by Dr. A. C. Ivy, vice president of the University of Illinois; Dean Willard C. Rappleye, of Columbia University; Chancellor Robert Hutchins, of the University of Chicago, and many others.

HOW MEDICAL SCHOOLS VOTED

Dean Joseph C. Hisey, of Cornell University, chairman of the executive council of the Association of American Medical Colleges, wrote that a poll of its membership showed 47 schools favoring the bill and only 16 opposed. He disavowed the action of the AMA as "taken independently of our association * * * and without a poll of our membership."

The deans of all the schools of medicine, dentistry, and public health in Massachusetts, including Harvard, Tufts, and Boston University, declared, "We are convinced that the present desperate plight of our professional schools, not only in Massachusetts, but throughout the United States, has already interfered with the quality of professional education and is preventing the development of adequate medical and health personnel for the country.

"We make this statement," they add, "in full awareness of the position recently taken by the American Medical Association. We vigorously oppose that position."

Despite this campaign, the AMA opposition once again carried the day. On August 16, the Biemiller bill, which President Truman had characterized as "the most vital health legislation before Congress," was tabled in the Interstate Commerce Committee by a 9 to 8 vote.

Protesting this action, Dean James S. Simmons of Harvard University, called it a tragic mistake and a crippling blow to the Nation's military and civil preparedness program.

Scores of similar protests flooded in upon Congress. But, last August 30, the House Interstate Commerce Committee again decided to table the program. Shortly thereafter, Congress recessed.

Despite this tendency on the part of Congress and the AMA to look the other way, the grave problem of medical shortages still exists, and the pressure is mounting for some action to solve it. Among those plugging for such a move is Bernard M. Baruch. "I am not in favor of socialized medicine," the famed adviser to Presidents said recently, "but the medical profession has got to do something to meet the needs of the masses. The first way is to increase the output of doctors."

Thus it appears certain that the next Congress will find itself confronted with the same hot potato—unless some alternative method of enlarging our health training schools can be discovered.

But are there any alternatives?

Dr. Willard C. Rappleye, of Columbia University's College of Physicians and Surgeons, has offered one suggestion: a change in premedical education. If this were eliminated or cut down as a requirement for entering medical schools a few hundred doctors might graduate a year or so sooner—if the schools could find room for them as students. But, since the real bottleneck causing the doctor shortage lies in the medical schools themselves, Dr. Rappleye's proposal does not touch the core of the problem.

SUGGESTS ABOLISHING INTERNS

Dr. William Lee Hart, dean of the University of Texas' Southwestern Medical School, has proposed the abolition of internships and their replacement by a year of apprenticeship under older doctors. This proposal is certain to meet the stiffest opposition from both the American Medical Association and the thousands of hospitals whose entire setup is dependent upon a continued supply of interns. But even if adopted, it would merely shift young physicians from the hospitals, where they are sorely needed, into doctors' offices.

The most likely alternative to Federal subsidies for medical education is the idea of a voluntary fund to raise money, free from Federal control. The American Medical Association has long toyed with this idea. Last January, a National Fund for Medical Education was actually incorporated under the honorary chairmanship of Herbert Hoover. Its board of trustees—from Winthrop Aldrich to George Whitney—is diamond-studded with leaders of industry, finance, and banking. Its objective is worthy. Its personnel is top-notch. If ever a fund-raising plan were capable of achieving its full potential, this would appear to be the one.

Yet, what is that potential? In its prospectus, addressed to leading industrialists, the fund detailed the medical schools' need to overcome a $10,000,000 deficit. But it proposed to raise, through voluntary subscriptions, only $1,000,000. The balance, the prospectus conceded, would have to come from the Federal Treasury.

TO PRESERVE ACADEMIC FREEDOM

The best the fund could hope for was that private sources for support might be "stimulated" so that "there will be created a balance under which the academic freedom essential to scientific medical education will be preserved."

Thus, the voluntary fund-raising organization turns out to be, at best, only a partial supplement to Federal aid; a 10 percent counterweight rather than a full-fledged substitute.

There may be still other ways of achieving the necessary expansion of medical and health education. But if there are, 5 years of searching by the medical schools themselves and by the American Medical Association have not turned them up.

Thus, Congress, when it meets again, will have the old doctor-shortage headache on its hands once more. To the pressure from the President, from public-health officials, from the universities, and from almost all of our schools of health education, there will now be added a further tremendous pressure from the Defense Department, made acutely aware, by the Korean crisis, of the weakness in our medical armament.

Whether the American Medical Association can buck this tidal wave remains to be seen.

But one thing is certain. Unless immediate steps are taken to solve our chronic and growing shortage of medical, dental, nursing, and public-health personnel, your health—and that of your family, your neighbors and your sons in the services—will be jeopardized for years to come.

Secretary Acheson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD BOLLING

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, the Lowell Mellett column and the Washington Sunday Star editorial which appear below may help those who have lost perspective to regain it:

[From the Washington Evening Star of December 9, 1950]

ACHESON IS UNFAIRLY CHOSEN FOR ROLE OF SCAPEGOAT FOR DISASTER IN KOREA

(By Lowell Mellett)

The past week has not been one we are likely to remember with much pride. This is so, not because of the tragic turn of events in Korea where our troops have had to give way before the overwhelming numbers of the enemy. Indeed, there is cause for great pride in the heroic behavior of the troops themselves. But the day will come when we surely will hang our heads in shame as we remember the conduct of many of our leaders on the home front. This has particular reference to certain members of the United States Senate.

It is not strange that the shattering impact of the military reversal should have caused them to become jittery. That can be condoned. Most everybody was affected the same way. But it is another matter when they take cowardly refuge behind confusion of their own creation and endeavor to escape their share of responsibility for the situation we are in. That is what these Senators are doing.

EVERYBODY TO BLAME

When the war was going well in Korea, when it had become clear that the North Korean armies could and would be driven out of South Korea, an important decision had to be made. Should we stop at the thirty-eighth parallel or carry the conflict on to the Manchurian border? The decision was made to go the whole way. The result everybody knows: The present disaster.

There is no point now in arguing the wisdom of the decision made. It is quite possible that Red China, which had threatened to enter the fight if we passed the thirty-eighth parallel, was prepared to enter it whether we did so or not. The size, the organization and the equipment of the armies she has thrown against us suggest long planning and preparation.

Wisely, or unwisely we precipitated the immediate invasion. If unwisely, who is to blame? Everybody. Not President Truman, not Secretary Acheson, not General Marshall and not General MacArthur. General MacArthur could not have proceeded without the sanction of his superiors in Washington and he had that sanction. President Truman could not have authorized General MacArthur's action without the approval of Congress and there are few in Congress dishonest enough now to say they disapproved. And beyond Congress there was the sanction of the United Nations, despite some dissenting voices.

MUST HAVE SCAPEGOAT

Yet these Senators must have a scapegoat to turn attention from themselves and, naturally, they have undertaken to make Secretary Acheson that scapegoat. A long campaign of abuse and misrepresentation, stepped up to an extreme in the effort to win the congressional elections, had prepared him for the role. How little he actually merits it and how unfair it is to bestow it on him will be realized by anybody who thinks back a few weeks.

It has been only a short time since Mr. Acheson was being charged with interfering with General MacArthur's conduct of the war and specifically with trying to tell General MacArthur that he must stop at the thirty-eighth parallel. This the Secretary, of course, denied and he was supported in his denial by the President. Both backed the General. If that was a mistake, they are guilty. But it ill behooves their present critics to say so, since it was they who were shrillest in demanding that we do just what we did.

Yet now these same Senators insist that the President ask for Mr. Acheson's resignation. Joining the clamor, Senator IVES says we must have some one in whom we can have confidence. Senator IVES, however, does not and cannot assure us that his frantic colleagues would not set themselves to destroy, as fast as they are able, any confidence the country might have in any man that could be named.

[From the Washington Sunday Star of December 10, 1950]

MR. ACHESON: RIGHT OR WRONG?

The Republican contingent in the Senate will decide this week whether the demand for Secretary Acheson's resignation is to be made a party matter. The Senators should think long and carefully before coming to their decision.

Those who are clamoring for Mr. Acheson's official scalp have an argument which runs something like this: The Secretary of State has lost the confidence of the American people. Therefore, he must go. It doesn't matter whether the things that are being said about him are true or not.

The Star thinks that it does matter.

If Mr. Acheson has failed as Secretary of State, if he is responsible for faulty decisions that have been injurious to the country, then there can be no argument. He should be replaced. But this is not something that should be taken for granted, or that should be believed merely because somebody says that it is true. Where is the evidence? What decisions are the critics talking about?

Again, if it is true that Mr. Acheson no longer enjoys the confidence of the people, if it is a fact that he has become a liability rather than an asset, then the President may have to replace him. In a time such as this, national considerations should come first. But these "ifs" are big "ifs." Where is the proof that the people have lost confidence in Mr. Acheson? Some have, without doubt, but what about the majority? The speeches of Senators, who may or may not be influenced by partisan motives, are not necessarily in harmony with the sentiment of a majority of the people in this country.

There is another point that should be considered. Glib arguments to the contrary, the difference between doing the right thing and the wrong thing is something that does matter. If Mr. Acheson, on the whole record, has done a creditable job as Secretary of State, and the Star believes that he has, the right thing to do is to support him. The wrong thing would be to throw him to the wolves for the sake of a harmony which probably would be both illusory and of brief duration.

This country is going through a period of great trial. The temptation to do the expedient thing is strong. But when we have passed through whatever lies ahead, all of us will feel better in our hearts and in our consciences if we can look back and say that we have tried to do the right thing, that we have not permitted any one to stampede us into accepting the doctrine that the difference between right and wrong is something that doesn't matter.

Address of Hon. Frank Pace, Jr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I present an able speech delivered by the Honorable Frank Pace, Jr., Secretary of the Army, at Asbury Park, N. J., on Saturday, October 7, 1950. It follows:

I am extremely happy to be here with you tonight, for this occasion gives me an opportunity I have looked forward to for nearly 2 months—an opportunity to tell a more complete story of our military effort in Korea during the dark, bitter days that marked the opening weeks of this historic campaign.

I can think of no more appropriate group to hear this story than an organization such as yours, made up of veterans of other dark and bitter days. I am especially happy that this story also can be heard in homes throughout America tonight, for it is a proud record of American heroism which all Americans need to know. But I tell this story also for the light that this whole grim experience sheds upon our present situation, and our future problems.

First, I would remind you that when the powerful Communist armies of North Korea brutally attacked the free and independent Republic of Korea, without warning and without provocation, history paused momentarily at a crossroads. This lawless aggression was a brazen challenge to the authority and force of the United Nations. If allowed to pass by, unchecked and unpunished, it would have provided an open invitation for a series of such aggressions throughout the world. These eventually would have destroyed peace and security for all of us and our friends, delaying for another generation, and perhaps forever, our dream of a lasting and universal peace.

The United Nations rose promptly and memorably to this challenge. It condemned the aggression, ordered it stopped, and called upon all member nations for support of its order. In one of history's most thrilling moments, the free nations of the world, large and small, pledged their arms, their resources, and their hearts in support of the United Nations order.

But this unfortunately was not enough to stop the invading Communist armies. Living by force, they respect only force—and force was required to stop them. The lightly armed troops of the Republic of Korea, trained and equipped only for internal security, were falling back rapidly, suffering appalling losses.

In the face of this crisis, our Nation gave everlasting proof that a democracy can move quickly and decisively to meet grave problems. The United States, by far the most powerful of the free nations, and the only one with any military force within range of the Korean action, without hesitation threw in air and sea elements from nearby Japan. Our aircraft and our ships quickly gained complete control of the skies and the seas in the fighting zone, giving courageous support to the sorely pressed South Korean ground forces. But the inevitable truth of warfare became quickly apparent—that it takes an army to stop an army.

Our divisions on occupation duty in Japan were not equipped or manned for this type of action. They were at reduced peacetime strength levels, and, because of overseas rotation policies, they included, as they always do, a certain percentage of newly arrived recruits. Despite the fact that these units had not completed the requisite cycle of training after having been relieved of their diverse and scattered duties of military government in Japan, they moved without delay into the Korean conflict. We knew that they would face grave difficulties, calling for the utmost in courage, skill, and leadership. But we sent them in unhesitatingly, in accordance with our solemn obligation to the other nations united with us in the cause of restoring the peace.

The first to arrive were two rifle companies and a weapons company of the Twenty-fourth Infantry Division. These 700 lightly equipped American soldiers were loaded into planes on a few hours' notice on July 2 and were flown through driving rains to Korea. They went into action on July 4, flinging themselves into the face of an entire division in the full momentum of its unchecked advance.

I cannot tell you their whole story. Only the handful of these men who are still living could tell that story, and the chances are they never will attempt it. I can only tell you that they held their first established position for seven terrible hours against fantastic odds and then withdrew only because they had run out of ammunition.

Within the next few days the remaining combat elements of the Twenty-fourth Infantry Division were rushed into the lines, and within another week the Twenty-fifth Division was committed, but we were still greatly outnumbered and outgunned.

The horror and the heroism of those first 2 weeks can never be known, but the results were an inspiration to the entire free world. These few thousand American soldiers fought superbly through one of the most bitter, the most vicious, the most difficult campaigns in our military history. Even the green, incompletely trained, recent arrivals became toughened veterans overnight. Although outnumbered 15 to 1, they held back this powerful enemy, delaying him and forcing him to redeploy his forces. They gave ground grudgingly, buying precious time with their courage and their blood, so we and the other United Nations could gird ourselves for the decisive counter strokes that came later.

At the beginning of the third week, on July 18, the First Cavalry Division completed in record time the first amphibious landing by United States ground forces, and our torn and battered lines were again bolstered.

Meanwhile, our stand had permitted the shattered remnants of the South Korean Army to regroup, reorganize, and reequip themselves for the battle. This they did with amazing speed, and by mid-July they had five divisions—more than 50,000 veteran fighting soldiers—back in the lines. From that day on they have fought fiercely and well, with outstanding success.

That these defeated and exhausted men could be welded so quickly into an effective fighting force is an everlasting tribute to the Korean nation. It is also, I believe, a measure of what may be expected from all Asiatic peoples when given the means and the opportunity to fight for the freedom they have sought so long.

I also want to give long-overdue credit to a little-known group of United States Army officers and men whose contribution during those early days was outstanding in every way. I refer to the Korean military advisory group, the so-called K-MAG, made up of 500 officers and men who had been stationed in South Korea for nearly a year assisting the new Republic to organize and train its security forces. Scattered among various units of the South Korean Army, these men caught the full force of the initial attack. They remained with their respective South Korean units as long as the units existed as such. They helped them reassemble and reorganize, and when those units reentered the battle our K-MAG officers and men went in with them. They are still with them. The contribution of those men has been little publicized, but it has been immeasurable.

Thus, largely through the extraordinary efforts of a few thousand United States Army officers and men, backed up by superb air and naval support by American and other United Nations planes and ships, we were able successfully to complete what has been called by many experts one of the most brilliant delaying actions in military history. Precious time was bought with reluctantly surrendered space, and by August 3, just 30 days after our first units went in, we had withdrawn successfully to the Naktong River line, where a firm perimeter could be established. True, it was a 120-mile perimeter held by only three battered American divisions and five understrength South Korean divisions, but the line held.

A few days later the Second Infantry Division and the First Marine Brigade arrived from the United States, along with other Army units from outlying Pacific garrisons. On August 7, with this build-up of the reserve strength we had needed so long, we staged our first major counteroffensive. This powerful drive by a large Army force, supported by the 3,000 newly arrived marines who performed in the best traditions of the corps in their first Korean battle test, was a complete success.

Since then there has been much heavy fighting and many brave men have died, but we have been in firm control of our position. I need not describe the very recent, very thrilling victories we have enjoyed, but I will remind you that they were made possible only by the incredible 30-day stand of a few thousand American soldiers who enjoyed no military advantage on the ground except great ability, raw courage, and unqualified devotion to duty.

Now, what have we learned from this narrow escape, when history literally turned on the superhuman efforts of a few brave men?

First, I want to say proudly that Korea has proved that America's peacetime Army has been extremely well trained, and that the quality of its officers and men is of the highest. This was amply demonstrated by the job they did in the face of superior forces and more powerful weapons.

Second, Korea has proved that the Army's new weapons development has been sound. When they finally arrived for the acid test of battle, our new bazookas, our improved tanks, our recoilless rifles, our new ammunition—all proved more than a match for the best that the Communists could throw against them.

Third, Korea has proved that teamwork among the three services has been developed to an all-time high under unification, as evidenced in this first great test. Joint maneuvers, common doctrines, unified command—all have paid off in battle.

Fourth, we have been reminded again, as we have repeatedly been reminded throughout history, that wars must ultimately and inevitably be fought and won on the ground, with two opposing soldiers pitting their skills, their weapons, and their courage against each other for a piece of contested soil.

Finally, Korea has proved, with chilling certainty, that Communist imperialism now is ready to resort to open aggression to accomplish its ends, and that moral appeals must be backed up by armed strength to oppose its purposes.

Realizing this, we now know what we must do to meet this type of threat: We must be ready to meet swift, premeditated, and ruthless aggression at many potential danger spots in the world. This means we must have far more extensive armed forces than we had previously intended. It means we must at top speed help our friends and allies to prepare themselves against this threat which is poised along their borders. It means that we must build up such an armed strength throughout the free world that aggressors will not dare risk the consequences of attack upon a peaceful neighbor. It means, above all, that we must not permit the end of the Korean emergency to dilute our determination to build strength for freedom.

Every American must recognize this lesson. You veterans, in particular, who know so well that war is a dirty, sickening, destructive thing, must take the lead in assuring that our democracy is unfailing in its efforts to avoid war. We must insure that the fate of our Nation, and other free nations, will never again rest so precariously on the desperate efforts of a few gallant men. Freedom is a blessing we all enjoy. Its protection is a responsibility we all must share.

"O Ye of Little Faith"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include the following splendid editorial appearing in the Boston Post of December 6, 1950, entitled "O Ye of Little Faith":

"O YE OF LITTLE FAITH"

It will be 9 years tomorrow that the word was flashed to Franklin D. Roosevelt in his White House study that Pearl Harbor had been bombed and Harry Hopkins, who was present, cried aloud: "This is it."

For more than a year the war had been on the horizon of America. In retrospect, the vivid events, rolling nearer and nearer, made it inevitable. But we, recalling World War I—the vain sacrifices and the duplicity—refused to think that again we would be engulfed.

The days that followed December 7 were glowering and the nights fringed with flame. Pearl Harbor, the Philippines, and Wake—across the islands of the Pacific as if they were stepping stones there marched to the shores of Australia an unstoppable, relentless, cruel, and vainglorious Asiatic horde.

Then they turned on Alaska, alarming mainland America. The threat to the west coast was realistic. A mighty fleet and a blooded army which had conquered China with all her vast multimillions shook America as it had not been shaken since the first Battle of Bull Run.

But in those black mornings, the long, black mornings before the sun came up, men shone like beacons—Devereux with his magnificent handful of marines, Colin Kelly obliterating a Nipponese dreadnaught, MacArthur making the Japs pay bitterly for every rod they bought as they slithered through the jungles of Bataan and "Skinny" Wainwright, as rocklike as Corregidor until his tattered battalions could fight no longer.

They are history, golden and imperishable. But fresh chapters are now being made by statesmen speaking sharply, deftly, defiantly or deferentially, according to the moment's mood or the side they are on, at Lake Success and Flushing Meadows.

And chapters, too, are being added by other statesmen, hurrying on errands across the Channel to 10 Downing Street, or across the Atlantic to Washington, where they hold the eyes and ears of men and women world-wide who asked for the palm of peace and have been handed the burning stone of battle.

But it is against the back drop of the cold, hard hills of Korea, snow on them and the temperature striking far below zero, that the sands in the hourglass of mankind drip these critical nights and days.

Outnumbered five to one, facing hordes as fanatical as the throngs of Tojo—the valiant South Koreans, the unbroken Americans, the hard-bitten British and the tough Turks—engaged in a vast, tactical retreat, move back to new lines of defense.

It has not been a rout. They still are armies, regiments, battalions, platoons, and squads. They ride their excellent armor or pause to slow down their pursuers with unshaking guns. They have not asked to be evacuated. They have not thrown their weapons away and run for it.

On the eve of Pearl Harbor, remembering that from there we went on to win the greatest victory that ever crowned the arms of a nation, let us keep faith in the United Nations, in our Allies and, particularly, in the men who at the moment bear the brunt of the battle, lest in a later day, when they shall stand victorious they will not look at us and say, "O ye of little faith."

Why Feed the Flames of Inflation With a Fake Excess-Profits Tax?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, December 11, 1950, there appeared in the New York Times an article by Edward H. Collins with reference to the excess-profits tax.

Under leave to extend heretofore granted, I am inserting this article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my remarks:

ECONOMICS AND FINANCE—THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX: THE SENATE'S RESPONSIBILITY

(By Edward H. Collins)

As the House last week was approving the administration's version of an excess-profits tax with minor modifications, the Senate Finance Committee began hearings preliminary to writing a companion measure.

On Wednesday during the testimony of a spokesman for an industrial group Senator MILLIKIN, of Colorado, broke in to offer this witness and other critics of the excess-profits tax a friendly admonition. Business, the ranking Republican member of the committee suggested, would do well to consider the wisdom of reconciling itself to the enactment of an excess-profits tax. Senator MILLIKIN'S views were seconded by Senator WALTER GEORGE, the Finance Committee's chairman. "Even if business could get Congress to drop the excess-profits tax in favor of some alternative form of tax at this time," observed the No. 1 tax authority of the upper Chamber, "it still might get an excess-profits tax on top of all that."

In the opinion of the present writer business would do well to heed the counsel of these two veteran Senators. It is not only sensible advice; it is advice from a sympathetic quarter. Business, in this instance, as in too many others, has shown, it seems to this column, a singular, if unintentional disregard for public sentiment. It is unfortunate that Congress went off the deep end emotionally and politically on the excess-profits tax before adjournment last September. The fact remains, however, that it did, and that the Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee in consequence are under a mandate to produce such a tax, either now or early in 1951.

This alone should have persuaded the committee that the only course was to accept the inevitability of the excess-profits tax and to concentrate on seeing that the country got a measure that was an improvement over its predecessor of World War II. Since September, of course, the whole timetable of war preparation has been telescoped, and with it the whole wartime fiscal program. If there is one thing that now seems certain it is that before the present emergency has passed into history we shall find it necessary to pull all the stops so far as the raising of revenue is concerned. It is not going to be a question of this tax or that tax, but of this tax and that tax.

But if the spokesmen for business have erred in their judgment in this case (and even that, of course, is a matter of personal opinion) there is nothing in their performance of which they need feel ashamed. They have opposed the excess-profits tax, yes; but they have opposed it openly and honestly out of a sincere conviction that there were simpler, more effective and more equitable methods of taxation available. They have given earnest of their good faith on this point by proposing or supporting alternative plans which would have involved the acceptance of substantially higher tax burdens.

The worst that can be said of the record of business on the excess-profits tax is that it has shown a lack of political "savvy." But when we stand its performance alongside that of the administration this deficiency almost takes on the luminous quality of a positive virtue. For in its approach to this problem the administration has demonstrated that even in dealing with matters of vital national financial policy in the very shadow of war it continues to place its political obligation to the labor unions above the interests of the Nation as a whole. This is a gravely disturbing conclusion to have to reach, but the simple, unavoidable fact is that on the face of the record no other conclusion is possible.

The tax plan introduced by Secretary Snyder, written into legislation by the Ways and Means Committee, and passed by the House last week is the same plan that union leaders have been demanding every time the tax question has come up since 1947 when it was put forward on the pretext that it would prevent the inflation then threatened by the introduction of the Marshall plan. Indeed, though it is perhaps generally forgotten, Mr. Truman tried once before to carry out the wishes of the unions with respect to this measure. It was one of the items included in the catch-all anti-inflation plan thrown into the lap of Congress on July 17, 1948. But, no one entertained the proposal seriously at that time, it being universally assumed that it was just a preliminary to the Presidential political campaign then getting under way.

The role of the wartime excess-profits tax is the desirable, but strictly limited one of recapturing wartime windfall profits. Because this is so, you don't approach the writing of such a tax with the idea of raising some preconceived amount of revenue. As the New York Herald Tribune well stated it recently, you decide what you mean by profits in excess of normal, choose tax rates that won't be oppressive or encourage wasteful spending, and then estimate the yield. Then if you need more Federal revenue you'll have to add other types of taxes, for you have already tapped excess profits.

In trying to adapt the concept of the wartime excess-profits tax to fit an arbitrarily predetermined figure, the administration has either deliberately or mistakenly stretched it to the point where it has become a wartime tax applied to peacetime profits. The implications of this fact go far beyond the matter of the immediate inequities that it produces. This legislation, if permitted to stand in its present form, will set a precedent whose long-term consequence to the economy could well be not merely serious but disastrous. That is the principle that the Government may at any time, in war or in peace, establish a fair return for our private industries and thereupon proceed to expropriate in the name of an excess-profits tax everything above that figure.

North Pacific Flour Mills Still Running Below National Output

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, the plight of the North Pacific flour mills is one which calls for possible consideration and action by Congress. Very clearly, it calls for relief through action by the Department of Agriculture through the Commodity Credit Corporation. Thus far such relief has not been forthcoming. For the information of the Members of the House, I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following data dealing with the situation:

NORTH PACIFIC FLOUR MILLS STILL RUNNING BELOW NATIONAL OUTPUT

Production of what flour from mills of the North Pacific area, comprising Washington, Oregon, and North Idaho, continued to fall behind the national output during October, according to statistics released by the Bureau of the Census and by industry leaders.

While flour mills nationally operated at 74.5 percent of capacity during October, Earl C. Corey, Inc., of Portland, Oreg., reported operation of mills in the Pacific Northwest as follows:

	Percent
Washington and Oregon port mills	68.8
Washington interior and North Idaho mills	47.3
Oregon interior mills	71.4

By contrast, flour mills in South Idaho and Utah operated at 94.4 percent of capacity during October, while mills in California operated at 86 percent of capacity, Corey reported.

The North Pacific Independent Millers contend this loss of production is caused mainly by a dislocation of the agriculture support price formula on wheat, which makes it impossible for them to compete with mills of the Intermountain and California areas in markets which for many years had been served chiefly by Pacific Northwest mills. A second cause is the loss of Asiatic markets due to war conditions and cut-price competition from other countries.

The rate at which this decline has hit the North Pacific milling industry is indicated on the tables which follow. The trend has caused unemployment of nearly half the area's cereal workers and has resulted in an acute shortage of mill-feeds needed by the poultry and dairy industries.

May God Grant Us Some Real Leadership

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Record-Herald, Washington Court House, Ohio, for December 8, 1950:

MAY GOD GRANT US SOME REAL LEADERSHIP

Millions of Americans, honest, patriotic, God-fearing people, today are looking toward Washington, D. C., with an anxiety closely bordering upon dread and alarm.

They are desperately afraid of what they are seeing. In their eyes our wonderful country has drifted into a crisis which easily can lead us into disaster such as none of us dare to let ourselves contemplate.

We are totally agreed that down at Washington, D. C., we need strong and resolute leadership; a determined and purposeful policy that will command confidence and respect. Instead we see weak and vacillating, day-to-day, twists and turns, which bespeak indecision, incompetence, and lack of fortitude. We hope that somehow and from somewhere this leadership will be forthcoming. We certainly need it.

Today the pathetic lack of confidence in national administration leadership is almost appalling. We seek to find stanch, unselfish, and patriotic guidance, but there is nothing outstanding of this character found among those who are in direct control of our ship of state.

We see an administration wrapped up in "cronyism," vital responsibilites, in many cases, in the hands of crack-pots, too many officials whose first concern seems to be the satisfying of pressure groups and political pals.

Are we on the verge of finding our country let down by a crowd that we made the mistake of electing 2 years ago upon promises of plenty of subsidies and a false prosperity joy ride of inflation with easy money based on increased indebtedness and deficit financing, a joy ride none of us seemed to know how we could pay for, and many apparently cared less?

Even more dismaying is the situation in a million American homes, where fathers, sons, and brothers stand on the brink of active participation in the anguish of another great war in which we are not quite sure what we are to fight for.

Must we continue to listen to the blandishments of two or three European countries which take all we can give them without even showing a spirit of willingness to help themselves or to show a determined attitude toward their own protection against the march of communism?

Are we about to enter a period of 2 or 3 years of appeasement and deals which will only prolong the short time before we have to come forth and make a definite decision as to where we stand and whether we are going to meet the issue squarely? Maybe appeasement can hold off trouble until after the next election, but it will not solve our big and pressing problems.

Do we have a policy other than one of a 24-hour makeshift variety?

If so, what is it and in what direction are we being carried? The people have a right to know these things by action and straight talk, not by honeyed phrases and obscure statements.

The day of "playboy" politics of the Wallgren, Vaughn, and Harriman variety should be put out of the picture completely and immediately. So should this business of profits as usual for political favorites along with a superabundance of leisure and amusement for everybody, encouraging evasion of responsibility, lack of thrift and waste without penalty.

Seemingly our only hope lies in the new Congress in January, but many unfortunate things can happen before then.

When are we going to quit whitewashing and fooling around with the dark pinks, if not Reds, identified with our national administration?

When will we stop shipping, or allowing to be shipped, strategic supplies to Red China?

When are we going to tell England and other countries either to play ball with us and quit supplying Chinese Reds, who are killing our boys? Perhaps we should stop the flow of money and supplies from American taxpayers that the English Labor Government keeps demanding from us.

We are tired of half-baked decisions made one day and rescinded the next.

The time is here for Americans to show some of that old spirit which never permitted us to bow our heads in humiliation while some other nation told us what we had to do if we didn't want to get run over.

Maybe we need public meetings in every town hall and schoolhouse. Maybe we need a million telegrams poured into Washington, D. C. Maybe we ought to show Washington, D. C., by telephone, by letter, by telegram, or personally that we mean business and that business is the preservation and safeguarding of our country.

The American people must, and soon, begin to make themselves heard in thundering tones. We are past the time of half-hearted political decisions. We are a strong united people if we have the right leadership.

May God grant that such leadership soon will be forthcoming.

Stop This Communist Swindle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article written by Prof. Nicolas de Rochefort, of the Graduate School of Georgetown University, in answer to the hypocritical and insidious Stockholm peace appeal inspired by the Soviet Union:

AUGUST 25, 1950.

DEAR FRIEND: The Soviet propaganda campaign becomes more and more intense, and is more and more specifically directed against the United States. It presents a character of efficiency through an appeal to emotionalism that one does not find in the past American counterpropaganda. It constantly appeals to the masses; it is specifically directed toward the masses, and, therefore, its repercussions and effect are far greater.

Such a strategic propaganda effort is particularly shown in the campaign for peace, launched by the Soviets at a pro-Communist Congress in Stockholm, and which is making rapid progress in the entire world. This campaign is developing with considerable success in the United States.

It seems to me that it is necessary to combat this campaign of insidious lies by appealing to the same social group as does the campaign for peace, the masses. In order to achieve this result, I have composed an appeal to the American people, the text of which you will find joined to this communication.

This appeal is planned to be circulated throughout the entire United States in order to receive as many signatures as possible. The signatures, I feel, should come from persons representing every area of the American social structure, from the American Legion to the A. F. of L. and the CIO.

But I hope that the very first signatures will be those of the members, professors, staff, and students of our school. Our dean, Gerard F. Yates, S. J., has given his wholehearted support to this plan. I have also received the official support of the State Department, which believes that this is the first attempt to explain communism and its tactics to the masses ever conducted by a private group of persons. The State Department further feels that this campaign must progress very rapidly, in order that it may have its maximum possible effect by the first week in October—the culminating date of the communistic campaign for peace. I should appreciate very much your signature to the text of the appeal, so that Americans may join together in exposing these insidious Communist lies, as manifested in the campaign for peace.

NICOLAS DE ROCHEFORT,
Professor of Political Science, the Graduate School, Georgetown University.

STOP THIS COMMUNIST SWINDLE

A Moscow-fathered petition for peace is presently being circulated throughout the world. It is a fraud and a fake, but in the countries subjugated by Soviet Russia, it is treason to refuse to sign it. Unfortunately there are many naive persons here in the United States and elsewhere who have signed after little or no scrutiny, believing it quite natural and commendable to proclaim one's love of peace and to denounce war.

The text of the Soviet sham contains a veritable pledge to support communism and the Soviets against all comers—even one's own country. Such is the basic element of any swindle—to deceive, to confuse, to defraud. The U. S. S. R. and Communist units throughout the world work for dictatorship everywhere, and their methods do not stop short of war. From the coup of Lenin in 1919 in Russia, when a democratically elected National Assembly with a strong anti-Communist majority had just been elected, to the Communist coups in very similar circumstances in Hungary and Czechoslovakia after World War II, communism has meant the rule of the usurpers and tyrants, pretending to speak in the name of the masses whom they despise, and whom they have enslaved.

We denounce the Stockholm petition as a contemptible fraud. The peace that it demands is a peace on Soviet terms. A veritable pledge to support communism and the U. S. S. R. against all comers, even against one's own country, is concealed in its intentionally obscure text.

Yet, loathsome as this deception is, the hypocrisy of its sponsers is even more intolerable. How dare the minions of the Soviet Government demand peace, when that government alone stands in the way of it?

Soviet Russia planned, unleashed and continues to suppport the aggression in Korea. Soviet Russia barred the United Nations commission from North Korea and demands North Korean representation at the United Nations. Soviet-dominated North Korea ignored the cease-fire order of the UN Security Council. Only after this did the United States by United Nations direction undertake security operations in invaded South Korea. But meanwhile Mr. Malik uses his position at Lake Success to the advantage of the rebels against international law.

The long and careful preparation of this aggression on the part of the Soviet Government is proved beyond all doubt. It appears in the quantity and quality of weapons placed by the Soviets in the hands of North Korean Communists. The subtleties of the solemn diplomatic procedure prevent the Western Powers from naming at the UN tribune the real aggressor—U. S. S. R. But silence cannot change the reality of things. The innumerable tanks and guns used by the North Korean violators of the peace are Russian-made. The North Korean officers are for the most part Russian-trained.

We proclaim that the U. S. S. R. has violated world peace. The U. S. S. R. is guilty of the bloodshed in Korea, of the murder of the defenders of the peace. And now the Soviet aggressors circulate a petition for peace—to serve their own rapacious ends. Those who sign it are knaves or fools. Criminals must be prevented from committing their crime; fools shown the folly of their ways.

At this moment thousands of misguided persons in this country, unaware of being led by Moscow agents, are demanding the recall of American troops from Korea. But does one demand the withdrawal of police from the scene of a crime?

Rather let the American people, and the free people of the world, sign this petition, demanding that the Soviet Union stop the aggression in Korea, withdraw the Communist troops, and cease threatening the peace of the peoples of the world.

We, the undersigned professors and students of the Graduate School of Georgetown University, make this appeal to all the peace- and freedom-loving men and we ask the entire American people to take the initiative in this world-wide manifestation for a true and lawful peace.

The Korean Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY O. TALLE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an open letter which I addressed to the Honorable Warren R. Austin, United States Representative to the United Nations, under date of December 5, and his reply of December 9.

Delegate Austin's quiet confidence that progress is being made in solving the Korean crisis should bring new strength and courage and hope to the free peoples of the world. The above-mentioned follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 5, 1950.

Hon. WARREN R. AUSTIN,
Representative of the United States to the United Nations and United States Representative in the Security Council, United States Mission to the United Nations, Lake Success, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. AUSTIN: I am being bombarded with letters from constituents—the majority of whom I know personally to be responsible, patriotic citizens—demanding that United States troops be withdrawn from Korea, that our Nation return to extremely nationalistic policies in foreign affairs, that we in fact withdraw from the United Nations. Many of these letters are written by frantically worried wives, parents, and other relatives of boys now fighting in Korea.

Frankly, I believe that the United Nations itself is largely responsible for this rising tide of unfavorable public opinion. I refer specifically to the exceedingly dilatory manner in which your organization is acting in the face of the Chinese Communist aggression aimed directly at UN fighting forces.

Obviously, the delegates from the freedom-loving nations can do nothing to end Russian obstruction in the Security Council, under existing rules of procedure. And yet, the delegates from the free countries have permitted nearly a month to be frittered away in meaningless deliberations within the Security Council since being officially notified of the Red aggression.

Stop this senseless waste of precious time. Act and act now—before it is too late—through the vetoproof General Assembly. Brand this barbaric aggression for what it is. Authorize the Commander of the UN forces to use every weapon, every man, and every means available to achieve honorable peace. Yes, I refer to atomic weapons, to Chinese Nationalist troops, and to obstacles that prevent strategic bombing of supply bases. Let the world know that the United Nations will not tolerate offenses against mankind, will not comprise sacred principles, will not appease the blood-thirsty bullies in the family of nations. Make it clear for all to see that the United Nations is truly a powerful force against evil.

In this connection, let me respectfully suggest that it is high time the help of Almighty God be invoked in UN deliberations. I am aware that your rules of procedure do not make such provision—for fear, I suppose, of offending the delegates from godless nations. But I have never heard of a better recipe for the promotion of peace and understanding among the nations and peoples of the world than is contained in the Golden Rule and the Sermon on the Mount. The world's problems would be solved with little difficulty if the precepts laid down by the Great Teacher who wrought and taught on the shores of Galilee were observed faithfully by men in high places.

I write this letter because I fear that the very existence of the United Nations is at stake in the present crisis. A continuation of the present confusion, ineptness, weakness, and futile gestures will inevitably result in the tragic dissolution of what I consider the greatest experiment in international cooperation ever attempted by man. Believe me, sir, I support the United Nations with all my heart and strength, because I believe that within its structure is contained the world's best hope for achieving a just and lasting peace. If we fail in this mighty endeavor, it is my considered judgment that mankind will undergo a blood bath that will mean the end of our civilization as we know it today. God forbid this disaster.

With expressions of high esteem and kind regards, I am,

Faithfully,

HENRY O. TALLE,
Member of Congress.

UNITED STATES REPRESENTATIVE TO THE UNITED NATIONS,
New York City, December 9, 1950.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN TALLE: Thank you, from the bottom of my heart, for your fine letter of the 5th.

Please acquit me of undertaking to debate with you the various points to which you refer. I have had thousands of letters throughout the past few months, many of which indicate the impression that futility, ineptness, and confusion prevail. I would be derelict in my duty if I did not say to you that you need not be discouraged. The apparent slowness of procedure in the Security Council does not mean lack of progress. While a great deal of time is consumed in long speeches in various languages which require many translations, liaison is in progress which is not disclosed in television, radio, or press. The great and complex problems with which we deal are not really solved in the debates and by the votes, either in the Security Council or in the General Assembly. They are solved in the hearts and minds of men. From your own experience, you have a better perception than your letter writers of the work that must be done among 60 nations of different traditions and customs and tongues, in order to arrive at harmony.

You speak of faith in Almighty God to help our deliberations. I am glad to have you mention this. I know that we could not make progress at all without the help of God, but that, too, works quietly, in the hearts and minds of men.

Much negotiation and hard work out of sight of the public is going on all the time. We are constantly at work preventing proliferation of numerous ideas on each problem and the loss of that sound agreement, or assent, which consolidates cooperation upon a single effective solution.

So it is with the immediate crisis. What appears to be "delegates from the free countries (permitting) nearly a month to be frittered away * * *" is not as it appears.

The first step required us to consolidate our forces which were believed to be pulling apart because of numerous different propositions for the solution. This has effectively been done, and will be consummated in a vote in the General Assembly on the six-power resolution.

I cannot take more of your time in this letter. I hope you will feel less depressed about the appearance of things. We now feel confident that we can pull together the free countries in a strong unity, and after that first step has been taken, more definite, specific solutions will be possible.

I wish to encourage you to express your views to me at all times.

With kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

WARREN R. AUSTIN.

An Educational Project That Deserves the Support of Every American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLEVELAND M. BAILEY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, an educational project has been launched in the National Capital by a group of clear-thinking newspapermen, magazine writers, and authors, that deserves the support of every American citizen. I refer to the educational plan designed to give our people a clearer picture of the work of this great Congress and its Members, introduced by the Committee for Congress, which proposes to use Your Congress magazine, radio, television, motion pictures, and other informational and educational media to explain the functions of Congress more intimately. It is desired to give the widest possible publicity to this endeavor, and I request the publication of the following correspondence:

DECEMBER 4, 1950.

Mr. HAL J. MILLER,
Editor, Your Congress Magazine,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MILLER: I read your letter of November 27 with considerable interest; and I am pleased to know that the Fourth Estate is actively interested in selling the Congress to the people of America.

While time does not permit me to go into this matter in detail, I do want to mention that this field is a virgin one. I am sure you and your group can render valuable service.

I will appreciate your keeping me advised of developments, and, in the interim, advising me of any manner in which I may serve you.

Sincerely yours,
CLEVELAND M. BAILEY,
Member of Congress,
Third District, West Virginia.

COMMITTEE FOR CONGRESS,
Washington, December 5, 1950.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN BAILEY: I can't begin to tell you how grateful we were to receive your letter of December 4, expressing your support of our effort to get more specific, factual material out to our people, into our schools and colleges, on how Americans can work more closely with their Congress and its Members.

Your letter is typical of messages of commendation we are receiving from Senators and Congressmen of all political allegiance.

You had phrased your letter so graphically that I think it would be extremely helpful to the whole effort of the Committee for Congress if it could be reproduced in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

You can depend upon it that we will call upon you for actual help in this endeavor—in fact we must have the participation of every Member of the House and the Senate if it is to succeed.

Yours truly,
HAL J. MILLER,
Editor, Your Congress Magazine, Executive Director, Committee for Congress, Sponsor of Congress Study Councils.

Following are a few of the many letters of commendation regarding the education program of the Congress Study Council received by the Committee for Congress:

NOVEMBER 29, 1950.

DEAR MR. MILLER: Thank you for your letter of November 27 and the enclosed copy of the current issue of the magazine, Your Congress.

I read with interest the statement as to the objectives of the publication and of the Committee For Congress. It seems to me that your objectives are very meritorious, inasmuch as I think there is a great need for a full understanding of the workings of our Government on the part of everyone. This is particularly true in the present trying international situation.

With kindest regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,
CHARLES E. BENNETT,
Member of Congress,
Second District, Florida.

NOVEMBER 28, 1950.

DEAR MR. MILLER: This will respectfully acknowledge and thank you for your communication of November 27, in which you enclosed copy of the publication, Your Congress Magazine. You state this publication is dedicated to creating a wider appreciation and understanding of the vital work of the Congress and the Government of the United States.

Certainly, this is a most laudable undertaking and I am confident that these lofty objectives of your mazagine will serve a very useful purpose.

With good wishes, I am,
Sincerely,
F. ERTEL CARLYLE,
Member of Congress, Seventh District, North Carolina.

NOVEMBER 29, 1950.

DEAR MR. MILLER: I wish to thank you for your nice letter and magazine. I have enjoyed looking over it and think there is no doubt that there is a great need for the type of magazine you have indicated you will publish. If I can be of assistance in giving you information, I will be glad to do so. As a former professor of political science, quite naturally I would be interested in a project such as you have discussed.

Sincerely yours,
M. G. BURNSIDE,
Member of Congress, Fourth District, West Virginia.

NOVEMBER 28, 1950.

DEAR MR. MILLER: You are to be commended for your undertaking. Every individual should read Your Congress Magazine.

Any criticism of Congress, whether constructive or destructive, is a reflection upon the people, because our Representatives in Congress are chosen by the people through a democratic process.

With kindest regards and all good wishes for success, I remain,
Most sincerely yours,
VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Member of Congress,
Seventh District, Oklahoma.

NOVEMBER 30, 1950.

DEAR MR. MILLER: It seems to me that the thought in issuing this Congress Magazine is a very fine one and should result in much benefit in acquainting the country with the work of the Congress and the responsibilities resting upon its membership. With sentiments of esteem and regard, I am,
Yours very truly,
CLYDE M. HOEY,
United States Senate.

We would appreciate receiving a copy of Your Congress Magazine.
RUTH FINE,
Librarian, Bureau of the Budget Library.

Please put us on the mailing list for Your Congress Magazine.
HAZEL E. ARMSTRONG,
Librarian, Indiana State Teachers College Library, Terre Haute, Ind.

Please send information regarding the periodical Your Congress Magazine, and your educational program on behalf of Congress.
Yours truly,
Sister M. CATHERINE JOSEPH,
Immaculata College, Immaculata, Pa.

Stop Appeasing, Warns Jacobs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES E. NOLAND

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. NOLAND. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a newspaper article from the Indianapolis Times. The thoughts contained in this article are especially appropriate at this time.

DEAR BOSS

(By Dan Kidney)

STOP APPEASING, WARNS JACOBS—HE MEANS WITH ALLIES AS WELL AS OUR ENEMIES

WASHINGTON, December 11.—"The time is now here to end appeasement—not only of our enemies but of our allies."

That was the reaction to the Truman-Attlee statement of Representative ANDREW JACOBS, Indianapolis Democrat, as he paused in the midst of packing his files to return to law practice after a single term here.

The war and what to do about it will be with Mr. JACOBS, even though he was defeated for Congress by Republican Charles B. Brownson. His 18-year-old son, Andy, Jr., is in the marines.

During his single term in the House, Mr. JACOBS won considerable acclaim as an independent thinker and colleagues on both sides of the aisle have praised him from the floor.

When asked what he thought of the White House communiqué which was issued after the talks here between Prime Minister Attlee, of Great Britain, and President Truman, the homespun Hoosier philosopher-statesman said:

"It was a 5,000-word rewrite which changed nothing at all."

Upset by attitude

He then took up the matter of appeasement and declared he had been upset by the attitude of the United States delegation to the United Nations.

"For fear of offending our allies, such as England and France, we have pursued a policy of appeasement unworthy of our own great moral aims if we are to succeed in world leadership," said Mr. JACOBS.

"The late Gilbert Chesterton once said, 'It is easier to die for one's country than to tell her the truth.' That, in my opinion, is the road we have been following with our allies in United Nations.

"From the very outset, we should have said to Great Britain that imperialism of any sort, including her own, is outmoded in the modern world. To France we should say 'Give up the colonialism which you are seeking to continue in Indochina. That would leave Russia alone in the new imperialist business, and we could point with scorn to her retrogressive aggressions."

Losing propaganda war

"Instead, we haven't said what we really feel, so the Communist countries, under Moscow direction, have been winning the great world propaganda war."

Mr. JACOBS said he saw nothing in the Truman-Attlee statement about the British giving up trading with Communist China through Hong Kong, and that this is the sort of Allied appeasement that is being paid for in American lives.

"We should have had United Nations commissions in Korea long before the war started, investigating stories about rice speculation by the Rhee government and anything else that we knew was wrong," said Mr. JACOBS.

"Entrance of the Chinese Communists into the conflict is a new matter for us to deal with, of course. But a rereading of history will reveal that long before communism was born the Chinese were fighting to repel any foe from the Korean Peninsula. They were doing that before the foundation of Jamestown was laid in 1625. Their present actions are not new, only new to us."

Voted against aid

"Knowing that much of history, I declined to vote for Korean aid and was against involvement there except under the United Nations banner. I knew we had no stanch friends in the Orient and were completely unprepared to fight over there."

Mr. JACOBS is hopeful that a cease-fire order can be brought about and the whole Korean matter settled without further war and bloodshed.

"The United States must stand for justice and be its advocate always in United Nations councils," he concluded. "It is never too late to do the right thing. We have merely been silly, while Russia has been sinister and vicious. I do not believe we will offend our real allies if we tell them frankly that we are not merely buying alliances, but want their support for the free world on the basis of justice and of truth."

Industrial Strength and National Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACK Z. ANDERSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPPESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in this RECORD, I am including an address by T. S. Petersen, president of the Standard Oil Co. of California. I have read the speech carefully. I agree with what Mr. Petersen says and I commend his remarks to the attention of my colleagues.

What a strange and paradoxical situation—the same Government that is asking industry to rebuild our sinews of war is, at the same time, trying to tear apart the system that built these industries. Apparently the Department of Justice is undertaking to make a sin of efficiency, a crime of success, a felony of size—and a corpse of private enterprise.

In view of the current critical world situation I would earnestly recommend that the Attorney General take another long look at the suit he has filed against seven major oil companies in California, and then withdraw it so we can get on with our national defense preparations—unhampered, unfettered, and free to do the job that lies ahead.

It is a pleasure to see so many of our Sacramento friends on this occasion and I must say that Bill Haines and I and everybody else in our organization appreciates the fact that you have taken the time to come here today.

Next week the petroleum industry of the United States celebrates its annual oil-progress week, so my appearance here today is somewhat in the nature of a curtain-raiser to the main show. If you are not familiar with it, I might explain that the purpose of oil-progress week is to show the American people how the oil industry operates to serve them. Refineries, laboratories and other facilities will be thrown open to thousands of visitors and oil men will take to the road and talk to whatever group will listen to them—even as I am doing here today.

I am not going to attempt to cover the complexities and the general achievements of the oil industry in serving the public, but rather to talk about perhaps the most important thing confronting our Nation today—national defense. As the military saying goes, the battle is the payoff, so the ability of our country to defend itself is the payoff. Thus, in speaking of the progress of the petroleum industry, I should like to discuss a very related and pertinent subject, Industrial Strength and National Security.

INDUSTRIAL STRENGTH AND NATIONAL SECURITY

Since the outbreak of the Korean war, we have been doing some clearer thinking about a lot of things. As a Nation we suddenly realized that the great differences between our disarmed defense establishment and the war machine of the Soviet Union and its helpers had to be corrected in the shortest possible time.

Moreover, it seems a matter of sober fact that many years of preparedness loom ahead of us, whether we have cold war or hot war, or that ultimate of tragedies, the third world war. As a nation, we are facing the fact that we must be strong and continue strong if we are to resist the tide of aggression and oppression that has swept over so much of the world. Indeed, it is no longer a necessity for resistance only, but a more positive determination to take whatever steps are necessary to preserve human and individual liberty.

So with the attack on Korea we started immediately building up the manpower of our Army, Navy, and the Air Force—to say nothing of the Marines. And, at the same time, the Government started placing orders for those highly specialized kinds of military equipment necessary to fight a mechanized war. Contracts went to concerns like General Motors, and General Electric, and du Pont, and the big aircraft companies, and the big oil companies.

More of these orders are going out every day. This is imperative. No modern fighting force can be any better than the tools it is given to fight with.

Now, if these orders to the big and capable producers of such weapons are natural and logical, it would also seem natural that the Government should take pains to see that these producers could remain sound and strong. They should be able to carry out every assignment that might come their way in the course of the critical days ahead. In other words, it would seem the height of reckless bad judgment, while passing out these orders, to send out crews with sledge hammers and cutting torches to break up the assembly lines and carve up the factories and seal off the doors and gates by which capacity operations are maintained.

Yet, strangely enough, some people in Government for some time have been carrying out policies that work toward just that kind of result.

While money and effort have been poured into building up our national strength on the one hand, some elements in Washington are seeking to break up many of the larger companies and industries that make up the bulk of our production capacity. The tools in their hands are numerous, but the most dangerously used has been the ideologically conceived antitrust suit. We in the west coast oil industry face such a suit and so do General Electric and du Pont, which I mentioned a moment ago as among those to whom the military services first turned.

I am an oil man, not a military or political expert, but I think I know a glaring inconsistency when I see one. That's exactly what these antitrust suits against big business amount to. If you remember where the tools of war came from last time, you can rest assured they must come from the same places this time, only a lot more of them.

The Army, Navy, and Air Force were the pillars of our fighting strength, and those pillars rested on the solid foundation of the Nation's industrial capacity.

As a matter of fact, our comparative situation today is somewhat like the situation back there on the eve of World War II. Then, as now, we had a small army, with inadequate equipment. We didn't own many airplanes. Our combat ships had begun to get out of date and were embarrassingly low on fire power. We didn't look as though we could be of much account in any kind of a war.

So Tojo and Hitler jumped us. And promptly, all eyes turned to the only source from which fast production in quantity could be hoped—big business.

The story, or at least the rough statistics of it, is familiar to you. The Armed Forces asked for 50,000 planes, more as a brave gesture than actual hope. They got 300,000. The Navy asked for ships and sea-going craft of all kinds. It got 77,000 of them. The Army asked for tanks, and got 86,000 of them. It asked for artillery weapons and got a third of a million.

And because it was, from start to finish, a motorized, mechanized, horsepower war, they all asked for oil, and they got 5,000,000,000 barrels of it from domestic production, and another three quarters of a billion barrels from American wells abroad.

Those are the figures. And what made them possible was swift, expert mass production—the knowledge and experience of big business, which was given the biggest share of the responsibility for getting the job done.

Hitler knew about horsepower as the determining force in modern war. He had set himself a schedule of massing horsepower for military use—20,000 tanks and 20,000 planes. It was them an unheard of total of horsepower for mobility and striking power. And when he had it, he put it to work.

But as Charles Kettering recalled with grim confidence in the Spring of 1942, Hitler, in his careful calculations, hadn't tagged quite all the bases. He overlooked the fact that while America looked like a big, soft, easy-going country, our high standard of living was based solidly upon a system of harnessed, applied horsepower. This was what Americans had demanded of their big industries, and the industries had given it to them. And, in giving it to them, the industries had to grow up to the size and capacity necessary for the job.

So it was possible for Kettering, in that dark spring of 1942, to say with absolute conviction: "Time will show that the Axis picked the wrong opponent when they picked the United States to fight a horsepower war."

Three years later Hitler perished in the rubble of Berlin, and a few months afterward the Japanese war lords bowed in surrender.

The production that made victory possible was not a job for men inexperienced in thinking in big terms. It was a task for those to whom big jobs were routine, men and industries whose survival in fields of intense competition depended upon serving up miracles in minmums of time and lost motion.

The job couldn't have been done without the science of mass production—the capacity not only to build intricate weapons, but the flexibility to produce them in whatever quantity was wanted; by the hundreds, thousands, or millions. The capacity to build them well, and to build them quickly. The capacity to take the specifications of a four-engine bomber like the Liberator—with its half-million separate parts and 30,000 separate assemblies—and turn out the finished product at the amazing rate of one an hour.

We came into the last war with a daily production of 40,000 barrels of 100-octane aviation gasoline, and had shot past half a million barrels a day when the fighting ended. When Hitler marched into Poland we had just topped a production rate of 2,000 military planes a year. At the high point we were pouring them out at better than 100,000 a year—bigger, faster, more rugged planes by far than those at the beginning. Starting from scratch we mass-produced everything from K-rations to cargo ships.

This was the industrial ability that got rolling at such fantastic speed that the Government had to put the brakes on it while the war was still in full swing. It was the knowing how that prompted Winston Churchill to observe, on Thanksgiving Day of 1944: "In 3 or 4 years the United States has in sober fact become the greatest military, naval, and air power in the world." It inspired Marshal Stalin himself to hoist a glass to American industrial production, without which, he said, "the United Nations never could have won the war." Rest assured that Stalin hasn't forgotten those words.

World War II brought into the open, for all the world to see, this astounding adaptability of American industry to the purposes of modern military production. But even the most severe demands made upon the American industrial plant in World War II did not bring out the full power of the system. We were just getting ready to shift into high gear when the opposition folded. If we had ever pushed the throttle to the floor board the result would have been something to behold.

In the shadow cast by the Korean outbreak we can be thankful that the effort last time did not represent our full power.

It is as certain as tomorrow's sunrise that if the present grim situation explodes into an all-out conflict we must have far more strength even than it took to turn back the Axis Powers in World War II. We face a stronger enemy, and the face of warfare itself has changed radically since then. We know this, because we have had previews of some of the weapons with which the next war will be fought.

The atomic bomb was a triumph of American industrial techniques, made possible by harnessing the power of dozens of great industrial concerns, together with the skills of the scientists in a team devoted to a job that had been viewed as superhuman. And that was a job taken on in addition to the other tremendous mass-production assignments handed big business as its share of the war effort.

Nobody knows what a future conflict might be like, but even atomic war will still be a horsepower war. There will have to be great bombers to transport the bombs, and great engines to power the bombers. There will have to be swarms of pursuit craft and fighters flying faster than the speed of sound to challenge the enemy's bomber fleet when it comes. We will need, once more, great fleets of ships to transport the men, machines, supplies, and fuel to those far bases from which we can most effectively fight the enemy. We will have to have fast vehicles for the land forces, and swift, mechanized artillery. For Korea has proved that a war in this decade, as in the one just past, will have to be fought on the ground as well as in the air.

In all categories the output of horsepower will have to be far greater than last time, because the trend is toward greater and greater speed, and the requirements of horsepower increase as speed increases.

These are the things we know about—these are the challenges that we can expect to face. And no one can say what new miracles, what unforeseen wonders of ingenuity and mass production we shall have to achieve to meet the new challenges that a new war always brings.

That production will come from those who have the capacity for it, be it from the automobile industry, the aviation industry, or steel.

You would get the fuel from the only industry in the world that is versed in the fueling of that kind of massed machinery—the American petroleum industry. And so with the guns and submarines and steel and electrical equipment, and all the rest of the stuff that goes into the fighting of a modern war. Only big business, American big business, has the organizational skill, the resources, the technique to produce on that scale.

I do not mean to imply that big business can carry the whole load on its own shoulders—that wasn't the case last time and under our system it won't be the case in any future time. However, in big business we have the shape of the things we may need.

No large business stands by itself; every big corporation is simply a focal point in a group of enterprises, linked to all the others in a condition of mutual dependency. They all have hundreds or thousands of suppliers.

For example, the Cadillac branch of General Motors has been given a big order for tanks. Cadillac will build those tanks and send them off its assembly line. But into the building of them will go parts from 600 other firms, large and small. It's the same with almost any other complex operation you can name in the realm of big industry. The bigger the business in general, the wider the scope of its dependence upon smaller firms for specific collateral jobs. And, of course, this dependency is mutual—the smaller firms make their own profits from the goods produced for the big fellows.

The assembly line, viewed in this way, is something more than a runway along which flow cars or tanks or airplanes. It is an industrial network covering hundreds of miles, often reaching into the far corners of the land, with the big outfit in the center responsible for the teamwork and the finished product, but every last member playing an indispensable role in the game.

So when I speak of the prowess of big business I am not speaking only of the capacities of the 50, or 100, or 200 biggest industrial corporations in the country. I am actually talking about the whole American industrial system, with all of its elements, large and middle-sized and small. They are all joined together in this business system of ours. They pull together in beautiful teamwork when there is a man-sized job to do. Stalin could copy our atomic bomb, but I do not think he could duplicate this industrial system in generations of whip-cracking and master-minding.

Because the efficiency of this highly intricate, delicately balanced production system stems from the freedom in which it has developed. Free people, free to buy where and what they chose, automatically have sought out the firm that provided the best goods for the lowest cost. Under this system of natural selection, inefficiency was constantly weeded out, while efficiency was constantly encouraged to flourish. It could never be that way under a system of political selection, and a look around the world will prove that it isn't that way now.

The bonus that the American system of freedom puts on efficiency does not mean that efficiency can only come with bigness. What it does mean is that in each field of enterprise, the most efficient firms will develop automatically to whatever size will best suit the particular purpose. Big business would be sadly out of place in those fields where high quality can only be obtained through the individual, personal handicraft of the worker, or where demand will never be sufficient to require the great bulk and expense of mass-production equipment. But small business would be equally out of place in those fields where the demand is for vast quantities of products of standard quality and performance, and at minimum cost.

That's how it has worked in this country, and it has been a system that has worked overwhelmingly to the benefit of the Nation, in peace and in war. It has also worked for the benefit of small- and middle-sized businesses, which have been winning an increasing share of the Nation's total trade over the past couple of decades.

It is a powerful, prolific, incredibly bountiful system, but it is not a tamper-proof system. Rugged as it is, its balance is as delicate as any other great, smooth-functioning, complicated mechanism. You can't interfere with its basic structure, and expect its performance to continue normally.

This is exactly what some elements in our Government have been trying to do, and if the effort prevails, the results are clearly predictable.

On this, I can speak with intimate, personal knowledge, as a consequence of the antitrust suit recently filed against Standard Oil Co. of California and six other of the larger west coast companies. The suit is a hodge-podge of synthetic and baseless charges, all leading up to the theory that the seven companies taken as a whole are too big and hence must be broken up.

Well, the oil industry always has been one to plan ahead for the future. In peace, it fuels and powers our high-riding economy and in war it has always been able to provide the necessary amounts of petroleum. In the last 5 years, the industry has expanded enormously, so that today it is in the best shape it ever has been to meet any national emergency. This accomplishment has been made possible by the competitive activities of the 34,000 companies and individual operators who comprise the industry. They range in size all the way from the single-rig wild-catter, to the large integrated companies, who handle petroleum and its products all the way from the well to the consumer.

In giving credit to all who comprise the very complex oil industry, I must be realistic and say that I think there were many things involved that could have been done only by the big, integrated companies.

Exploration and oil-field development in wilderness areas remote from available markets is one example of what they have done. Offshore drilling, a very costly operation, is another. Pipeline and tanker construction demand large outlays. Modern refinery units that accomplish chemical miracles on a vast scale are multi-million-dollar jobs. So is research, which, by and large is done by the bigger companies. The results of this research benefit the industry as a whole and the public, too, in new and improved petroleum products. Integration provides the flexibility that has been a distinguishing characteristic of the oil industry.

The suit hits directly at the principle of integration in the oil industry. At the same time, it is integration that has made possible the really large-scale transportation, processing, distribution, and marketing of petroleum and its products, at lowest cost. These operations fall naturally into a single, unified, and flexible sequence.

As the war in the Pacific developed, the military services turned to us and the other larger companies for the flood of petroleum products we could supply because of our size and the extensive nature of our facilities. Yet, this size and our operation of these facilities are called wrong by the antitrust suit.

I spoke of the tremendous expansion of the oil industry in the past 5 years. I do not think it could have been accomplished had we been working under the rules the Antitrust Division seeks to apply to enforce the theory that bigness is automatically badness. Nor do I think that we could repeat that expansion on the west coast in the future if we and the other defendants were to be dismembered.

We are not the only targets of this attack on bigness; many of our other basic industries have suits pending against them or threatened. The action against General Electric, for instance, proposes to cut down the volume of electric-light bulbs GE would be allowed to make. It is held to be a crime to make the kind of product the people seem to want.

In whatever degree the fragmentation of our great industries is carried out, those elements of efficiency that are gained through bigness will be diminished. The economies resulting from mass purchasing materials will dwindle. The great research divisions devoted to seeking new techniques will be shrunk or broken apart and their efficiency impaired. The concentrations of capital that make possible extensive exploration and experimentation in new fields will be divided, and their capacities curtailed.

But most vital of all, the very processes of mass production will be in important respects thrown radically off stride, and their efficiency nullified.

There are many reasons why the American people can't afford to tolerate this kind of governmental interference at this time, or any time.

The very least effect of it would be to slacken the tempo of the whole economy. For it is a body blow at the very heart of our productivity—which at this time in history means also the security of the free world. If the effort were to succeed, some part of the productive efficiency of every firm affected would be lost, directly or indirectly. Goods wouldn't be produced so well, so cheaply. The consumer, faced with reduced value at higher costs on all the items where big industries are the producers, would reasonably curtail his buying. Production would automatically drop off as buying slowed, and that contraction would have its damaging effect upon employment, and the momentum of money. There is no surer way to start the downward spiral toward economic depression than this kind of arbitrary tinkering.

Moreover, if the Government says that a given company is too big, it's also saying to the consumer: "You're buying too much of this fellow's stuff; you've got to start buying where we tell you." Sometimes in our history, when rank instances of freeze-out monopoly have developed, drastic action has been necessary. But in the current series of antitrust actions, monopoly is simply made a synonym for size. It is verbal black magic. Monopoly is evil. Size is monopoly, therefore size is evil. It's all so simple if you start out with the preconceived notion that bigness is automatically badness. However, bigness is part of the American way of doing things and if it is wrong, so is that American way. If the American people are to be denied the right to build, through their selective patronage, the kind of enterprise of whatever size that can give them the best for their money, then they are going to be stripped of one of their basic freedoms.

These things—economic welfare and the freedom of the consumer to govern the economy—are always important; without them this country would be doomed to collapse over the long run. But important as they are, they become secondary in times like these when the very existence of the Nation is directly threatened.

The main thing now is to have ready at hand those things that we must have to defend ourselves—the material things, but quite as important, the continuing capacity to produce these material things. The security of the Nation is directly tied in with the security of business.

The great industries have not been marking time in the years since the close of the last war. Like the oil industry, other industries have expanded tremendously and are ready and eager to perform the miracles of which they are capable if given the occasion and the freedom they need. The steel industry's capacity is greater by 10 percent than at the midpoint of World War II, and still expanding. The automobile industry, already diverting some of its plant capacity to war order, is still turning out cars at a rate exceeding 6,000,000 per year. And so on through the roster of the giants.

Each of these industries, these masters of mass production, has proved its ability to turn out the weapons of war in the same high quality and matchless abundance as it turns out the implements of our peacetime living.

Together, they make up the only answer to the massed power of foreign aggression, and a convincing answer it is.

But they can't do the job without the strength and efficiency that come with bigness. They need it for the job ahead.

I don't know, precisely, what's behind the philosophy opposing big business, whether it is politicians hungry for power, or economic dreamers with collectivism on the brain, or just the busybody's instinct of meddling.

But whatever it is, the American people should insist that it be knocked off, and fast. We've got a war on our hands abroad—a war that may at any time blossom into the roughest, toughest life-and-death struggle our Nation has ever fought—and one war at a time is about all we can afford.

Advice by Bernard M. Baruch

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEROY JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to leave granted to me, I enclose a short editorial, written by Mr. Baruch on Thanksgiving Day, 1950.

As he points out, communism and inflation are threatening the existence of the American Republic. Inflation has caused such stupendous losses to many people that it is shocking. The value of the dollar has been depreciated so much in the past 10 years that hundreds of billions of dollars of purchasing power have been lost by the holders of life insurance policies. The buyers of our war bonds have also taken tremendous losses. The purchasing power of the dollar today, when some of the 10-year bonds are becoming due, is, in round figures, a third less than it was when the bulk of these bonds were bought in the early forties and up to 1945. The gross loss in buying power has been about $85,000,000,000. Furthermore, the end has not been reached. It seems like every group is dead set on getting all they can with no regard as to what the final outcome will be.

Now we are facing a very serious military threat to our security and even to our existence. I believe we should have some type of war controls promptly, or otherwise inflation will keep going down the merry road that leads to bankruptcy, which has been the lot of several other nations. Mr. Baruch has had a vast experience in handling economic and fiscal problems under war conditions. He knows whereof he speaks, and I think it is well that we listen and perhaps follow a man of his experience. The editorial follows:

AN EDITORIAL
(By Bernard M. Baruch)

On this Thanksgiving Day, rereading the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount, I find them still basic to human happiness and well-being, and I am thankful.

Contemplation of the Constitution and of our institutions and freedoms confirms my belief that we have the best Government in the world, and I am thankful.

Restudying addition, subtraction and division, I still think they are correct, and I am thankful.

As I view the wait-and-see, business-and-politics-as-usual attitude toward the menace of communism and its chief ally, inflation, I wonder whether we are gaining anything while we are losing our souls.

Freebooting is not a good substitute for free enterprise. Nor are appeasement of pressure groups and profiteering good substitutes for the profit system.

If we do not accept temporary denials and restrictions we will be exchanging our heritage as a free people for a mess of pottage of fictitious and fleeting prosperity.

If we lose, we lose forever the building of a peaceful world.

Shall "we nobly save or meanly lose the last best hope of man"?

REMARKS
OF
HON. W. KINGSLAND MACY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. MACY. Mr. Speaker, I am asking the privilege to publish in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the text of a complaint that I have just filed in the New York Supreme Court in an action for libel. I feel that my colleagues, in particular, and others might be interested in having this sworn information before them.

This action arises out of one of the unconscionable lies used against me in the last campaign, and I propose to scotch it forthwith. However, I have chosen to do so within the dignity of the courts instead of resorting to ineffectual and degrading denials. I intend to prosecute this case with all the vigor at my command in order to shed some light on the dark recesses where such reprehensible schemes are spawned. This will undoubtedly have a wholesome public effect generally.

SUPREME COURT, COUNTY OF NEW YORK, W. KINGSLAND MACY, PLAINTIFF, v. NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM CORP., DEFENDANT

Plaintiff complaining of the defendant by William Power Maloney, his attorney, alleges—

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

1. At all times hereinafter mentioned, the defendant above named was and still is a domestic corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of New York.

2. At all times hereinafter mentioned, the defendant was and still is engaged in the business of publishing, distributing, and circulating a newspaper known as the New York World-Telegram and the Sun, which newspaper has a wide circulation in and about the city of New York, its environs and elsewhere, including the counties of Nassau and Suffolk, in the State of New York.

3. The plaintiff herein is a member of the United States House of Representatives, having been duly elected from the First Congressional District of the State of New York in 1946 and reelected in 1948, each time by a large majority. Plaintiff has, for many years, been active and prominent in the political business and civic affairs of New York State and the Nation, having among other things served as chairman of the Suffolk County Republican Committee for more than 24 years, as chairman of the New York State Republican Committee for 4 years, as a delegate to the National Republican Convention held in 1928, 1932, 1940, 1944, and 1948, as a member of the Constitutional Convention of the State of New York, as a regent of the State of New York for more than 10 years, a position which he still holds, as a trustee of the Seamen's Bank for Savings in the city of New York for more than 15 years, a position which he still holds, as a director of the Southside Bank of Bayshore, New York for more than 10 years, a position which he still holds, and plaintiff has been for many years and still is actively associated with the publication of various newspapers having a wide circulation in Suffolk County, N. Y.

4. At the time of the publication of the false and defamatory matter as hereinafter set forth, plaintiff was the Republican candidate for reelection as a Member of the United States House of Representatives from the First Congressional District of the State of New York at the general election to be held on November 7, 1950, and was conducting an active campaign for reelection as the defendant well knew.

5. On the 18th day of October 1950, the defendant herein, did falsely and maliciously publish in its said newspaper, the New York World-Telegram and The Sun, issued on that day, of and concerning the plaintiff, and did cause to be circulated by means of the said newspaper in the places aforesaid, the following false and defamatory matter, to wit:

"HANLEY LETTER USED AT SPA TO AID MACY—SUFFOLK LEADER DEMANDED SENATE NOMINATION FOR SELF

"The now famous Joe R. Hanley letter was used at the GOP State convention in Saratoga Springs last month to further the Senatorial ambitions of Representative W. KINGSLAND MACY, Republican boss of Suffolk County.

"This was learned today from unimpeachable Republican sources as the letter's disclosure continued to generate impassioned oratory. * * *

"Went to party leader

"Top GOP sources disclosed that when Mr. MACY received the Hanley letter he immediately went to top Republican leaders then attending the Saratoga Springs convention, and demanded that he be nominated for the Senate.

"Mr. MACY, a bitter foe of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey's leadership of the party, has long held senatorial ambitions. * * *

"At this point it was learned, Mr. MACY attended a conference of Republican leaders. Governor Dewey was not present. At the meeting Mr. MACY proposed he be nominated for the Senate. He agreed that Governor Dewey should run again, but that Mr. Hanley run for reelection as lieutenant governor.

"According to several persons present at the meeting, Mr. MACY threatened to make the Hanley letter public if he failed to receive the Senate nomination.

"Deal is turned down

"But, these sources said, Mr. MACY was told there would be no such deal.

"'All right,' one Republican leader told him, 'go ahead and make the letter public and we will tell the story of how you were using the letter.' * * *

"Mr. MACY, apparently irate at the treatment accorded his request, failed to sit with the Suffolk delegation, of which he has been leader for nearly two decades, on nominations day."

6. The said words and statements as hereinabove set forth were and are wholly false and untrue.

7. By the words "the now famous Joe R. Hanley letter" set forth in paragraph 5 hereof, defendant intended to and did refer to a letter addressed to plaintiff by one Joe R. Hanley, then and now lieutenant governor of the State of New York, dated September 5, 1950, and reading as follows:

THE SENATE,
STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, September 5, 1950.

DEAR KING: After further consultation with my oculist and another who has called in for consultation, I have been forced to the position that I dare not gamble on my future.

Today I had a conference with the Governor in which certain unalterable and unquestionably definite propositions were made to me. If I will consent to take the nomination to the United States Senate, I am definitely assured of being able to clean up my financial obligations within 90 days, so that I would be clear for the first time in 20 years of my life. I am assured of an adequate living compensation if elected, in a perfectly legal and unquestionable way. Also I have an iron-clad, unbreakable arrangement whereby I will be given a job with the State which I would like and enjoy (I have been told what it is) at sufficient compensation to make my net income more than I now have. This removes all the gamble from the picture and will enable me to face the future with confidence and the knowledge that even if I lost my eyesight, I would still have a comfortable living and be able to do the duties evolving upon me.

After long and painful deliberation and in consultation with my whole family, I have reached the conclusion that I cannot afford to gamble with my future, as things now are. Therefore tomorrow morning I am going to announce that, if the delegates will nominate me for the office of United States Senator, I will accept.

I am not talking with you because, to be perfectly honest and frank, I have neither the courage nor the strength to do so. I feel very deeply that I have somehow let you all down and perhaps I have. If you feel bitter, I can understand why, but I can assure you that within a short time you will receive from me every cent that I owe you, and at least you will note that part of the investment.

I shall always think of you with nothing but admiration and love. You and Mr. Gannett have been wonderful and the only bright spot in the whole terrible picture is that I shall be able within a reasonable time, to pay you both in full.

I am humiliated, disappointed, and heartsick, but in fairness to myself, to you to whom I am indebted, and to my family, I can do nothing else. Please try to see this in the fairest light possible.

Every gratefully,

JOE.

8. By the words "GOP State Convention in Saratoga Springs last month" set forth in paragraph 5 hereof, defendant intended to and did refer to the convention of the Republican Party of New York State held at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., on September 6 and 7, 1950, for the purpose of nominating candidates for the offices of Governor and United States Senator among others, at which convention Thomas E. Dewey was a candidate for the nomination for governor and Joe R. Hanley was a candidate for nomination as United States Senator.

9. The so-called Hanley letter, a copy of which is set forth in paragraph 7 hereof, was published in full or in part in various and sundry newspapers published in New York City and numerous other cities throughout New York State and the Nation on October 16, 17 and 18, 1950, and quoted by various and sundry local and national radio news commentators on those days, and was widely read and discussed by the public at large, and charges were made repeatedly on the radio and otherwise by the Democratic candidate for governor, coincidentally with and following the publication of the said Hanley letter, which charges also received widespread publication in various newspapers published in New York City and elsewhere, that the said Hanley letter constituted an admission by the said Hanley, that he had been a party to a corrupt agreement with the said Dewey, whereby, in consideration of Hanley withdrawing his candidacy for the Republican nomination for Governor in favor of the nomination of the said Dewey and accepting for himself the Republican nomination for United States Senator, the said Dewey would arrange that all of the personal debts of said Hanley amounting to many thousands of dollars, would be paid.

10. The defendant in and by the publication aforesaid, meant and intended to charge and did charge that the plaintiff herein employed and made use of the said "now famous Joe R. Hanley letter" mentioned in the said publication in an attempt to obtain for himself the Republican nomination for United States Senator under threat of making the said Hanley letter public if he did not receive the Republican nomination for United States Senator and the defendant in and by the publication aforesaid, meant and intended to charge and did charge that the plaintiff in fact and in effect had attempted to extort the nomination for United States Senator from the Republican leaders and the delegates at the Republican State convention held at Saratoga Springs as hereinbefore stated under threat of making a public disclosure of the contents of the said letter and the corrupt agreement between the said Dewey and Hanley therein referred to; that the plaintiff had attempted to blackmail the said Republican leaders and delegates to the said Republican convention into nominating him for the United States Senate, and the plaintiff was unfit to hold public office.

11. The false and defamatory matter set forth in paragraph 5 hereof was known to the defendant to be false and untrue, and was published by the defendant with actual malice toward the plaintiff with the intent and for the purpose of injuring plaintiff in his reputation, in his feelings, and in his official capacity, and accomplishing his defeat at the election to be held on November 7, 1950, and in reckless disregard of the rights of plaintiff.

12. That by reason of said publication aforesaid, the plaintiff has been injured in his good name, fame, credit, and reputation, both as a man and in the various public and private positions, callings, and lines of endeavor followed by him, and in his feelings, mind and body, and has been held up to ridicule and contempt of his friends, acquaintances, and the public, and has suffered loss of prestige and standing in his community and elsewhere, all to his damage in the sum of $250,000.

Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant in the sum of $250,000 together with the costs and disbursements of this action.

Revised Constitution and Bylaws of American Veterans of World War II (AMVETS) Represents Great Record of Veterans Patriotic Service Organization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, on November 6, 1945, on page A4736, volume 91, part 13, of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Seventy-ninth Congress, it was my privilege to there extend my remarks and to include therein the constitution, bylaws, and list of elected officers of the AMVETS. It was the first constitution and bylaws of this organization of distinguished veterans of our great Nation.

Now it is my privilege and honor to again be asked to include the revised constitution and bylaws of AMVETS in these remarks.

In the great Eighteenth Congressional District of California, which I was reelected on November 7 to represent for a third term, I have personally observed the strong patriotic, unselfish relationship and public service in the best interest of our great Nation and its national defense and security, furnished and rendered by the leaders of AMVETS there as well as throughout the State of California.

I am very proud of the fact that on the walls of my congressional office here at our Nation's Capital is a plaque presented to me by the Long Beach, Calif., Post 13, Amvets, in 1949 on which is inscribed, "Presented to CLYDE DOYLE for loyal service to AMVETS.

Inasmuch as this patriotic organization is made up entirely of veterans of World War II, it appears to me as a very valuable, constructive act on the part of the national officers of AMVETS to furnish this copy of these amended documents for the reason that it not only fully and specifically informs all Members of Congress of the high purposes and aims of the organization, but it in like manner informs all readers of the methods used to carry out these high purposes.

I again have the honor and privilege of commending the entire membership and its worthy leadership for carrying out these high aims and purposes as set forth in article II of the constitution, which is herewith submitted:

CONSTITUTION OF AMVETS AS AMENDED SEPTEMBER 10, 1950, BY THE SIXTH ANNUAL NATIONAL CONVENTION

PREAMBLE

We, the American veterans of World War II, fully realizing our responsibility to our community, to our State, and to our Nation, associate ourselves for the following purposes: To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States; to safeguard the principles of freedom, liberty and justice for all; to promote the cause of peace and good will among nations; to maintain inviolate the freedom of our country; to preserve the fundamentals of democracy; to perpetuate the friendship and associations of the Second World War; and to dedicate ourselves to the cause of mutual assistance, this by the grace of God.

ARTICLE I—NAME

The name of this organization shall be AMVETS (American Veterans of World War II) and it shall be hereinafter referred to as AMVETS.

ARTICLE II—AIMS

The aims and purposes of this organization are as follows:

1. To serve our country in peace as in war; to build and maintain the welfare of the United States of America toward lasting prosperity and peace for all its inhabitants.

2. To encourage, in keeping with the policies of our Government, the establishment of a concrete plan to secure permanent international peace and to assist in the maintenance of international peace.

3. To inspire in our membership a sense of responsibility, and to develop leadership for the preservation of our American democratic way of life.

4. To help unify divergent groups in the over-all interest of American democracy.

5. To train our youth to become purposeful citizens in a democracy with full knowledge of the responsibilities as well as the privileges of citizenship.

6. To cooperate with all duly recognized existing veteran organizations in the furtherance of the aims of World War II veterans.

7. To insure the orderly return of the veteran to civilian life by protecting his rights as an individual while he is still in uniform.

8. To expedite and assist in the rehabilitation of the veteran by maintenance of employment services, sponsoring educational opportunities, and providing counsel on insurance, housing, recreation, personal problems, hospitalization, and veterans benefits.

9. To act as a liaison agent between the veteran and the Government.

10. To provide an organization to encourage fellowship among all veterans of World War II.

11. To keep the public forever reminded that the veterans of World War II fought or served to preserve peace, liberty, and democracy for their Nation.

ARTICLE III—ORGANIZATION

SECTION 1. AMVETS shall be organized with a national headquarters, located at Washington, D. C., and a department in the District of Columbia and in each State and Territory of the United States. Local posts shall be formed within such departments, and intermediate administrative groups may be created by the national executive committee and the department executive committees, to function within their respective jurisdiction where such action is deemed advisable.

SEC. 2. The national headquarters shall be composed of the national officers, both elective and appointive, and the members of the national executive committee. It shall be the duty of the national officers to advance the cause of AMVETS, to carry out its aims and purposes and to provide the machinery for realization of the plans and policies established by the mandates of the national convention and the national executive committee.

SEC. 3. The United States is divided into the following districts:

District I: Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Jersey.

District II: Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, and the District of Columbia.

District III: South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Oklahoma, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas.

District IV: Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin.

District V: Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, North Dakota, Wyoming, Colorado, and Montana.

District VI: Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Nevada, Idaho, Oregon, Washington, and California.

ARTICLE IV—MEMBERSHIP

SECTION 1. Any person who served in the Armed Forces of the United States of America, or any American citizen who served in the armed forces of an allied nation of the United States, on or after September 16, 1940, and before the legal termination of World War II, is eligible for regular membership in AMVETS, provided such service when terminated by discharge or release from active duty be by honorable discharge or separation. No person who is a member of, or who advocates the principles of, any organization believing in, or working for, the overthrow of the United States Government by force, and no person who refuses to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States, shall be privileged to become, or continue to be, a member of this organization.

SEC. 2. Honorary memberships shall not be granted after the adoption of this amendment. In lieu thereof, certificates of merit may be awarded by a suitably inscribed award given to those rendering distinct service to the community and to veterans of World War II. Such awards may be made by posts, internal administrative groups, State departments, the national executive committee, or national conventions. Awards by posts and internal administrative groups must be approved by department executive committees.

ARTICLE V—NATIONAL CONVENTION

SECTION 1. A national convention shall be held annually, prior to October 1, at a time and place fixed by the previous convention, or by the national executive committee, and shall constitute the legislative body of AMVETS. If the convention fails to select a national convention site, the national executive committee shall so decide.

SEC. 2. The national convention shall comprise the following delegates:

(a) Each local post shall elect one delegate and one alternate.

(b) Each department shall choose one delegate and alternate at its convention, to be held at least 30 days prior to the national convention.

(c) Each member of the national executive committee shall be entitled to one vote at the national convention, but the national commander shall vote only in case of a tie.

SEC. 3. Each delegate shall be entitled to one vote. Alternates shall have all the rights and privileges of their delegates, except they shall vote only in their delegate's absence.

SEC. 4. No post or department delegates shall be seated at the national convention unless the respective posts or departments which they represent shall be fully paid up in all their accounts with the national headquarters, and their accounts duly audited and membership certified 30 days prior to the national convention. No post or department delegate or alternate shall be permitted to register as such without a membership card or other satisfactory evidence identifying him as a member of the post and department from which he is registering.

SEC. 5. Two hundred of the voting delegates registered at the national convention shall constitute a quorum.

ARTICLE VI—NATIONAL OFFICERS

SECTION 1. The national convention shall elect a national commander, one vice commander at large who shall be a woman, finance officer, provost marshal, judge advocate, and a surgeon general. Each district in meeting assembled at the national convention shall select a nominee for the office of national vice commander, which nominations shall be acted upon and ratified by the convention. No elected commander or vice commander shall succeed himself or herself in office unless they are filling such office by succession or election to a vacancy occurring between national conventions, provided, however, that the national commander elected at the national convention in September 1949 at Des Moines, Iowa, shall be eligible for reelection at the national convention held in Cleveland, Ohio, September 1950.

SEC. 2. All the elective national officers shall be members of the national executive committee.

SEC. 3. The national commander, with the consent and approval of the national executive committee, shall appoint a service director, a legislative director, a public relations director, a membership director, and an executive director, whenever vacancies occur in such offices. The national commander with the consent and approval of the national executive committee shall also appoint and have the power to remove a national inspector general, a national historian, and national chaplain.

SEC. 4. (a) No salaried appointed officer may be discharged without the approval of the personnel committee which shall be composed of the national commander, the two immediate past national commanders, and two members chosen by the national executive committee at the first meeting of the committee following the annual national convention. Salaries of elective and appointive officers shall be fixed by the personnel committee, subject to the approval of the national executive committee.

(b) The national commander shall have power to suspend any appointed officer for cause and to appoint an acting officer to perform the duties of the suspended officer until the next meeting of the personnel committee. At the time of such suspension the national commander shall set forth in writing the cause for such suspension and shall forward this to members of the personnel committee and the suspended officer. Such written cause shall constitute the complaint upon which the personnel committee shall pass in determining whether the suspended officer shall be removed from office. An appointed officer shall not receive salary during the period he is suspended from the performance of his duties.

(c) Hiring, firing, and establishment of salaries of all national headquarters employees shall be vested in the executive director. An appeal from the decision of the executive director may be taken to the personnel committee, provided this section shall not apply to service officers.

(d) An elective officer may be removed from office only by a two-thirds vote of the national executive committee after written charges against such officer shall have been preferred and furnished by registered mail to the officer concerned and to the members of the national executive committee. A full hearing shall be held by the national executive committee on charges preferred by an elected national officer or by three members of the national executive committee. Such hearing shall be held within 30 days after the charges are preferred and mailed.

(e) Procedure for removal from office of elected officers shall be prescribed by the national executive committee upon recommendation of the national judge advocate.

SEC. 5. A candidate for public office shall resign his national elective office. A national officer in AMVETS shall not hold any paid public office. National officers elected at a national convention shall be installed in office at the same session at which they are elected, but their terms of office shall coincide with the fiscal year as herein provided.

SEC. 6. The national executive committee shall, at its initial meeting following each national convention, establish the line of succession to the post of national commander in the event of a vacancy in that office, from among the national vice commanders.

SEC. 7. In the event a vacancy occurs in the office of the national vice commander other than the vice commander at large, the departments within the respective districts shall hold an election to fill such vacancy. If no election is held within 30 days of notification to the departments by national headquarters of the vacancy, the national commander shall fill the vacancy by appointment, subject to approval by the national executive committee.

SEC. 8. In the event of a vacancy in any elective office other than the national commander or the national vice commanders, the national commander shall fill such vacancy by appointment subject to approval of the national executive committee.

ARTICLE VII—NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

SECTION 1. The administrative power between national conventions shall be vested in the national executive committee, which shall be composed of the national commander, the retiring past national commander, the seven vice commanders, all other national elective officers, and one national executive committeeman from each State and Territory, to be elected by the respective departments in annual convention. An alternate shall be elected by each department to serve in the absence of disability of the department committeeman. Each of the above members shall be entitled to one vote, and in case of his absence or disability to participate in the proceedings of the committee, the duly elected alternate may cast his vote. The national commander shall vote only in case of a tie.

SEC. 2. Each national executive committeeman shall take office upon the adjournment of the department convention at which he is elected, and serve until his successor is duly elected and qualified. Each such national executive committeeman shall serve for a term of 2 years, one-half of the departments electing committemen each year.

SEC. 3. Members of the national executive committee shall be delegates to the national convention, each entitled to one vote.

ARTICLE VIII—DEPARTMENT ORGANIZATION

SECTION 1. Effective upon adjournment of the fourth annual national convention, each State or Territorial area of the United States shall constitute a department and shall be chartered as such provided they have a minimum of five chartered posts and a minimum of a total of 200 members within their State or Territorial area. The minimum requirements must be constantly maintained to preserve this status. New departments shall be chartered by the national commander upon the approval of the national executive committee. Each department shall submit a copy of its department constitution and bylaws to the national judge advocate for approval and any amendments to such constitution and bylaws shall likewise be submitted to the national judge advocate at each convention. The recommendations of the national judge advocate shall be submitted to the national executive committee for its approval. Each department shall conduct its own convention, to be held not less than 30 days before the annual national convention, at which time it shall elect a department executive committee, and delegates to the national convention and national executive committee.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of each department to aid in the organization of local posts, and to carry out the plans and policies delegated to it by the national headquarters in adherence to the provisions of this constitution.

ARTICLE IX—POST ORGANIZATION

SECTION 1. Local posts may be formed by 10 eligible individuals, by making application to their department, and if there be no organized department, by making application directly to the national headquarters. If the department approves, the application shall be forwarded to the national headquarters and a charter shall be issued.

SEC. 2. Posts shall be governed locally by their own officers chosen according to their own constitution and bylaws. They shall be subject and subordinate, however, to the jurisdiction of the national and department headquarters; and any provision of a department or post constitution found to be in conflict or contrary to the provisions of this constitution, shall be null and void. Officers of posts and departments shall use the equivalent titles provided for national officers in this constitution.

ARTICLE X—FINANCES

SECTION 1. All national finances of AMVETS shall be under the control of the national executive committee, which shall delegate sufficient general and specific authority to the finance committee to carry out the usual duties of the office. The finance committee shall make periodic reports at all stated meetings of the national executive committee, and an annual report at the national convention. Revenue shall be derived from annual dues and other sources approved by the executive committee. The regulation of annual dues shall be set out in the bylaws.

SEC. 2. An annual budget shall be submitted for approval at the first annual meeting of the executive committee. It shall be prepared by the retiring finance committee, who shall have received proposed budgets from the retiring heads of national departments, and shall have consolidated the same. In the event that the budget is not approved, a finance committee shall be appointed, consisting of three members of the executive committee, by the new national commander, to prepare such budget for presentation to the executive committee.

SEC. 3. The finance committee shall consist of five members, one of whom shall be appointed by the retiring national commander, one by the incoming national commander, two will be elected by the national executive committee and the fifth will be the national finance officer. The finance officer will be the chairman of this committee.

SEC. 4. The fiscal year shall be October 1 to September 30.

ARTICLE XI—DISCIPLINE

SECTION 1. Disciplinary rules relative to local posts shall be prescribed by the departments.

SEC. 2. The national executive committee, after notice and hearing before a subcommittee, may cancel, suspend, or revoke the charter of any department for good and sufficient cause to it appearing. Procedure for such action shall be prescribed by the national judge advocate. In the event of the cancellation, suspension, or revocation of any charter of any department, the suspended body shall have the right of appeal to the next national convention.

SEC. 3. In the event of such action, the national executive committee is empowered to take over the operation of the department whose charter is suspended or revoked until the next department convention, but is bound by the constitution and bylaws thereof. At the next department convention, new department officers must be selected to carry on the work of the department.

ARTICLE XII—POST TRANSFERS

SECTION 1. Any member in good standing may change his post or department and may join a new post without repaying the current annual dues.

SEC. 2. Such transfers shall be subject to the approval of the posts and departments involved.

ARTICLE XIII—AUXILIARIES

SECTION 1. AMVETS recognizes a subsidiary organization known as the AMVETS Auxiliary.

SEC. 2. (a) Eligibility for membership in AMVETS Auxiliary is limited to the mothers, wives, daughters, and sisters not less than 18 years of age, of regular members of AMVETS, and mothers, widows, daughters, and sisters not less than 18 years of age of deceased veterans of World War II who would have been eligible for membership in AMVETS. The term "mother" shall be construed so as to include any female member of the family of, or any female guardian of such person or deceased veteran who has or is exercising the care and responsibility for the rearing of such person or deceased veteran.

(b) Any member of the auxiliary who has been duly recognized as a member of the auxiliary under the provisions of section 2 (a), article XIII, shall be allowed to remain a member of the auxiliary so long as she remains a member in good standing.

SEC. 3. (a) The auxiliary shall be under the control of the national commander and the national executive committee provided, however, that nothing contained in this section shall in any way remove the jurisdiction hereinafter given to National, State, and Territorial departments over corresponding units of the auxiliary.

(b) Each State and Territorial department auxiliary shall be under the jurisdiction of State and Territorial department whose name it bears. Each State and Territorial department auxiliary shall be identical in geographical limits within the respective State and Territorial department of the AMVETS and shall be known and identified by the same name.

SEC. 4. (a) Every auxiliary shall be affiliated with an AMVETS post, and carry the corresponding number of that post.

(b) No auxiliary to any post shall be formed until approved by two-thirds vote of the members present at a stated meeting, due notice of the proposed formation having been given the entire membership of said post 15 days prior to such meeting.

(c) Each local auxiliary shall be under the jurisdiction of the post whose number it bears.

(d) No auxiliary shall be formed when no post exists.

(e) On and after January 1, 1949, any auxiliary not affiliated with an existing AMVETS post shall not be recognized and shall surrender its charter and such properties it may possess to the duly recognized auxiliary officer or officers.

SEC. 5. (a) A post may, by vote of two-thirds of its members present at a meeting following a printed or written notice mailed or delivered to each member of the post in good standing at least 10 days before said meeting, vote to disband its auxiliary, such notice to show contemplated action and the reason therefor. Following such action by a post, this action shall be certified to and forwarded through the State department of AMVETS with proper notice in writing, to the national auxiliary liaison officer and to the national commander, who shall direct the cancellation of the charter of the auxiliary only after investigation by him that it is to the best interest of the AMVETS to do so.

(b) In case of the discontinuance of a post by voluntary surrender of its charter or by a forfeiture of the charter, or by annulment of the charter, the status of its auxiliary, if any, shall be determined by the national commander, but if allowed to retain the charter, its name will be changed, if necessary, within 90 days so that it will not appear to be an auxiliary to its former post.

(c) The national commander may direct a suspension or cancellation of the charter of any auxiliary upon recommendation of the department commander having jurisdiction, when it is shown that the auxiliary has become a detriment to the post.

SEC. 6. In the event of a surrender, cancellation or forfeiture of an auxiliary charter to a post, all moneys, official records, property, and other paraphernalia shall be surrendered to such officer or officers as the rules and regulations of the national auxiliary provide; however, in case such auxiliary is reinstated or recognized within a period of 3 years, such monies, papers, etc., originally forfeited by such auxiliary shall be delivered to such reorganized or new auxiliary in connection with the charter.

SEC. 7 (a). The national president of the auxiliary within 30 days after her induction to said office shall transmit to the national commander a complete itemized report of the financial standing of the national auxiliary for the information of the national commander and the national executive committee.

(b) All books and records of the national auxiliary shall be made available to the national commander or national executive committee on request for either examination or audit.

SEC. 8. We recognize a new subsidiary organization, a fun and honor organization, of the AMVETS Auxiliary to be known as Sackettes on the national, department, and local level.

ARTICLE XIV—SAD SACKS

SECTION 1. AMVETS recognizes a subsidiary organization known as AMVETS Sad Sacks of American Veterans of World War II.

SEC. 2. Membership in Sad Sacks shall be limited to members in good standing of AMVETS.

SEC. 3. Sad Sacks shall be governed by a constitution and bylaws approved by the national executive committee.

ARTICLE XV—PUBLICATIONS

SECTION 1. All publications bearing the name AMVETS, published by the national organization, State departments, posts, auxiliaries, Sad Sacks, or any other branch or affiliate of AMVETS shall be under the supervision of the national executive committee, which shall delegate sufficient general and specific authority to the publications committee to carry out the necessary duties. Copies of all such publications shall be sent to the chairman of the publications committee.

SEC. 2. The publications committee shall consist of three members, one of whom shall be appointed by the new national commander, one by the retiring national commander, and one elected by the national executive committee. The new national commander shall designate the chairman.

ARTICLE XVI—AMENDMENTS

SECTION 1. This constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote of the total authorized delegates present at any AMVET national convention. Proposed amendments for action of the national convention must be submitted by a deparment convention, department executive committee, or the national executive committee to the national commander, and by him and/or the proposing body to the several departments and members of the national executive committee, by mail, at least 30 days prior to the convening of the next national convention. This constitution may, however, be amended by any national convention without notice, by unanimous vote.

BYLAWS OF AMVETS

ARTICLE I—NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

SECTION 1. In case of death, removal from office or resignation of a national executive committeeman, his duly elected alternate will serve the unexpired term of said committeeman. Each department shall elect an alternate national executive committeeman. In the event of the absence or disability of the national executive committeeman to participate in the proceedings of the national executive committee meeting, the duly elected alternate shall cast the vote of the said national executive committeeman.

SEC. 2. Stated meetings of the national executive committee shall be held as follows: One immediately preceding the national convention, one immediately following the national convention, one in the month of November and one in the month of April. Special meetings may be held upon reasonable notice at the call of the national commander. The national commander shall call a meeting of the national executive committee upon the written request of the national executive committeemen from at least 25 percent of the organized departments.

SEC. 3. A majority of the members shall constitute a quorum of the national executive committee.

SEC. 4. The national commander shall name such committee as he shall deem advisable, subject to ratification by the national executive committee at its next meeting succeeding the appointment. Such committees shall serve during the pleasure of the administration appointing them, and shall terminate upon the inauguration of a new national commander. No provision of this article shall be construed to prejudice the reappointment of the national executive committee.

SEC. 5. The national finance committee shall be charged with the preparation of the annual budget, and the handling of funds, subject to the approval of the national executive committee.

SEC. 6. The national executive committee shall approve the appointment and employment of proper officers for the administration of the affairs of AMVETS and prescribe their duties and compensation.

SEC. 7. Any national officer may receive compensation for his authorized activities on behalf of the organization, such compensation to be fixed in amount by the vote of the national executive committee.

SEC. 8. All questions affecting the eligibility for office and conduct of national officers shall be referred to and determined by the national executive committee. All questions affecting the eligibility for office and conduct of the national executive committeemen, department officers, or members of department executive committees may be referred to and determined by the executive committee of the department involved.

ARTICLE II—DUTIES OF OFFICERS

SECTION 1. National commander: The national commander shall be the executive head of AMVETS, with full power to enforce the provisions of the national constitution, the national bylaws, and the will of the national convention and national executive committee. He shall be the chairman of the national convention and the national executive committee. He shall appoint all necessary committees, subject to the ratification of the national executive committee, and shall perform such other duties as are usually incident to the office.

SEC. 2. National vice commanders: The national vice commanders shall act as representatives of the national commander in all matters referred to them by him, and shall upon his request preside over the meetings of the national convention or national executive committee, and perform such other duties as are usually incident to the office.

SEC. 3. National executive director: The national executive director shall be charged with the administration of the policies and mandates of the national convention, the national executive committee, and the national commander. He shall supervise the activities of all divisions at national headquarters, issue such directives as may be necessary to departments and posts, act for the national commander during his absence from national headquarters, and perform such other duties as are usually incident to the office. He shall serve at the pleasure of the national commander and the national executive committee. He shall be the personnel officer for all employees at national headquarters.

SEC. 4. The national finance officer: The national finance officer shall be custodian of the funds of the national organization. All checks disbursing the funds of the national organization shall be signed by two or more persons as designated by the national executive committee, and the finance officer shall make reports of the condition of the national treasury when called for by the national commander or national executive committee. The national finance officer shall furnish a surety bond as hereinafter prescribed. He shall perform such other duties as are usually incident to the office.

SEC. 5. National judge advocate: The national judge advocate shall advise the national officers and the national executive committee on all legal matters, including the construction and interpretation of the national constitution and bylaws, and shall perform such other duties as are usually incident to the office.

SEC. 6. National service directory: The national service director shall be the service and welfare officer of the national organization. He shall be responsible for the proper handling of claims of veterans and their dependents or survivors before the Veterans Administration; employment problems; prosecution of rights under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act and Selective Training and Service Act; civil-service questions, and other legislation concerning veterans' affairs; and the answering of individual requests for assistance or information from members, posts, and departments. It will be the duty of the national service director to formulate a rehabilitation program and to direct the activities of staff members charged with implementing the program. A part of this program will be the formation of a staff of trained national service officers and their assignment to the various regional offices of the Veterans Administration.

SEC. 7. National legislative director: The national legislative director shall be responsible for preparing the national legislative program in accordance with the mandates of the nationa convention, the national executive committee, and the national legislative committee. It is his further responsibility to draft the necessary bills in connection therewith and to cause such bills to be introduced in Congress and actively urge the consideration of legislation thus proposed. He shall at all times be fully informed when hearings are to be held on bills in which AMVETS is interested and be prepared to present testimony before the committee or committees handling such bills. It shall be his duty to maintain close liaison with Members of the House and Senate in order to secure the enactment of the AMVET program. He will make every effort to cooperate fully with other groups favoring proposed legislation which is supported by AMVETS, and it shall be his responsibility to maintain adequate legislative information when requested by individual members, posts, or departments of AMVETS. He shall serve at the pleasure of the national commander and the national executive committee.

SEC. 8. National public relations director: The national public relations director, under the direction of the national commander, shall be responsible for the planning, formulation, and development of a public relations program, including publicity, organizational publications, etc. He shall be responsible for efficient and proper liaison with all public relation media—press, radio, newsreels, periodicals—and all forms of advertising. He shall serve at the pleasure of the national commander and the national executive committee.

SEC. 9. National chaplain: The national chaplain shall perform such divine and nonsectarian services as may be necessary, adhering to the appropriate ceremonial rituals, and discharge the other duties incident to the office.

SEC. 10. National historian: The national historian shall compile from year to year all records of historical value and interest for the national headquarters of AMVETS. He shall also assist department and post historians so as to coordinate and unify the work of these officials, and perform such other duties as the national commander and the national executive committee shall prescribe. He shall serve at the pleasure of the national commander and the national executive committee.

SEC. 11. National provost marshal: The national provost marshal shall maintain order at all meetings and conventions. He shall perform such other duties as may be requested by the national commander.

SEC. 12. National surgeon general: The surgeon general shall perform such special duties as are assigned by the national commander, as well as the usual duties incident to the office.

SEC. 13. National inspector general: The national inspector general shall be the investigating officer of the organization. By direction of the national commander or the national executive committee he shall make any necessary investigations pertaining to grievances, disciplinary cases, fraud, or dishonesty within the organization, charges of conduct unbecoming an AMVET and shall be empowered to have access to all records, financial and otherwise, of all department or post officers or members when necessary for the carrying out of his duties. He may be compensated for his actual expenses in carrying out these duties, subject to the approval of the national executive committee.

ARTICLE III—CHARTERS

SECTION 1. A department executive committee may suspend, cancel, or revoke a post charter and such action shall be final and conclusive, unless an appeal is taken to the national executive committee within 30 days from the date of said suspension, cancellation, or revocation. Action taken by the national executive committee upon appeal shall be binding, pending appeal to the next national convention.

A post charter which has been thus suspended may be reinstated by action of the department executive committee if the post purge itself of the offense within 60 days of its suspension. If the delinquency is not cleared to the satisfaction of the department executive committee within 60 days, appropriate action shall be taken by that committee to effect revocation or cancellation of the charter.

In the event that a department fails or refuses to discipline a post after the national commander has requested such action, it is violating the rules of the constitution and bylaws. After demand has been made upon said department for action, the national commander may suspend the charter of such post by notice, accompanied by written notice, a copy of which shall be forwarded to the department and the national executive committee. The determination of whether the charter shall be cancelled shall be considered at the next meeting of the national executive committee.

SEC. 2. Any post failing to meet the obligations imposed upon it by the constitution and bylaws, or ceasing to function for 6 months as a post of AMVETS or voluntarily ceasing to function as a post, or merging with one or more other posts, or refusing or failing to pay the department and national per capita dues within 60 days after collection by the post, shall, upon order of the department executive committee, surrender its charter.

SEC. 3. Upon revocation, cancellation, or suspension of the charter of a post in any department of AMVETS, said post shall immediately cease operation, and upon revocation or cancellation shall turn over its charter and assets to its department commander or department executive committee. The department executive committee is authorized, empowered, and directed by and through its duly authorized agent to take possession, custody, and control of all records, property, and assets of said post. So much of the said assets as are required for the purpose shall be applied to any indebtedness of the said post: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as requiring any department to take over or to assume any financial responsibility of such post. Said department executive committee may provide for the transfer of the members of said post to other posts of their choice, subject to the approval of such other posts. At the request of the individual member involved, where no other post exists in the same area, he may become a member at large within the organization.

SEC. 4. The national executive committee shall provide a uniform code of procedure to be followed in the revocation, cancellation, or suspension of post charters, and a method of appeal to the national executive committee.

ARTICLE IV—DISCIPLINE OF POSTS AND POST MEMBERS

SECTION 1. Each post of the AMVETS shall be the judge of its own membership, subject to the provisions of the constitutions and bylaws of the national and department organizations.

(a) Provided, however, That when the conduct of any member of AMVETS is such that it in any way will reflect discredit or invite criticism of the organization, or who belongs to or joins any group, organization, or party that is not compatible with the aims and principles of AMVETS, the department commander shall immediately bring the matter to the attention of the post of which the individual is a member. If the post fails to act and protect the name of AMVETS, the department executive committee may suspend the charter of the post involved, pending a hearing and final action by the department executive committee.

(b) In the event that the department executive committee fails to act in accordance with paragraph (a) of this article, the national executive committee may suspend the charter of the post involved, pending a hearing and final action by the national executive committee.

SEC. 2. Members may be suspended or expelled by a post, upon a proper showing of cause. Written charges, which shall be furnished the member involved at least 15 days prior to that date set for the hearing, shall be based upon disloyalty, neglect of duty, dishonesty, and conduct unbecoming a member of AMVETS.

SEC. 3. Any member who has been expelled has the right of appeal to his department executive committee, according to the provision in the bylaws of such department. The decision of the committee shall be final with the right of appeal to the department convention.

SEC. 4. Membership shall be on a fiscal year basis and shall run from January 1 through December 31. A member whose dues have not been paid 30 days after the expiration of a year's membership shall be suspended and if not paid within 60 days of expiration date, his membership and all his rights and privileges shall be forfeited.

SEC. 5. Nothing contained in this article shall be construed to limit in any way the powers conferred by section 1 of article III of the bylaws.

ARTICLE V—MEMBERSHIP

SECTION 1. Membership in AMVETS constitutes membership in the national organization of AMVETS through post affiliation and/or membership at large. Hereafter all AMVETS shall, prior to their acceptance as members, pledge allegiance to the United States of America and its Constitution, and certify that they have read, or have had read to them, the AMVETS declaration of principles, and that they accept and subscribe to the same, and they shall not advocate or belong to any group or organization advocating the overthrow of the United States Government by force.

ARTICLE VI—MONEYS AND COLLECTIONS

SECTION 1. All national, department, and post officials handling AMVET funds, shall be properly bonded with a good and solvent bonding and surety company, acceptable to the United States Treasury, as surety to cover the average amount of AMVET funds handled by such individuals in a single year. In case of delinquencies in the payment of amounts due department or national headquarters, action shall be taken at once by the proper officials to bring about an immediate and complete settlement. The bonds provided by national officials shall be approved by the national executive committee, and those provided by department and post officials shall be approved by the department executive committee. The blanket bond carried by national headquarters covering post and department officers shall not include the officers or employees of any corporation, business or other enterprise operated by and within the post or department. A separate bond covering such operation shall be carried by the post or department involved.

SEC. 2. No contracts involving expenditure in excess of $1,000 of national AMVET funds shall be negotiated without inviting a reasonable number of competitive written bids, and where the required products are of equal quality the contract shall be awarded to the lowest bidder.

SEC. 3 (a). Any contract entered into by any post with any individual, firm or corporation, providing for a division of profits, shall first be submitted to the department judge advocate for approval. If rejected by him, an appeal may be made to the next department executive committee meeting. Its action shall be final.

(b) Wherever post club rooms are maintained and operated for the convenience and pleasure of its members and the name of AMVETS or its insignia are displayed or used, a board of trustees shall be elected from among the members of the post to supervise its activities, operation and finances.

SEC. 4. All posts and department accounts shall be kept in accordance with a uniform accounting system established by national headquarters. The accounting system forms are to be provided by national headquarters to the posts and departments at a nominal cost.

SEC. 5. The minimum annual membership dues shall be $4 payable to the post, of which sum $2 shall be forwarded to national headquarters, $1 to the department headquarters and $1 retained by the post. Dues above the minimum set forth here shall be fixed by the post and/or department. Where no department exists, $3 shall be forwarded to national headquarters and $1 retained by the post. Of the $3 sent to national headquarters, $1 shall be set aside in a separate fund pending the establishment of a department. Members at large will remit the minimum dues direct to national headquarters, of which sum national will retain $3 and $1 will be returned to the respective department. Where no department exists, national headquarters will set aside the $1 for return when a department is formed. Any veteran who is eligible to join AMVETS and who is in full time attendance at a university, college or trade or technical school under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act (GI Bill of Rights) and Public Law 16 of the Seventy-eighth Congress, may join any post for a $1.50 membership fee per year, of which 50 cents shall be remitted to national headquarters, 50 cents to department headquarters and 50 cents retained in the post. The method of forwarding dues to the national headquarters shall be prescribed by the national convention or the national executive committee. All members on active duty shall be permitted to retain their membership without charge.

SEC. 6. All contracts to be executed by the national headquarters shall be approved by the national executive committee and signed by the national commander and attested by the national executive director.

ARTICLE VII—DEFINITIONS

SECTION 1. The word "he" wherever it shall appear in either the constitution or bylaws of the AMVETS shall be construed as referring to both sexes.

ARTICLE VIII—RESTRICTED USE OF ORGANIZATION

SECTION 1. AMVETS, or any component part thereof, shall not be used to promote the interest of any individual who is a candidate for public office, or to promote otherwise, any individual, organization, political party, faction, or product Any violation of this provision shall be sufficient cause for disciplinary action against the offending member, post, or department

ARTICLE IX—MEETINGS

SECTION 1. All business meetings of this organization shall be conducted under Robert's Rules of Order.

ARTICLE X—NATIONAL FLOWER

SECTION 1. The national flower shall be the four-leaf white clover, meaning "think of me."

ARTICLE XI—DIVISION OF INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

SECTION 1. There is hereby created a division of international affairs of AMVETS. The division shall be composed of three directors, one of whom shall be the executive director, and the other two shall be associate directors. The directors shall be appointed by the national commander with the consent of the national executive committee.

SEC. 2. The directors shall serve at the pleasure of the national commander and the national executive committee.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the directors to be informed on matters of international affairs, perform research and investigation in such affairs, inform the national executive committee and the membership of the organization of all matters found to affect the peace, and make recommendations thereof, and provide representation at any peace conference, subject to the approval of the national executive committee. Funds shall be provided upon approval of the executive committee for the operation of this division.

ARTICLE XII—ACCOUNTING FOR MONEYS

SECTION 1. All moneys received by this organization shall be strictly and accurately accounted for, and a report shall be made available annually to all members, showing the sources of all such income and the expenditure thereof. All posts, departments, and national accounts shall be kept in accordance with a uniform accounting system as established by national headquarters.

ARTICLE XIII—POLICY

SECTION 1. The policy of AMVETS shall be fixed (a) by the national convention as reflected in the resolutions adopted; (b) by the national executive committee when not in conflict with convention mandates; and (c) by the compilation of the result of periodical polls of posts on current issues. Departments, posts, subsidiaries, and auxiliaries shall be notified by national headquarters of policy so fixed.

SEC. 2. No member of AMVETS shall represent or purport to represent any department, post, auxiliary, or subsidiary of AMVETS in opposition to, or other than in complete consonance with policy so determined and notified.

ARTICLE XIV—AMENDMENTS

SECTION 1. These bylaws may be amended by any national convention by a majority vote of the total authorized representation thereat, provided that the proposed amendment shall have been submitted through the national executive committee by mailing or delivering the same to it at least 30 days prior to the convening of the next national convention. The said bylaws may also be amended by a two-thirds majority vote of any national convention without prior notice.

SEC. 2. No proposed amendment shall be submitted through the national executive committee or considered by the national convention, as provided in section 1 of this article, unless said proposed amendment shall have been first submitted by a department convention, department executive committee, or national executive committee.

Human Relations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an excerpt from Drew Pearson's the Washington Merry-Go-Round, appearing in today's Washington Post:

HUMAN RELATIONS

You don't usually expect the chairman of a Democratic National Committee dinner to be a philosopher on human relations. Nor do you expect many big-business men to be working Democrats. But Dwight Palmer, president of the General Cable Co., happens to be chairman of the big Democratic dinner in New York this week, and when he received a letter from an Indiana Democrat calling him a Negro-loving, prolabor Rooseveltian, Palmer wrote back:

"My job is running a company that employs about 7,000 people, and we have plants in Perth Amboy and Bayonne, N. J.; Rome, N. Y.; St. Louis, Mo.; Los Angeles and Emeryville, Calif. For a long period of time I have been interested in bettering human relations by opening up jobs and up-grading people, based solely upon merit, regardless of race, creed, or color.

"The America of the early days, when the Anglo-Saxon strain dominated everything, is no longer with us. The influx of foreign-born from all parts of the world has made America what it is today. Each racial and religious group brought with it some of the best of its Old World talents and ideals. And these all dumped into the melting pot have developed a Nation that is strong, democratic, and outspoken with all the freedoms that go to make up a true democracy.

"We have two Jews as vice presidents in our organization. Another vice president is of Italian parentage. We have Protestants and Catholics in the management group, and we have Negroes serving as foremen, department managers, and in our laboratories.

"It so happens that I was born in St. Louis, white and Presbyterian. It took me quite a while to free myself of some of my prejudices and discriminations. Put my feeling is that I have to see what I personally can produce in the way of doing my share to get people to understand each other better."

The Republicans Lost Again—As We Predicted

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, the following is a radio address delivered by Episcopal Rector Rev. Charles Granville Hamilton on December 3, 1950, at Aberdeen, Miss.:

It is recorded of an old and false prophet "but he lied to him" (I Kings 13: 19). It is still true of some more recent commentators and columnists.

The Democratic Party won the 1950 election. It did better than in the previous three off-year elections. The Republican gains in the Senate in those elections of 6, 9, and 12, shrank to 5 this year, while their congressional gains of 80, 50, and 55 also went down to 31.

Twenty-one of the twenty-two million 1948 Republicans voted in 1950, whereas only nineteen of the twenty-four million 1948 Democrats voted in 1950. As usual, millions of Democrats failed to vote in an off year. Some do not realize how important Congressmen are; some were never taught it; and some did not like the big brass in Korea, Spain, and Germany.

Republican gerrymandering requires Democrats to get more votes to win an even number of Congressmen.

Our predictions came true again as they have in the last four Presidential elections. In 1946, the caterpillars voted to have no more butterflies; in 1948, the people spoke with no uncertain voice; and in 1950 they are still for the Democratic Party.

Mr. Republican of Ohio did not gain votes in Ohio. Two hundred thousand less Democrats voted, while the normal Republican vote got out. Either races for State offices or religious prejudice cost Joseph Ferguson many Democratic votes, not taking into consideration the great volume of free advertising which his opponent received. Mr. Republican's friends probably spent more money than most candidates for President have spent. Labor in Ohio may have had one dollar to each twenty which the Republicans had. Mr. Republican remains a symbol of the ignorant who believe what they read in the newspapers, of the haters of the poor who are glad that they are not Christians, and of the frustrated neurotics who see in him a symbol of a return to the nostalgic days of 1910.

In Senate races labor purged in Maryland and Missouri. The Marylander lost because he supported the Taft-Hartley law, because he opposed FEPC, and because his Governor put a sales tax over on the people. No governor who put over a sales-tax law has ever been reelected.

The billion dollars which the Republicans may have spent on the election came partly from fat cats, from friendly corporate interests, probably the "Chiangese" lobby, and partly from the gambling racket. The Kefauver investigation of Nation-wide gamblers caused angry gamblers to retaliate with money and other help to the Republicans.

In Illinois, gambling interests were not averse to the election of DIRKSEN, the distillers' friend, over his opponent. Exposure of Republicans in gambling rackets in Idaho did not keep them from winning. The gambling machine which controls California politics did not want Democrats. Nevada elected a Republican Governor because his opponent was accused of being honest. Luzerne gamblers of Pennsylvania helped in a Republican victory where more votes were counted in many precincts than there were people living in them. Governor Dewey seems to have double-crossed his own candidate for mayor by joining up with Jim Farley and the shady money which elected a man who, up to date, has never hurt gamblers. The foolish political moves of some self-appointed Democratic bosses helped Governor Dewey. Some Mississippi Democrats should be named as missionaries to introduce their gubernatorial and senatorial primaries into New York.

Liquor interests won in Oregon and Arkansas, with probably fifty dollars to each one the opposition had. Legalized gambling was turned down by voters, which does not hurt gamblers where the governors leave the State wide open.

Horatiusism from Wisconsin lost in most States—even in the old home State. Every county where it waxed wroth, gave less votes for the Republicans. In Connecticut, victories were chalked up notwithstanding the efforts of the "big wind" and the "big voice." Fourteen of the eighteen Democrats who voted against the McCarran atrocity were easily reelected. In Connecticut the Republicans used television pictures of Stalin during the campaign and in Maryland a composite fake picture of the Democratic candidate for the Senate and Earl Browder was shown. The greatest loss was that scholarly man from Utah. Other serious losses were of capable "Mr. Good Common Sense," from Pennsylvania, and HELEN DOUGLAS, MRS. WOODHOUSE, JOHN CARROLL, ANDY JACOBS, ANDY BIEMILLER, and GENE O'SULLIVAN. Lobby money did not beat Representative BUCHANAN. In the Oklahoma senatorial race the capable Democrat was elected over an oily, clerical clown. Three senatorial candidates in Connecticut, Missouri, and New York were elected even though they believe in freedom of speech.

The Republicans have forgotten that one of their generals forgot to give winter clothing to freezing soldiers as well as to find out how many men they were fighting, while the other Republican general is head of the university with the most Communist sympathizers. The election results were encouraging to the Stalinites. Isolationism is still alive among the Republicans, and our foreign policy can grow worse as a result.

There are some clear conclusions. The American people like President Truman. They do not want the Republican Party in power nationally. They do not believe that the Republican Party is, next to the dog, man's best friend. The Republican Party will never win another national election. The Democratic Party has won 10 of the last 11 elections and will win again in 1952. The truth is hard to get into the press. Education has failed to educate many voters in Northern States, which spend much on schools, and on what Government is all about and the American way of life, but it doesn't seem to soak in. The people of America are still Democratic nevertheless.

Unity and Progress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include an address by Mr. Harry Polk, president of the National Reclamation Association, at the recent convention of that association in Spokane, Wash.:

Mr. Chairman, friends of reclamation, this is one of the happiest moments of my life.

We are assembled in a State which was among the first to recognize the benefits of reclamation; a great State whose people have not only continued to make irrigation pay increasing dividends through the years, but have consistently kept pace with demands placed upon it through an unprecedented migration of population to the Pacific West.

Blessed with the inexhaustible fountainhead of water supply from the mighty Columbia, an abundance of electric energy for an ever-expanding industry has been supplied, and with it, water that will soon flow out over a million acres of arid land onto the world's largest single irrigation project.

And we are met in a great metropolis of the West, where industry, as in Seattle, Portland, and other western centers of population, is taking fullest advantage of this huge natural water resource.

And here we have a people whose kindly hospitality can best be measured in terms equally comparable to the development of which they have long since become a part. From the time Spokane representatives first invited us to come back for our second meeting in their city in 14 years, nothing has been left undone to make this, our 19th annual convention, the most successful of all time.

As president of our association, I want to acknowledge the splendid cooperation and teamwork so effectively demonstrated by the Chamber of Commerce of which Otto Warn is president, and our own "Old Faithful" Jim Ford is secretary-manager, in planning for this event. We know it is no easy task; we are well aware of the many trying difficulties you faced, especially with the loss of one of your larger hostelries by fire. But there has been no problem which you have hesitated to tackle. You said, "Come on; we'll take care of you." And you've done a magnificent job. So, to you, Mayor Meehan, Mr. Warn, and Jim Ford, and all your working partners, I know that every delegate within the hearing of my voice would want to join with me in saying, "Thank you."

This has been a significant year for reclamation.

Since our last annual conference in Salt Lake City, a lot of water has gone over the dam.

We have seen Congress, for the third successive year, vote a third of a billion dollars to reclamation alone, besides the $200,000,000 appropriated to the Corps of Engineers for flood control projects in the 17 reclamation States. These are impressive figures. They mean that our water resources program is continuing to win annual favor at the hands of Congress in excess of a half billion dollars a year.

Since that last meeting we have seen an unheralded and undeclared war being fought on foreign soil again bring disruption to our program, as it did during World War II—with all construction on new undertakings suspended through Executive order, and later substantial reductions made in funds already voted by Congress to carry on the water-development program.

We have for the third time unfortunately been unsuccessful in our effort to liberalize the basis of authorization for new irrigation projects and repayment features of the existing law affecting reclamation.

We have seen water shortages grow more acute on some of the older projects with the consequent demands for supplementary water supply becoming more and more pronounced.

We have witnessed regions and States becoming more and more zealous in their claims to an equitable share of water from streams within their borders.

Disputes in terms of negotiated contracts with water users have stalled progress in getting projects completed and irrigation under way.

Through the year we have noted how hydroelectric power has become a more and more dominant issue because of the necessary aid it must provide for the building of multiple-purpose projects—especially in the writing of a formula prescribing just how power is to serve as a paying partner with reclamation expansion.

These and other problems with which we are confronted and going to increase the responsibility of the National Reclamation Association the coming year. Just how we shall meet them, more than ever before, is going to supply a standard of measurement for fixing the valuation on our organization for the further advancement of our western empire.

As your president, one who has served in various capacities and is now about to step aside, I feel it my duty to speak quite frankly on these points. In doing so, I should like to have you believe that what I might say, is prompted solely through the hope that our thinking might be directed in channels that may best serve the cause of sound reclamation development.

Commenting on administrative affairs of our own association, I am most happy to again be able to point to the sound financial condition of our treasury. As of today, with 2 months still left in the fiscal operating year, 14 States have met their quotas in full; 11 have made advance payments on next year in considerable amounts. It should be remembered, too, that most every State accepted all the way from 10 to 20 percent voluntary increases at Salt Lake City in order for us to expand our operations, both in the field and at the Washington office.

And in connection with finances, I should like especially to direct your attention to a factor which is all too often overlooked. As you well know, our operating funds come almost exclusively from States and individual membership dues, together with substantial contributions from business concerns whose operations are so closely linked with western agriculture. (I hope the good Congressman from our host State has satisfied himself on this point.)

But in addition to our working budget, States, civic organizations, State reclamation associations, and numerous individuals make contributions that often go unnoticed. They send delegations to Washington, they pay expenses of committee members to distant points for conferences, and assist in many other ways. These contributions are just as realistic to our operation as the respective State quotas, and I feel they should not go unnoticed.

On the efficient operation of the Washington office under our secretary-manager Bill Welsh, I do not need to comment; the excellent manner in which he has accepted and discharged his responsibilities speaks for itself. I do want to make particular mention, however, of the work of Mr. Welsh's new assistant, Merl Peek, since he was employed as a result of action taken at Salt Lake City a year ago. He started work in Washington January 1, and this is the first opportunity we have had to evaluate the experiment. Besides being of invaluable help in Washington, for the past 5 months, Mr. Peek has been on a tour of the Western States, conferring with water users, studying projects, attending State association meetings and helping to establish better public relations with business firms.

One of the things he has learned in his visits is that water users in general, and those interested in water development, would like to make more use of national reclamation association headquarters, but they repeatedly commented that the office was too far removed from their homes. Being discussed here, I am told, is the feasibility of establishing an office at some central point in the West, such as Denver or Salt Lake City. Other similar organizations have adopted such a practice and with apparent effectiveness.

While we should not act with haste on any such proposal, there is to warrant its consideration, at least to the end that a committee of which the chairman of the Budget and Finance Committee should be a member, be set up to make a through study of the idea and report at the next annual conference.

Methods also are being considered by which State organizations might become more closely associated with the parent organization, to the end that we effect a closely knit over-all organization of western reclamation folk to give increasingly effective service to the cause to which we have dedicated ourselves.

Under that provision in our new constitution which accords to your president the privilege of assigning duties to special committees, I named two new groups for studies the past year, which have been especially active and which, along with our other committees, have done most commendable work. One was the small projects committee, for which I prevailed upon John Bliss, State engineer of New Mexico and immediate past president of the Association of Western Engineers, to direct its activities. Those working with Mr. Bliss on the committee were men who had either directed outstanding programs within their own State, or had indicated special interest in the field of small projects.

The committee had three meetings. It has given serious study to a special program that in years past has been too much neglected by the National Reclamation Association. I have read the report which the committee will make to this convention, and I commend it to your serious consideration. I am hopeful that some of that report may be implemented into a resolution which may carry us forward toward greater realization of achievement in this field which is of such vital interest to every one of our reclamation States.

Then there is another committee from whom you are to hear a special report this afternoon—the basin development committee. We as an organization for a number of years—since the aspect of basin-wide development of our rivers was first conceived—have contended vigorously against proposals of valley authorities patterned after TVA, but we need a positive program; we need a definite affirmative answer to those who advocate centralized control over our water resources. The interagency committee, made up of both Federal and State representatives, was a constructive approach, but it lacked authority for decision and action. It had no legal status.

Interstate compacts, with agreements on division and allotments of the water in streams, has been a most significant move in the right direction, and the ratification of such compacts, followed by establishment of an interstate commission composed most entirely of State representatives, so significantly achieved for the Upper Colorado River Basin, has dealt another real knock-out blow to valley authorities.

In these notable advances may well be found in large measure at least the answer to valley authority proposals, but in the light of repeated pronouncement of policy by present officials within the Federal Government, including no less than the Secretary of the Interior, and some of his top subordinates, that centralized Federal control of the major river basins of the Nation shall remain one of their chief objectives—certainly there is still need for vigilance, need for a broad positive approach to this question.

The vigorous and continued opposition by the National Reclamation Association has contributed materially to stemming the tide of regimentation and socialistic control over our water resource development, and with equal pride such organizations as the Pacific Northwest Development Association, Washington Development Association, the National Water Conference, the Mississippi Valley Association and State reclamation groups, can well lay claim to an educational program—especially here in the Columbia Valley—that has had most telling effects. But the job remains unfinished. We are still in need of an over-all positive program—a program which we can embrace with unity and enthusiasm and pronounce to the President, the Members of Congress, and to the Nation, as the program of the National Reclamation Association. It offers a challenge equal only to that expressed by your first president, when upon the founding of this great organization by men of wisdom and vision, he was able to go to the President of the United States and say: "At last the West speaks with one voice."

Great care was exercised in the naming of the basin development committee. Again men of vision, men of determination and action, with deep devotion to the West were needed. Fortunately I was able to get your first president, that capable leader, Marshall Dana, to head up the all-important group. One member was selected to represent each of the major river basins. They went to work. If you had attended their sessions as I did, I am sure you would have been equally impressed with the serious approach made to the problem. You will have an opportunity to judge the product of their efforts when the chairman submits his committee's formal report. I hope that from it at least may be found a pronouncement of principles on which we as an organization representing the thousands of water users in the reclamation States, may be able to stand firmly, unitedly.

Departing somewhat from precedent, I asked that members of the resolutions committee be selected ahead of the meeting of the State caucuses this year, and that the committee assemble for at least a full day's session prior to the opening of the convention. The obligations of this group of 17 men have in past years been crowded and such limited time that it not only proved a man-killing task, but did not permit sufficient consideration of important subjects deserved. It was believed that the extra day, provided a sufficient number of resolutions were laid before the committee, might greatly relieve the pressure on members and materially enhance the completed task. May I acknowledge my personal appreciation and that of the board of directors.

With the passing of the day of simple irrigation development in the West—the day when both engineering and financing were comparatively of slight difficulty—where construction costs were for the most part within scope of ability of the farmers on any given project to repay—it became necessary to find other means of cost-participation if the reclamation program was to move ahead.

Then came the multipurpose type of development, followed by the basin-wide approach. What individual water users could no longer do, because of increased construction costs and complexity of engineering problems, other recognized benefits to the region might well contribute.

Power rapidly became a working partner of further irrigation development, and nowhere is it better exemplified than right here in the Pacific Northwest, from the waters of the mighty Columbia, the Snake, and the Willamette Rivers. Let me hasten to add that, whatever may be the situation in other areas, I have had it brought most conclusively to my attention that in the Pacific Northwest there exists today a definite shortage of firm power, which actually threatens to make necessary the application of rigid restrictions of electricity for private or municipal use. That, in spite of the fact that here we have the greatest single power energizing project in Coulee Dam that exists in the entire world.

Then, if dams on our western rivers were to provide protection from floods, that cost should be recognized, as should also the harboring protection for wildlife and establishment of recreation centers—each as regional or national benefits, to be paid for from the Federal Treasury and not chargeable against farmers on the land.

It was only natural that through this widened scope of development would come new problems of allocation of costs and administration of projects.

In the rapidly changing scene came of course a greatly stepped-up program—a program where single projects, considered on a basin-wide level—such as the Columbia, the Missouri, and the Colorado, and require more than a decade to build, ever they would be completed. What a far cry from the projects of 20 years ago, which would be investigated, designed, and brought into operation in a period of 2 or 3 years.

Yes, this new conception of design and construction to have the reclamation program continue to move forward is the answer to those who look with askance on our problems that have grown in multiplicity and that challenge our ability to solve.

An economy-minded Congress, facing an ever-increasing national debt and a critical need for a rapidly expanded defense program, is starting to look with much more scrutiny on all appropriations, and especially funds furnished for development of a region which for the most part is foreign to their own individual geographical conception and personal interests.

There are those, too, who, when they see us taking exception to increased centralized control and championing the cause of advocates for more local self-government, contend that, in proportion to our demands of the Federal Government shall we have to expect increased exercise of control over our living economy.

I am one of those who have in the past contended for greater local autonomy—call it States' rights, home rule, self-government, or what you will—and I shall continue to do so. It is my contention, too, that there is full justification in seeking Federal assistance in the expansion of reclamation in the West, and that it by no means follows that through the granting of that financial aid, there should come any added subservience to Government, or any increased degree of submission to any Federal bureau or agency.

Let me give you my reasoning on this. To begin with, the natural resources which are being turned to good for our people and for the Nation, belong to the West. They are of titular possession to those who braved untold hardships in exploring, settling, and developing a vast region of this United States whose resources have added countless millions to the over-all economy of our country.

Then, funds we seek for development are only loans or advances after all. Had we an organization big enough in character to properly organize and operate a financial agency, it is entirely within the realm of practicability that bonds could be issued and sold against the development we propose, bonds which would, over the years, provide a sound investment, repaying completely the entire issue to those who had made the advance.

It is my conviction that States might well assume added responsibility, not only in further asserting their individual rights but in accepting construction responsibility wherever possible for the development of their water resources. This is especially true in the expansion of the small-projects program. It has been demonstrated in a number of instances that large savings can be effected through the construction of both water and power projects by private enterprise, and through State agencies, and I suggest for your consideration, programs carried out so effectively by the States of Montana and Utah in this particular field.

Some engineering authorities with experience in both Government-directed and privately constructed projects contend that, except for extensive, multipurpose, basin-wide development, even some of the larger undertakings might well be built through access to open money markets. This would carry with it the removal of interest dodges, provide capital on which both interest and Federal taxes would be paid, and at the same time, effect substantial savings. Certainly it would assure control on the local or State level.

It has become a habit for us to turn to the Federal Government with a get-all-we-can attitude because the other fellow is getting his. If we are to be saved from an economic crash in this country, I cannot help feeling that a return to individual self-reliance will prove as great a factor in preventing such a crash as any other one thing, and I believe that applies to the building and operation of reclamation projects as much as any other phase of our economic life.

The banker who loans money does not exercise control over the borrower's living economy so long as payments are made promptly. It is only when his customer falters, or fails to meet his obligations, that the money lender begins to take over—and justly so.

The Federal Government is merely the lender for our development. If our reclamation program is carefully planned, then soundly constructed and operated, every dollar will be returned to the Federal Treasury. It is this misconception of exercising control because of putting up the money that Federal agencies today are abusing their prerogatives. We who prize our freedom and defend the right of individuals to govern themselves have contended against this unjustified usurpation of Federal authority, and we shall continue to do so, based on the simple theory that officers of the Federal Government, be they located in Washington or elsewhere, should be our servants and not our masters.

It does necessarily follow, however, that to avoid any failures to meet our obligations to have reclamation projects, be they big or small, justify their building, they must be planned, surveyed, and designed with exceeding care, constructed efficiently and economically, and then operated effectively. I am convinced that reclamation can be justified on the basis of the contribution it will make to the Federal Treasury itself, even disregarding, if you must, the good that will come to our western people.

Need I call your attention to projects all over the West, where the funds have been advanced by the Federal Treasury to build, and increased payments through income taxes alone have many times repaid the total cost of these projects?

Total agricultural returns from crops grown on Federal reclamation projects since the enactment of the Reclamation Act 48 years ago are more than $6,000,000,000 or approximately four times the total investment in reclamation. During recent years, however, the gross crop return has exceeded $500,000,000 per year. In other words, the crop return every 3 years equals the total amount of money which the Federal Government has invested in reclamation. Another interesting disclosure is the fact that the income tax from reclamation areas has amounted to a total of $1,600,000,000 or the equivalent of the cost of all Federal reclamation today, and these payments are naturally in addition to the repayments by water users.

A noted agricultural economist, Dr. John Lee Coulter, did a special study for us recently on the question of "Why More Irrigation?" Here are some of the things we learned—that our population in the United States passed the 100,000,000 mark July 1, 1915; then, during the 35 years since that date, our population has increased to in excess of 150,000,000 persons—a jump of 50 percent in that 35 years.

According to the 1945 agricultural census, total lands available for crops were 507,000,000 acres in 1920. Only 512,000,000 acres were available for crops in 1945. In other words, the acreage of tillable lands, including improved pasture and hay land, increased only 5,000,000 or less than 1 percent in the past 25 years—while our population has increased 50 percent in 35 years.

Prior to 1920 the farms in America were producing enough to feed all our people and an excess was being exported to western European countries. Since 1925 imports have exceeded exports every year except during the recent years of World War II and the present recovery.

Mechanization of our farms has reduced the number of farm animals by one-third—from 30,000,000 in 1920 to less than 10,000,000 today. During the period of 1915 to 1950 we plowed up 35,000,000 acres of the finest grazing and hay land in the Great Plains area and turned them into raising wheat. This reduction in farm animals and the resultant reduction in acreage to support them has permitted the shifting of some 60,000,000 acres of improved pasture, hay, and grazing land to the production of food for human beings.

Advanced methods of farming, improved feeds, use of fertilizer and other scientific advances have helped to bolster the production of food products for the ever-increasing population. Nevertheless, especially during the drought thirties, there was a significant loss of topsoil and fertility throughout the Great Plains from wind erosion. Consequently it is more important than ever now that conservation, reclamation, and irrigation be added to an improved agriculture to insure adequate food supply.

Even though we think in terms of a high living standard and plenty for all, 25 to 30 million people in these United States today are living below our medium standard.

We should not let ourselves be blinded by the fact that we have taken care of an increasing population by plowing under grazing and hay lands, by reducing cotton acreage, by mechanizing farm operations, and adoption of scientific farming methods. Most of these changes cannot be repeated. Some have led to excess erosion, depletion, and loss of tremendous acreage, nor can we depend on a continuation of the favorable weather enjoyed during the past decade.

This special observation turned up by Dr. Coulter should also be thrown in here: In 19[illegible] agricultural census showed that 512,000,000 acres of land were available for growing crops. Included with this total 21,500,000 acres are under irrigation. Bureau of Reclamation facilities are capable of serving two and two-thirds million acres with a full water supply and about the same number with supplemental water. In addition, more than a half-million acres of Indian lands are served under existing facilities. It is estimated that our available water supply will serve about 16,500,000 acres not now irrigated and furnish additional supplies to some 9,000,000 more acres in need of supplemental water.

And whatever may be the facts today as to our food and fiber supply, we are pitifully negligent if we do not look to the future. Then what of further demands on our agricultural plant? We must recognize the dynamic character of our mounting population. Not only are requirements steadily increasing year by year on the present per capita basis, but the rate of population growth is right now in excess of 2,000,000 yearly. Projected into the future, this means an addition of 50,000,000 in the next 25 years, or a national population of 200,000,000 by 1975.

If it now requires 2½ acres of harvested crops per capita, at the present rate of consumption, well may the question be asked—Where are we going to secure 125,000,000 additional acres of good productive land to feed 50,000,000 more people in the next 2½ decades?

In 1950, the total acreage of wheat and corn in the entire country amounted to only 135,000,000 acres. Where, I ask you therefore, are we to secure 125,000,000 additional acres of good farm land, or even 75,000,000 acres? As a matter of fact, agricultural experts are hard put to even see 10,000,000 acres unless it be in the watering of arid lands in our Western States.

The Water Resources Policy Commission is to make its recommendations to the President December 1. Perhaps it is fortunate we are meeting in an annual session before the results of this committee's studies are made known. The principles which should guide our own determination of policy are fundamentally the same. They have been reiterated year after year in resolutions. We should be prepared to assert those principles with renewed vigor, should they in whole or in part happen to be in conflict with the Commission's findings. We shall not add to our stature by merely assuming a "me too" attitude of complacent acceptance of any policy fixing group, shall we say, for the sake of expediency.

One of the things we are going to hear much about in this convention—and with which the Columbia Basin area is currently justly concerned—is the so-called Basin Account with its related application of the interest component. They are both most important factors in the economic justification or feasibility of basin-wide projects. Some kind of basin-wide accounting is essential in our new concept of development of all of a river's multiple resources transcending State lines.

In a realistic evaluation, the interest component should be recognized as a subsidy, pure and simple, to be obtained through operation of the power features from different units of a given project. It became a subsidy or direct aid to irrigation only by interpretation of law (the Solicitor's Opinion) and not through any legislative act of Congress.

Any objection I hold to the use of the so-called "interest component" has never been its actual application to the building costs of Reclamation projects, but rather to the method employed in its use. So far as I know, Congress has never authorized its application. We have seemed to place ourselves in a position of fear, lest, if Congress be asked to approve what is being done, they might turn thumbs down. I am in fullest accord with Federal subsidy to whatever extent it is necessary to build worth-while reclamation projects—projects that meet the rigid test of economic feasibility—subsidy that will be paid back to the Government many times over. But let us ask for those subsidies on a basis of economic justification without fear or apology, with full understanding by the Congress, in support of a program that is sound, and for the good of all.

And in justification of subsidies—besides the economic features to which reference has always been made—may I point out another salient factor. It is most significant to me that the $7,000,000,000 expended by the Federal Government throughout these United States from the time the program was first instituted in 1824 (125 years ago) on water conservation and related works, our 17 western Reclamation States—while receiving only 35 percent of the total expenditures, will repay 72 percent of all the reimbursable money—or a ratio of more than 2 to 1 over other sections of the country. Five of these western States even show such notable repayment assignments as in excess of 95 percent of all funds expended on water resources by the Federal Government in their respective States. These are the States of: Arizona, 98.6 percent to be repaid; Wyoming, 97.3 percent; Utah, 96.4 percent; Idaho, 96 percent; and Nevada, 95.5 percent.

Yes, generation and sale of hydroelectric power remains a salient factor in further development of irrigation because of the necessity for finding a way to meet the ever-widening gap between that share of the cost which water users are able to pay and the total amount required for getting water supply onto arid lands. Conflicts have arisen in different areas, but it centers for the most part around two major questions:

1. Just how the revenue from sale of hydropower be applied to the cost of building irrigation projects.

2. How far should the Federal Government go in development of the so-called public power.

Should the basin-account method be employed for the pooling of funds in a basin like the Columbia, or the Missouri? Should the interest component be applied directly as a subsidy to irrigation development, or should rates be established to compensate for such interest obligations?

Should the Federal Government be permitted to expand its activities in the power distribution field to the end that transmission lines be constructed in given areas without regard to existing distribution facilities built with private capital or where private enterprise stands willing to construct any necessary expansion of transmitting facilities?

Should the ambitions of our Federal Government go on uncurbed by permitting such practice as in the Southwest, where, when specifically denied the use of funds to build transmission lines and steam plants by the Congress, it teams up with REA and goes right on doing what Congress specifically directed should not be done?

Should the Federal Government insist on taking ownership and management of power plants built and paid for by private irrigation districts just because they happen to come within the scope of consideration for supplementary water supply?

Should Federal agencies usurp the power of local self-rule or should the jurisdiction of States and local governmental entities be recognized as was the intent of the founders of our country?

All these questions are among those you will hear discussed during our sessions—and by men far more able to discuss them than myself. From these presentations I hope will come enlightenment that may make it possible for us to be more confident, more firm, in whatever conclusions we reach. Let it be crystal-clear that any defense we offer for private utilities is done solely on a basis that they are part and parcel of a private-enterprise system which we champion, and not because of any particular chosen segment of that system, or of any punitive obligation our organization might conceivably be under.

The President of the United States himself is credited with saying that he would be happy to have private power companies handle the transmission of Government-produced hydroelectric power whenever they can do as good a job as the Federal Government. Private utilities should take him at his word and rise to the occasion of that challenge. Congress should, at the same time, make a declaration of Federal power policy in keeping with fair appraisals of the capacities of private enterprise and the ever-increasing needs for more electric power. Private industry must stand ready to meet its full responsibility and measure up to what may reasonably be expected.

In connection with the authorization of any new power development, particularly as a defense measure during the present world crisis, we should be continually vigilant, lest some project, definitely containing potential irrigation factors, be authorized and constructed without specific provision for later development of the irrigation features of the given project as soon as practicable.

If the National Reclamation Association has any justification, certainly it is found in our obligation of service to water users, those who operate irrigation projects—the men on the land, as Marshall Dana will tell you. Sometimes it occurs to your president that our anxiety to secure construction of projects is not matched by our desire or determination to protect the interests of those in whose hands rest the fate of those projects, success or failure.

Here, too, we have witnessed in the past few years, as attention centered more and more on the basin-wide aspect, a tendency to impose upon operators restrictions indicative of unwarranted Federal control. Witness that, in spite of completion of several large reservoirs within the authorized Missouri Basin plan, save for negotiation on a very small municipal water supply unit, not one repayment contract has been successfully negotiated to this date—and it has been six years since the Pick-Sloan Plan was approved by Congress in the 1944 Flood Control Act.

Only uncompromising insistance by the Bureau of Reclamation for terms to which water users could not possibly comply, such as on the Frenchman-Cambridge project in Nebraska, the Owl Creek in Wyoming, and Heart Butte in North Dakota, seem to have been responsible for this situation. Our association through resolutions and otherwise should seek to remedy this situation as promptly as possible.

Expressions of public opinion become more and more pronounced that people of this Nation are not willing to accept greater regimentation of their economy. It is becoming plainer day by day that they want no superimposed governmental agency controling our destiny—no CVA's or MVA's—they want individual rights and the private-enterprise system to be kept inviolate. They frown upon those who would take lightly their obligations of office or cast aspersions upon men who place the highest premium on loyalty to American traditions in government.

From such expressions of public sentiment the Department of Interior, with which the future of reclamation is so incumbent, might well take another look, lest there remain in that arm of the Federal Government any individual whose loyalty to socialistic philosophies be placed above that of his own country—and let us not forget that the unmistakable pronouncement of such public opinion places upon the National Reclamation Association even greater responsibilities in the development and control of our water resources—responsibilities for protecting the rights of States and local governmental units against any further usurpation of their rights by Federal authorities.

I have faith that we will meet this test, because I have an abiding faith in America, faith in the West, faith in the people who are still willing to preserve our free form of government and the individual rights of every freedom-loving citizen.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

We should remember that while men risk their lives in battle lines, we at home have the very deep obligation to see that they are not deceived over what they fight to protect. We need to maintain a strong, a solvent Government—a balanced economy—a contented citizenry.

Proper guarding and sound development of our natural water resources will make as significant a contribution to these obligations as any other single undertaking to which we could employ our talents.

As we go into the 20th year of our existence for the National Reclamation Association, one of the most pressing needs of our organization is the establishment of a unified attitude and approach toward our common objectives. Differences of opinion are healthy for anybody; they make for sounder conclusions always—but those differences must of necessity come into final focus of unity to gain our ends; when we march into battle, we must be of one mind, pressing toward one common goal, if our objective is to be won.

Ability to reconcile differences provides a real test of one's true capacity for public service, his ability to adjust himself to ever-changing conditions in a changing world.

It was Thomas Jefferson, that great defender of liberty, who once said, "I am not an advocate for frequent changes in laws and institutions, but laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind as that becomes more developed, more enlightened, and as new discoveries are made, new truths discovered, and manner and opinions change, with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also to keep pace with the times."

And so it is with us. Times and customs change. We must be able to adjust ourselves to those changes which will make for a greater west and a greater America.

A Reservist's View of the Reserve Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES P. NELSON

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include the following letter received from a soldier constituent, because I think it gives enlightening information at first hand on the way our Reserve program is being handled. I have omitted the name of the constituent so that he may incur no difficulties.

The letter follows:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: For quite some time I have been considering writing you a letter, hoping to bring to your attention a few of the past and present conditions which have confused and still are confusing me in my tour of Army duty.

To begin with, I and many of my companions in the Army today are members of the Enlisted Reserve Corps. Many of us enlisted because we were given to understand that the Reserve Corps was to be a pool of highly trained and skilled personnel from which the Army would draw its technicians and specialists in the event that this country was ever required to fight another war. Many of us were married, had families, and believed that the Enlisted Reserves was just the place to keep us informed on what was going on in the Army so that, should we be needed, we would be ready to serve in the best way we knew how.

Secondly, a great number of the Enlisted Reserves were assigned to units. These were units of the same branch of the service in which they had served before. Many of their friends and fellow workers belonged to these units. They felt that by joining these units, they would at least have the comfort of being with someone they knew, should their units be called to active duty.

Now comes the one and only gripe or complaint that I have to register. Why weren't the Organized Reserves called as units, so that each man could be assigned to the work for which he was trained, without a great deal of additional training, hardship, and, in some cases, broken hearts and spirits?

We were first of all disbanded as units, assigned to inactive groups, then assigned to volunteer Reserve groups. After this we were called for physical examinations and, before we had a chance to get our second wind, were told to report for active duty. Some of your Massachusetts colleagues have been investigating this for the past 3 or 4 weeks, mostly because of the fact that the enlisted Reserve group that was called from that State had so little time to get their personal affairs settled before leaving for camp. This is the group that you probably have read about in the Boston papers, who threatened to charter a bus and go a. w. o. l. if they were not granted a few days at home before leaving this camp for overseas. I happened to be assigned to the same company as these men and it was largely through their efforts that I was able to get a few days at home myself, although most of the boys from Maine who were called did get a longer period of time to close up their personal affairs than the boys from Massachusetts.

There are a great deal of other things that puzzle me. Some of them I may be all wet on, but others seem to be happening to the other reservists in this camp, and also in other camps where reservists have been trained.

Most of us were recalled as specialists or technicians, but when we arrived here at Camp Breckinridge we were assigned to infantry training units and plainly told that we were cannon fodder and that we were headed for Korea, or any other hot spot where the cold war got too hot.

Many of us had had no previous infantry training, and many others, including myself, had never had training with any of the Army weapons, yet we were given 96 hours of basic infantry training as a refresher course. A refresher course, in my way of thinking, is learning something that you have forgotten; it cannot refresh your memory if you never knew it before.

Many of us attempted to get assigned to this post or to any other post where we would not be too far from home. Although there is a crying need for trained technicians and specialists right here on this post, the men were sent to Korea, or to some other overseas post. In some cases the commanding officers of the various units on the post attempted to have us transferred to their units but were told by higher headquarters that this was not possible. Myself and five others were called to the post hospital, interviewed by the adjutant, and asked if we would like to be assigned. We were all former members of the medical department and he told us that he was short of trained personnel and would get us transferred as soon as we made up our minds whether we would like it here or not. Nothing came of it, but 2 weeks later we were assigned to the post hospital on special duty and four of us spent 2 weeks cleaning out empty buildings. The nurses and doctors assigned to the hospital are asking for trained help and they are getting men from various branches of the service who have only seen the inside of a hospital or dispensary as patients. The above I know about because it actually happened to me, and, if what I hear is true, it has happened to others from other companies and other branches of the service. Why is the Army sending its trained men overseas and spending a lot of time and money taking men out of various units and training them in some other specialties when there is such an acute shortage of manpower in this country and so few trained and skilled specialists? An example of this is happening right here at the post hospital. A nurse is assigned to teach the new men assigned to the hospital for duty, yet there are literally hundreds of trained medics on the post who could do the jobs without any training. I should say, were on the post, because most of them have been transferred to parts unknown.

I am not intending for this letter to be a complaint, the Good Lord knows that you receive enough of them from other people. These are some things which I have had on my mind for quite some time. I thought at first that it was just like before, the old Army game, but now I begin to think that maybe something else is behind it all. I went home for a few days in November and during my trip I met a lot of people and talked to a lot of people. I also met a large number of soldiers, both officers and enlisted men. I find that the same thing is happening in other camps. It is not the fault of the officers commanding our companies, regiments, or divisions. They have cooperated with us as much as they were permitted to in granting leaves, furloughs, passes, and many other things that we have asked for, but when it comes to assignment of personnel at the job which they should be doing, no one on this post seems to have the authority to do that. Someone is creating a lot of confusion. Every day we read in the Army Times or other Army publications that certain changes for the good of the Army are being made, or are to be made, yet in the next issue these changes have been suspended or postponed. We are told that if we have had a long period of prior active service and have families, we will not be sent overseas. We read about this in news dispatches from Washington, yet men are being sent overseas who have spent 4 or 5 years there. We read about men being deferred from the draft for minor physical ailments, yet we have men in our company and some who have been sent overseas who were receiving compensation from the Veterans' Administration before being recalled to active duty. This is another point worth remembering; a great number of reservists were called to active duty and given the flimsiest of physical examinations. As soon as they arrived in camp they were given examinations by the Army doctors and discharged as soon as the paper work could be completed. Another waste of time and manpower.

Although all the things that I have mentioned above are happening and will continue to happen, the morale is good. We have been pretty low sometimes but always manage to get back up to where we can face another day. There are a large number of men going a. w. o. l., but most of them are scheduled for overseas shipment and that is about the only way that they can get home to say good-by to their wives and families before leaving. Very few of them failed to return in time to go out with their shipment group.

It is the opinion of a large number of us that someone is fouling the Army up. Who it is, we don't know, but we do know that should the Communists attempt to create confusion and unrest, dissension, broken morale, and loss of spirit in the Army today, they would be using just about the same tactics that have been used to confuse us. We don't think it is the Communists, but, whatever it is, they are doing a beautiful job.

I believe that you must have read about enough of this, if you could go this far. You can use this letter for whatever it is worth, and if you want to, you can read it in Congress. It may help the people of this country realize what they are up against. By the time it reaches you I may be on my way overseas, or to some other camp, although I am not yet on orders to ship out.

Yours for peace,

An Additional Advertising Blast by Omaha Doctors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, part 7 of the Omaha doctors' "lie and smear" advertising campaign is as follows.

On October 31, 1950, the following advertisement appeared in the Omaha World-Herald:

MR. WAGE EARNER, DO YOU WANT ANOTHER DEDUCTION FROM YOUR PAY CHECK?

The proposed compulsory national health insurance (socialized medicine) would mean another payroll deduction.

WHAT IS IT?

Compulsory national health insurance is politically controlled medicine. It is not insurance by any stretch of the imagination.

WHO RUNS IT?

The Government will through the Federal Security Agency. This agency will collect the tax (another deduction from your pay check), control the money, set the rules, determine the service, direct doctor and patient participation, and dominate every citizen's medical affairs.

WHAT DOES IT COST?

Estimates of tax economists and medical experts range from $6,000,000,000 to $18,000,000,000 a year.

WHO PAYS FOR IT?

You do, whether you want it or not. Every wage earner will have to pay through another payroll deduction.

WHAT ARE THE BENEFITS?

The sponsors use such vague terms as "when funds are available," "insofar as possible," and "when facilities permit." The only positive thing is that it guarantees a new payroll tax and less take-home money for you.

IS IT GOOD FOR AMERICA?

No; because in every great nation that has tried it—Germany, Russia, France, and Great Britain—the results have been: second-rate medical care; decline of medical education and research; invasion of the patient's personal privacy; political control in place of medical direction; a new hierarchy of government administrators; a growing-bigger-by-the-day tax burden, and the extension of control over other professions.

Make no mistake, Government-sponsored compulsory health insurance is socialized medicine. You will be the one to suffer. If you value your health and your liberty, fight to keep bureaucratic politics out of medicine, your American medicine that has made America the healthiest great Nation in the world. Fight by electing to Congress a Representative that will fight to keep socialism from the American scene.

This ad paid for by the Healing Arts Committee. Dr. M. C. Howard, chairman; doctors, Dr. J. Phil Redgwick; nurses, Claire J. Siemsen, R. N.; technicians, Rita Gillespie; dentists, Dr. C. H. Schroeder; druggists, W. E. Shainholtz; optometrists, Dr. W. F. Noland; chiropodists, Dr. H. G. Wieseman.

Vote for HOWARD BUFFETT for Congress on November 7.

On November 1, 1950, this advertisement appeared in the Omaha World-Herald:

Blue Shield, the doctors' own plan for surgical-medical care, observes its sixth anniversary by announcing new, more liberal surgical and medical benefits.

These expanded benefits will be offered to employee and community groups enrolling after October 31. The new program will replace all existing memberships beginning January 1, 1951, as payments fall due. The new benefits follow:

In-hospital medical care is increased from 30 days to 70 days per admission, and the benefit payment is increased from $3 per day to $4 per day.

Benefit payments for numerous major operations are increased from $150 to $200.

Benefit payments for numerous other services have been increased.

The schedule of benefits also includes a number of services not formerly listed.

Increased benefits for some types of radiation treatment for cancer.

The following is a brief summary of the other benefits which Blue Shield membership provides:

1. Benefits for setting of fractures and dislocations.
2. Allowances for minor surgery in the doctor's office.
3. Benefits for blood transfusions, pathological services, and electrocardiograph. (In-hospital medical care cases only.)
4. Allowances for X-rays for accident, in-hospital care and surgical cases.
5. Benefits for maternity and obstetrical care after 10 months' continuous family membership.
6. Allowances for anesthesia.
7. The amounts listed in the schedule of benefits will be accepted as full payment for services by Blue Shield participating physicians if the member's annual income does not exceed $2,600 (if married) or $1,800 (if single).

OUR RECORD OF SERVICE TO NEBRASKA

The Blue Shield plan was organized November 1, 1944, by the Omaha Douglas County Medical Society, and was approved later by the Nebraska State Medical Association. Because of outstanding service to its members, the plan has grown steadily and rapidly until today it points proudly to this record: Number of members, 140,631; services rendered, 61,506; amount paid to date for members' services, $2,010,190.

Smart people know a good thing when they see it.

Membership in the Blue Shield plan is available to persons working in firms where there are four or more employed. For full particulars write the Blue Shield plan today.

Blue Shield endorsed by your doctors, has been awarded the seal of acceptance by the American Medical Association for excellence of contract. More than 80 percent of the premium dollar is returned to subscribers in service benefits.

THE BLUE SHIELD PLAN.

The Relation of Foreign Affairs to the American Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WRIGHT PATMAN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. W. R. POAGE, Member of Congress, ranking member of the House Committee on Agriculture, delivered before the annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation at Dallas, Tex., December 13, 1950:

THE RELATION OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS TO THE AMERICAN FARMER

Mr. Chairman, as a member of the American Farm Bureau Federation myself, I want to thank the people of Dallas for their splendid hospitality; as a citizen of Texas, I want to extend to all those from other sections a hearty welcome, not only to the great city of Dallas—"Big D," as we say—but I want to urge you to visit the black prairies, the red hills, the high plains, and the irrigated valleys which, with the people who inhabit these areas, make of Texas the No. 1 agricultural State of the Union. You will be mighty welcome wherever you go.

The Farm Bureau has done much for farm people in Texas, just as it has for farm people across America. Down here in Texas we think we are especially fortunate to have Walter Hammond as our leader. He is a great American by any standard, and more and more people are coming to know it each year. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture in the House of Representatives, I am always happy when Walter appears before our committee as a representative of the farmers of my home State. He is one of the great group of men and women, many of whom are here today, who have contributed so much to the wonderful progress that has been made in the standard of rural living in recent years.

It has only been in the last half century that we have begun to recognize agriculture as one of the most complicated, as well as one of the most vital activities of civilized man. When I was a boy, I lived in a typical agricultural community in central west Texas, 30 miles from the nearest railroad. I can well remember that every boy with any ambition at all looked forward to preparing himself for some type of urban activity. We thought that when a man failed at everything else, he could turn to farming. So long as rural people held agriculture in such low esteem, is it any wonder that city folks called us hayseeds? Until this viewpoint was reversed, there was indeed little opportunity on the farm, and I am inclined to believe that possibly the greatest service which farm organizations like the Farm Bureau have rendered was to give the world, and particularly the farm people themselves, a better understanding of the dignity and the complexity of agriculture as a profession.

Were it not for the fact that I know our farmers are today among our best informed citizens, I should be most reluctant to attempt to speak on the relations of foreign affairs to the American farmer. Most of us realize that just now anything that involves the foreign relations of our Government vitally affects every group, but I doubt if most of us realize how generally our relations with foreign countries are misunderstood and how likely is anyone who speaks on the subject to be misinterpreted. There is, therefore, a general reluctance on the part of public speakers to touch on this subject. I believe, however, that this is no time for silence. I would not invite or encourage desertion, but I believe real unity of purpose can only be obtained by frank discussion and understanding of our problems. I believe that our farmers, better than some other groups, know that the world has grown small. Today it requires far less time to travel from Dallas to Bangkok, Johannesburg, or San Paula, or for that matter to any spot on the face of the globe than it did to travel to the capital of this State when Neely Bryan built the first cabin in what was to become this commercial center of the Southwest. Yes the world has grown exceedingly small. Space must today be measured in hours of elapsed time, not in miles or leagues. Even a short generation ago, we first reluctantly admitted that we might be influenced by European affairs, but we were smugly confident that we would never have more than an academic interest in the economy or the government of Siberia, Korea, Ceylon, or Iran. Today the very mention of Siberia and Korea bring up most unpleasant pictures. Possibly we better become equally well acquainted with Ceylon and Iran, and that promptly, if we would avoid similar unpleasant familiarity a little farther down the line. And the American farmer may have a much closer relationship with those events than he realizes.

Let me give you an illustration of what I mean. I visited the Middle East just a couple of months ago. I found it to be a land of abject poverty, of exploitation of the masses and of scanty and undeveloped natural resources. In short, I found it dangerously ready in many respects for a communistic revolution. It still contains some of the strongest anticommunistic sentiment in the world. I therefore don't mean that the Middle East is lost, but it will be lost if we fail to try to understand its problems. I doubt, however, if I would have gone to the Middle East or learned much about these problems myself had I not had them forced on me. Early in September I went to Dublin with the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, my good friend, Hon. HAROLD COOLEY, of North Carolina. Along with seven other Members of the House and Senate we constituted the American delegation to the Interparliamentary Union, a meeting of representatives from the parliaments of the world. During the course of debate a delegate from Ceylon rose and pointed his finger toward the American delegation and said, "You have food to give to any man whose skin is white, but you have none for starving people who are black or brown." He continued and charged that our agriculture program was deliberately designed to keep the price of food so high that the people of Southeast Asia could not buy it. He then went on to say that there were 600,000,000 starving people on our side of the iron curtain. He closed with the communistic line that "as between starvation and communism, we will take the latter."

Obviously, the American delegation could not let such a challenge go unanswered. After a caucus, I was selected to answer the charges. I answered his last charge first because I realized that it was merely an expression of the common but fatal lack of understanding of the choices available to them which has led people in various parts of the world to embrace communism. A people can take both communism and starvation, but they cannot choose between them. The acceptance of communism has never saved any people from starvation. It is true that democracy cannot alone guarantee an adequate standard of living, but communism can and does give rather definite assurance of want. The people of South Asia do not have the choice which the gentleman from Ceylon posed.

It was, I felt, a rather simple matter to point out that our gifts of food have never been based on the race or color of the recipient. We have given food and other necessities to distressed people all over the world including those of Japan and India. True, we have recently extended greater aid to the people of Western Europe. This fact grew out of the emergency nature of their need and the fact that the terrible war damage in that part of the world was incurred as a result of a conflict in which we were a participant. Certainly Ceylon and India have suffered no comparable interference with their own productivity.

Probably the question as to our price structure was the most difficult to answer. It was difficult because I realized that this man from the other side of the earth could hardly be expected to understand a program which is so generally misunderstood at home.

Under our system farm production is dependent on the hope of reasonably high prices. Our farm program is intended to strengthen the hope of an adequate return to the producer. In short, the American method of getting production is to hold out the hope of rewards to the producer. This is the antithesis of the communistic method. Communism, which our friend from Ceylon threatened to embrace, seeks to secure production by assigning goals and punishing those who do not achieve these goals.

I have never been in Russia, but I was in Yugoslavia some 2 months ago. I recognize that vital differences exist between Yugoslavia and Russia. For purely military reasons I approve the aid extended to the Yugoslavs. Were I in Washington today I would vote for it. In order that my appearance here might not jeopardize this aid I arranged a pair before I left. I do not believe that Tito will even take a stand with us except to the extent that he feels it is to his own advantage, but I am convinced that we will do well to make it to his advantage to at least remain neutral. If the Yugoslavs never fire a shot, the existence of 32 divisions on the Russian flank will surely tie down a very considerable Russian or satellite army which would otherwise be free to attack us. All of this does not, however, blind me to the fact that the drought is not the only reason for a famine in Yugoslavia. I think that the substitution of the threat of punishment for the hope of reward has had as much to do with Yugoslavia's present unfortunate food shortage as has the weather.

There are only two ways of securing the production of food anywhere in the world. One is the American way—the democratic way—the way of free enterprise, the hope of rewards proportionate to the production. This is the system that has worked. It is the system that enabled America to serve as the bread basket of the democratic world during and following two World Wars.

The other system is the Russian system, the system of all dictators, the communistic system, the threat of punishment in case of failure to produce. The Communists assign quotas. They say, "Bring in 200 bushels of wheat. We don't care how you get it. Grow it. If drought, flood, or grasshoppers come, that is your hard luck. If you can't grow the wheat, buy, beg, borrow, or steal it, but deliver the 200 bushels or to jail you go." That system has never gotten the desired results, and I don't believe it will. I, therefore, pointed out to the gentleman from Ceylon that an abandonment of our price structure could only be expected to reduce our total food production. That only by increasing, not decreasing, the total food supplies of the world could he expect to ever get greater amounts of food for Asia. I reminded him that possibly the fundamental fallacy in the whole communistic philosophy was the assumption that the unfortunate people of the world would have more simply by destroying the prosperity of the more fortunate. It is easy to make the rich poor by destroying all wealth, but the poor can only be made rich by widening the opportunities of all.

To those of us who enjoy most of the comforts and many of the luxuries of life, as you and I do, the promises of communism are so hollow and so obviously false that it is difficult for us to understand how great masses of people can accept them. In fact, I doubt that any substantial portion of the people of any country has even believed in communism, but I can well understand how the hopeless masses of many eastern and even some European countries might conclude that they had nothing to lose with a change, any change, and therefore, attempt to try the glittering promises of some self-seeking, would-be commissar or just plain fellow traveler.

To fully appreciate the possible acceptance of these promises you should visit some of the poor nations of the world. Probably one-half the people of the world are today wondering where they will get tomorrow's food. To these people the phrases "freedom of speech," "human dignity," "democratic processes" and the like have very little meaning. Actually I wonder if much of our difficulty in dealing with people the world over does not spring from our general failure to understand just how basic and how primitive are the needs of such a large part of the world's population. Certain it is that if we are to halt the advance of communism, we must not only stop its aggressive leadership with the same naked force which those leaders themselves use, but we must at the same time offer the people of all lands real hope of improving their physical welfare. We must teach them that only by having more for all, can any group long have more for itself. We must make the people of the less favored sections of the world know that we cannot feed and clothe them. If we sent all the food America can produce to southeast Asia, it would not be enough to provide for that section of the world alone. We must teach these people how to help themselves. We can and should assure them of our cooperation—our help in developing their resources, our willingness to share our knowledge and experience with them, but we must at the same time make it plain that they are to be working members of the team—not mere mascots for us to feed.

Since the close of World War II, we have given away billions, in grants, loans and credits. We have been motivated by a sincere desire to speed recovery everywhere. Of course, we hoped that our action would help the United States, and it has, but the direct beneficiaries have been the people of distant lands, particularly of Europe, although we have spent billions in China, Japan, and the Philippines. We have sought no exclusively selfish benefits, except to the extent that we have hoped that America, like all the rest of the world, would gain from a prosperous, rebuilt, and peaceful world. We loaned England nearly $4,000,000,000 in the hope that it would prime the economic pump. Then we offered ECA—the Marshall plan. This has been the greatest example in recorded history of unselfish international assistance. The tragedy is that it has not been a real cooperative enterprise as its name implied.

We tried to cooperate, but we seem to have forgotten that cooperation is a two-way street. I think the ECA program has on the whole been very well administered. It has assisted in the rebuilding of European industry which provided jobs for idle men and women. It has enabled millions of Europeans to earn their own food rather than receive it as a dole, but in our proper anxiety to keep this a recovery, not a relief plan, we have failed to make the masses of the people understand just how it aids them. The French worker is likely only to see that he is today paying far more francs for a loaf of bread than he ever paid before. In these circumstances, he is not likely to be overcome with appreciation for the fact that American dollars given to his government made it possible for him to have a job to earn the francs and for a long time at least made it possible for him to have a job to which the bread was made—and I am not so sure that all of you here today who have sold cotton, pork, or wheat for export through the ECA have realized that your market price was closely dependent on the economic cooperative program.

ECA has bought breathing space for us and has undoubtedly justified itself on this ground, if no other. It has, in addition, assured millions of American farmers of a good export market. It has not, however, been able to bring about the fundamental changes in European thought and practice which are essential to any lasting stability. True, most of us have recognized the unenlightened employer-worker relations of European industry. We have seen the unwarranted power that is so often exerted over European governments by selfish vested interests. We have questioned the cartel system which eliminates competition while at the same time maintaining low wages, high prices, and higher profits at the expense of all the people. We have been shocked at the widespread tax evasion that exists in so many countries. We have tried to secure a correction of these evils. We have pointed out our own experiences, but we have not felt we could require domestic reforms as a price on our assistance.

In this, I feel we have been in error. I have felt and still feel that we should put American aid on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. Doubtless, some of the countries of Europe would at this time "leave it." I believe that the time has come when some of them could get along very well on their own resources. I know of no better way of testing them. Of course, we have no right to require antitrust laws or tax reforms beyond our own borders, but neither does any other people have a right to demand American aid. If they want our aid, let them give evidence that it will be put to the most effective use.

I strongly believe that we should seek to make our aid a part of a cooperative program every here we can. There are very few cases where something of value could not move to the United States. I know that there are instances where a whole people has suffered loss or disaster. In such cases I would give direct relief. I would have my country go to the aid of distressed people anywhere in the world, and I would ask no repayment. Just as you would extend aid to your neighbor whose house had burned or whose family had suffered an automobile accident, so should our country extend a helping hand in case of physical disaster. If, however, the crisis is monetary, why not apply the same economic principles that apply between neighbors? If your neighbor needed your corn but found he was without cash with which to buy it, might you not expect to sell a few calves rather than to ask you to give him the corn? If he had nothing else, you might take some turkeys even though you did not need turkeys just at that time. It seems to me that this is the principle we should apply to nations. We should take whatever a country has to offer in return for our aid. I would not be too demanding. I might take a few chips and whetstones, but I would rather take something and close the transaction than to make a grant or a loan that I knew the borrower could not repay. I know of no surer way of making enemies than to loan people money which they cannot repay. It is much better to buy something which we don't particularly need than to get someone under financial obligation to us—in other than a normal business transaction.

Let me give you an example of what I mean. I was recently in Iran (old Persia). While I was there the United States was negotiating the making of a loan of $25,000,000 to the Iranian Government. At the same time, the Soviet Union was negotiating a trade agreement involving about the same amount. The Russians proposed to buy the entire Iranian rice crop. They were seeking to get it just as cheaply as they could. On the other hand, we asked nothing in return for our $25,000,000 except an I O U. Maybe we would get our money back some time because Iran is one of the few countries which has a dependable income from oil royalties, but surely we could not hope to make a profit from the transaction. Which one of these negotiations do you suppose held the spotlight of local attention? The Russian trade agreement, of course. It meant a market for the farmers' rice; the American loan was purely academic. I cannot but believe that it would have been better for us in every way if we had bought the rice crop, even though we might have had to pay far above world price to get it. Not only would we have had something that we could use to help people in some other part of the world, but we would have built far more lasting friendships in Iran than we can with a $25,000,000 loan or gift.

Every one of us knows from our own everyday experience that individuals take a greater interest in those undertakings in which they have an investment of time or money. That is why large corporations like to get their stock widely distributed, particularly in the hands of those who work for or buy from the corporation. That is the reason so many modern farm management plans try to give to the man who does the work a share along with the owner in livestock as well as crops. What is true of individuals in this respect is true of nations. Those nations who have contributed most to the defense of free society are the ones which feel they have a stake in collective security. Those that have made no contributions are prone to feel that it is not their responsibility. I think we as a nation have been all too ready to accept responsibility which we should have asked others to assume. We have acted as an indulgent parent who does all the work rather than ask the children to assume responsibility. It may be easier at the moment for mother to make the biscuits than it is to teach Mary, and it may be easier for dad to milk the cows than it is to corral Henry, but Mary and Henry will not make the self-reliant citizens they should if they continue to avoid their share of home duties. I am convinced that we would have more numerous and more reliable allies if we would make every nation we can put something into the common effort to stop communism. In practical terms, let Spain send us mercury; let India send bamboo, if she has nothing else, but let us get something.

Some nations will have no products to contribute, but these very nations can often contribute the most valuable resource of all—manpower. In the Far East nothing is so cheap as human beings, but we need not go that far to find millions of unemployed young men who would, I am convinced, be delighted at a chance to get a job in the United States Army.

More than a year ago I visited Europe and was greatly impressed with the necessity of promptly providing some strong military force which could reasonably expect to stop a Russian invasion on the ground. I recognized, as I believe many people are now beginning to recognize, that we can expect little real support from the people of Western Germany, France, Belgium, or of other European countries unless we can hold out to them the prospect of actually preventing invasion. It is not enough to tell these people that we will return and liberate them after a period of Russian occupation and after the destruction of all of their industrial and transportation facilities by our rear-guard forces as we fought our way to the Atlantic.

Of course, it is impossible for the United States to provide the needed manpower without placing our own country on a 100 percent war footing and drafting men who are needed on our farms and in our factories. At the same time there are literally thousands of unemployed Germans of military age, who could not hope to secure a better job than a place in the United States Army. I, therefore, suggested that we should immediately enlist in the United States Army as many as 25 divisions of German Nationals for the defense of Europe, and approximately a similar number of Japanese for the defense of Asia. I suggested that these recruits should be volunteers, that they should be paid by the United States Government in their own national currency (which would be purchased from their local government, thereby creating dollar buying power just as effectively as if we had made a gift of dollars).

We could maintain these Germans in Europe and Japanese in Asia at a far less cost to our Government than is involved in supporting a like number of American troops in the same areas.

Of course, we cannot abandon the build-up of Armed Forces in the United States. This will continue to be necessary, but I do suggest that these European and Asiatic forces would be of tremendous value to us in furnishing a hard core around which to build the defenses of Western Europe and of eastern Asia. Until such a nucleus is established, and until it is strong enough to offer a reasonable prospect of being able to stop aggression, no amount of diplomatic nicety is going to induce the people who are adjacent to the Red army to risk their own national existence on any kind of North Atlantic, United Nations, Western Europe, or other joint defense force. There is no way whereby we can give other free nations the needed assurance of effective strength than to place a substantial armed force in both Europe and Asia.

Surely the terrible events of recent days should convince the most skeptical that we must use whatever resources are at hand. The manpower of Western Germany and Japan is at hand. We should use it, not only for our own defense, but for the defense of Germany and Japan themselves.

When I first made this proposal more than a year ago, it met with such favorable response at the hands of the members of the Armed Services Committee that I was encouraged to hope that the committee would take positive action. I realize that matters of this kind are more effectively initiated by the committee which has jurisdiction of the subject matter. The committee, however, took no action. About 4 months ago, I, therefore, introduced a bill, authorizing the President to accept enlistments of nationals of other countries particularly the nationals of Germany and of Japan.

The proposal has so far failed to receive the support which I believe it merits. Undoubtedly, it is not perfect. I am sure others can offer constructive criticism, but the pressure of events is such that we do not have further time for deliberation. This is not a new proposal. It was made 15 months ago. It is not one on which it is necessary to make new or original research. It has been actively discussed for more than a year. As I see it, this is one of the first and one of the most simple things we should do. Not only does it offer us a much needed source of manpower. It also would go far toward tying to our cause the very people who would supply this manpower.

Just now every American is distressed and sick at heart as a result of the catastrophe which has befallen both our arms and our diplomacy in Korea. Never did America suffer a defeat of such magnitude. It is no time to seek a scapegoat. It is not a time for recriminations. There has been too much of that. Too many people in their endeavor to fix responsibility have overlooked the Communists. They are the real cause of our present plight, and we should realize it. Even here no impassioned denunciation of Asiatic treachery will improve our situation. Only a cool and sober appraisal of our situation and the courses open to us can aid in bringing about an improvement.

The question of where to fight must, of course, be left to our military commanders. However, the question of whether we will fight or whether we will abandon the entire Korean Peninsula is, it seems to me, a decision which the American people themselves must make. Our Nation, not simply the generals, made the decision to go into Korea last June when the Communists of North Korea first started on the path of undisguised aggression. The President properly took the responsibility of resisting this aggression. The Congress supported him and provided funds. The United Nations condemned the acts of the Communists. I think it is fair to say the American people overwhelmingly approved the action taken. In those early days our forces were not only greatly outnumbered; they were confronted by greatly superior equipment—tanks, artillery, the like. They were forced back, mile by mile, but they fought for every town and for every pass. Conditions were rough, but the decision to fight had been made by the people, and our boys never questioned it. They fought against great odds and finally won a great and glorious victory over the North Korean Communists.

Now we are engaged in a second war in Korea, still against Communists, but this time they are from China. Our forces are more numerous, but our foes have multiplied many times. We are again greatly outnumbered, but we do have the superiority of equipment this time. We now have rather adequate supplies and lines of communication. We still retain control of the air. We now have great superiority in large tanks and artillery. We may again be forced to fight from one or more small beachheads, but our soldiers have held beachheads against odds before, and I am convinced that if the American people say, "hold," they will do so now.

This is the terrible decision that you and I must make. If we say, stay, it may result in appalling loss of life, but if we say run, we are faced with the question of how will we avoid more disastrous retreats in Europe, and an even more staggering loss of life.

Faced with such a grave choice, I shall not attempt to speak for anyone other than myself, but decisions must be made. Before our country can make a decision, our people as individuals must make their own separate decisions. I, therefore, give my personal views only in the hope they may help others clarify their thinking.

My feeling is that we cannot honorably withdraw from Korea, except under fire from the enemy. We have set our hand to the defense of Korea from Communist aggression. Are we now to repudiate our promise of aid because the undertaking becomes more difficult than we had anticipated? If we now leave the people of South Korea to their fate, how can any people be expected to place any reliance in our promise of aid? Surely the prestige of the United States would sink to an unbelievable low. But it will be argued that we should not let any matters of prestige stand in the way of saving American lives, and I agree, but I must call your attention to the fact that when we voluntarily withdraw from Korea, we cannot step back into the position of comparative safety we occupied last June. As a Nation, we might continue to exist, but we would be left without a dependable friend or ally. The United Nations could never survive such a retreat. British Prime Minister Chamberlain thought that he had achieved peace for our time when he walked out on Czechoslovakia. Actually, he but laid the groundwork for the most serious defeat and the heaviest loss of life Britain ever suffered. I don't think we can save ourselves by appeasement, and I am sure that such a course would be as disastrous to the only organization we now have for collective security as was the timidity of the European nations in the 1930's to rebuke Japanese and Italian aggression through the old League of Nations.

It would mean the end of the United Nations, but it would mean more. It would mean that we would immediately be faced with the necessity of retreat from Europe. The American people would undoubtedly demand such a retreat if they were convinced that we had met with military disaster in the east, and indeed I would myself feel that it was then futile to try to hold on there. Russia would be presented with the concrete evidence of our inability to resist communistic arms, the evidence which she has sought so long and so hard to give to the people of Europe. The Berlin airlift would be forgotten. The collapse of the Greek revolt would be avenged. The will of the fighting Turks would probably snap. Surely Iran and the Middle East would readily make concessions to avoid a military decision.

Our difficulties in Japan would be multiplied. Communism would undoubtedly sweep Indochina and spread to India and Indonesia. Even if Russia did not immediately move into Europe two-thirds of the world's population would be arrayed against us in a matter of months. I do not believe we, as a nation, could long survive. I must, therefore, urge a continuing fight on the Korean Peninsula.

But you ask, how can we hope to carry on war with the 450,000,000 Chinese? Not by land invasion of China. The Japanese are merely the last of many who have tried that and failed. No; we would be forced to use the means available to us. These means include control of the sea and the air. They include the knowledge that the present Communist government of China has foes at home as well as abroad. I think we can confidently assume that there are today hundreds of thousands of guerrillas in China. Whether they are really Nationalists, or just plain bandits, matters little for our present purpose. With a little encouragement they will harrass the government. They will make it extremely difficult to restore the economy of that war-torn land. The truth is that it is entirely probable that the Communist rulers of China have embarked on the present Korean war on the old principle of all dictators, that when all other efforts fail to bring unity to a bankrupt nation, it is time to involve the country in a foreign war. Fortunately for us, Chinese economy is in a desperate plight. Fortunately for us, China's industry and transportation are wide open to attack from the air, and from guerrilla bands. There is only one railroad line from Canton and South China to the rest of the country. It should not be too difficult to keep it cut. China's seaports are all vulnerable to blockade. We have a powerful fleet in eastern waters now. I would use it to stop all Chinese trade by sea. This would, for practical purposes, leave the Chinese Reds with no source of outside supplies except from the U. S. S. R. and that would be dependent on a few and very long transportation lines.

China has a mutual assistance pact with Russia. There are many who sincerely fear that were we to bomb Chinese cities or railroads with the American Air Force, the Russians might intervene. Personally, I believe that Russia will enter the war any day she feels it to her interest to do so and that she will not do so until she feels it is to her interest regardless of any obligation to the contrary and that, therefore, the mutual assistance pact need not deter us from taking any action the military situation suggests. Personally, I would send the American Air Force to bomb the war industries of Manchuria and the American Navy to blockade Shanghai, but if it is felt that we should not do this directly, the Russians themselves have shown us how efficiently third parties may assume responsibility. Surely no one could not object to supplying Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek with the needed planes and ships to harass and blockade the Chinese mainland.

In the meantime, our forces could hold on in Korea while we build up a new army in Japan. True, we cannot divert sufficient manpower from the United States to match the Chinese forces in Korea, but we can enlist Japanese in the United States Army, and we can equip and train them in a minimum of time. Many of them are veterans, who have fought the Chinese before. We can send them to the relief of our troops now in Korea more quickly than we can train and send boys from the States, and with the numbers we can reasonably expect to make available from Japan, we can hope to again sweep Korea free from Communistic domination.

This, my friends, seems to me to offer the only practical hope of preventing both military and moral bankruptcy not only in the United States but in the entire democratic world.

I realize that what I have had to say has been of a somber vain, entirely out of keeping with the ordinary character of a farm bureau meeting, but these are somber times. If this country is to survive as the great free land we love, we must have the benefit of the best thinking of our farm people. The country's fate is in your hands, my friends, in a much more real and definite manner than many of you have yet realized. I sincerely appreciate the opportunity to discuss our common problems with you, and I hope to be able to meet with you again in the not too distant future under far more cheerful circumstances.

The Physically Handicapped and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 13 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a timely statement by Secretary of Defense Marshall, urging the employment of the physically handicapped. This statement appears on page 16 of the December issue of Performance, a Department of Labor publication devoted to the physically handicapped.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

(By George C. Marshall)

Both as Secretary of Defense and as an associate member of the President's Committee on National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week, I strongly endorse the program for the selective placement of physically handicapped persons in industry and Government. I urge American industry—management and labor—and all communities in need of productive human services to recognize the availability and the qualifications of those physically handicapped and to find work for them. I consider such a project an indispensable element in our national defense program.

We are engaged in a great preparedness effort. Military strength is a compound of men, money, and munitions and of the three the first is by far the most vital. By men I do not mean just human beings for if our survival merely depended on numbers we would lag far behind many other countries. What I do mean is men of training and discipline in our Armed Forces, and men of skill and talent in their support, men who can produce weapons in the quality and quantity that modern war demands, and who can earn the billions of dollars that are required to sustain the military effort.

Such men may not be endowed with all the physical qualifications that we require of the combat soldier. But their capabilities are strong weapons in our arsenal of democracy and reliable tools in our productive economy which we must exploit fully. We are using such physically handicapped men and women in many industries to replace those who have joined the services and to take up positions made necessary by the increased needs for production. In the armed services we have thousands of disabled persons, especially veterans, on civilian jobs and in certain categories of military assignments. Their work habits and their attendance records have proved at least equal in production and dependability to those of the nonhandicapped.

The physically handicapped can contribute to the economic and military strength of our country. It is not only good business to employ them. It is the human way that should be a part and parcel of our democracy.

No Time To Waste Manpower

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURR P. HARRISON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, I include an editorial entitled "No Time To Waste Manpower," which appeared in the Washington Evening Star.

It is gratifying to note that a newspaper in the Nation's Capital sees fit to call attention to the continued extravagance here—particularly in the use of Federal personnel.

I know the Members of this House are pleased to see, too, this recognition of the outstanding public service being performed by the Subcommittee on Overstaffing in the Federal agencies, headed by the conscientious and energetic gentleman from Mississippi, the Honorable JOHN BELL WILLIAMS. The editorial follows:

NO TIME TO WASTE MANPOWER

The high cost of calculating the high cost of living is revealed in the amazing report on the Bureau of Labor Statistics just issued by the House Subcommittee on Overstaffing in the Federal Agencies. The charges by the investigating group of wasted manpower in this and other nondefense agencies indicate that there is room for a lot of additional belt-tightening in the executive establishment.

As a result of an on-the-spot survey and of subsequent testimony by employees and responsible officials, the report said, it was found that the prices and living cost division of the Bureau is grossly overstaffed, that some employees have been forced to falsify work progress reports, that the efficiency rating system has been misused, and that employees who sought relief from the conditions have been threatened with punitive action. One employee charged: "When I entered on this job there were so many clerks that there was not enough work to keep more than a third of us busy at any one time. There was no one in supervision who knew anything about the work. When I made inquiry about what was supposed to be done, no one seemed to know. Supervisors sat and talked all day. I was told to write personal letters, and so forth, just to appear busy in case some of the officials came in the room. In the meantime, on the daily progress reports, I was told by my supervisor to elaborate on my progress reports." Another employee said: "There were weeks at a time when there was no work to do in our office. * * * I was forced to charge all these unused hours to a 'project' on which I was doing absolutely nothing."

The subcommittee declared the overstaffing was freely admitted, but attributed to a miscalculation as to personnel needs for a major revision of the Consumer Price Index. Congress appropriated a million dollars for this revision in the 1950 fiscal year. The report asserted that a substantial part of the appropriation was dissipated through gross overstaffing, inferior planning, untrained supervision and improvident administration. A companion report accused the Treasury Department of being overstaffed in some of its branches and a previous report criticized conditions in the Federal Security Agency.

Extravagant use of personnel was condemned by the Hoover Commission, which found wasteful practices existing in nearly all agencies of the Government. But that was nearly 2 years ago. That there is still flagrant waste in some of the offices, especially in a period of national emergency, is simply inexcusable. One thing is certain. If the agencies do not take action voluntarily to remedy conditions, the next Congress is going to crack down as never before, when nondefense appropriations are under consideration. For this is no time for such irresponsibility in Federal bureaus as is described in the findings to date of the civil service subcommittee headed by Representative JOHN BELL WILLIAMS, of Mississippi.

Fantastic Absurdity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, there has just come to my attention the editorial published in the Washington News, of Washington, D. C., under date of December 9, 1950, which I think is timely, and which I submit, as follows:

DIPLOMATIC ABSURDITY

The inability of President Truman and British Prime Minister Attlee to agree on a common policy toward Communist China overshadow the constructive accomplishments of their joint conference.

And it is idle to say that the two Governments do not intend to let differences on this point interfere with their united effort in support of their common objectives.

Public opinion will decide that question and American public opinion is in no mood to be trifled with.

Americans are most concerned at the moment with the fate of their troops fighting with their backs to the wall in Korea. Those troops are under attack by the forces of Red China. To assume that the American people will accept what appears to be Britain's attitude toward these Red aggressors is a fantastic absurdity.

According to the statement issued by Messrs. Truman and Attlee, "the United Kingdom has recognized the Central People's (Communist) government and considers that its representatives should occupy China's seat in the United Nations," and the United States is opposed to that. On its face this would seem to mean that despite the fact Red China is at war with the United Nations, Britain still feels that the Communists should be seated in the UN in place of the Chinese Nationalists, who are willing, even eager, to join forces with us against the Communist attack.

How can any right-thinking American be expected to agree to that?

President Truman, of course, has properly refused to agree to it.

Moreover, the joint statement declares that the American and British Governments are in complete agreement that there can be no thought of appeasement or rewarding aggression. That is sheer hypocrisy at a time when Britain insists on seating Red China in the United Nations.

The Chinese Reds have a gun pointed at the United Nations. To seat them in that organization under such circumstances would be nothing but appeasement, and an act of such cowardice that it would destroy the best hope of a threatened world.

No nation could respect the integrity of the United Nations after so abject a surrender of principle.

The joint statement also declares that the future of Formosa should be settled by the United Nations. If that means this question will be presented to the United Nations after Britain has been successful in seating Red China in the UN, it follows that the intent here is to deliver Formosa to the Communists as another contribution toward appeasement.

Formosa is under the Government of Nationalist China—a Government recognized by the United States. The 450,000 Nationalist troops stationed on that island represent the only substantial anti-Communist force in all Asia, outside of the American forces there. Should we take any chance of surrendering this force to communism in order that Britain may maintain its trading post at Hong Kong, through which it ships strategic goods to our enemies?

It is vital to the security of the United States itself that Formosa be in friendly hands. Under similar circumstances in Europe, would Britain be willing to give Gibraltar to the Reds, or buy their favor by granting them a base in Belgium? Formosa was used as the springboard for the Japanese attacks upon the Philippines and Pearl Harbor.

That part of the communique dealing with the atomic bomb—by our layman's interpretation—means that President Truman retain full control. The President stated he hoped it would never be necessary to use the bomb, and that it was also his desire to keep the Prime Minister at all times informed of developments which might bring about a change in the situation. On such eventuality, we trust the British will not misconstrue plain words and claim they have a right of veto.

American-British understanding and cooperation are as vital to one nation as the other. But that relationship cannot be maintained on a one-way street.

If Britain persists in its appeasement of communism in China, it will be difficult to convince many Americans that there is any point to supporting Britain in opposing communism in Europe. The unity of the whole anti-Communist front has been endangered by this absurdity.

The Holy City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OWEN BREWSTER
OF MAINE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 13 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Holy City," published in the Washington Post for December 8.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOLY CITY

Much water has gone over the dam since the General Assembly adopted a resolution calling for internationalization of the entire area of Jerusalem exactly a year ago. Many of those who supported the proposal did so on the basis of emotion rather than of fact. First, neither Israel nor Transjordan, the two powers sharing control, would stand for it; second, the resolution flouts the representative principle; and third, it plays right into the hands of Moscow. The Russians, who have the biggest foreign stake in Jerusalem through the holdings of the Russian Orthodox Church, would, of course, sit on the government of Jerusalem—doubtless in more ways than one.

The second thoughts are expressed in the Swedish resolution which was submitted yesterday to the present General Assembly. This simply restricts internationalization to the holy places, and includes all the safeguards necessary for the protection of the great religions affected, Christian, Jewish, and Moslem. The only exceptions from control, which would be exercised by a UN commissionership, would be strictly Moslem and Jewish shrines. Here is a solution resting upon reason. Israel most probably will accept it, and doubtless Transjordan will acquiesce in it. The trouble with Transjordan, as with other Arab states, is that in no political problem can there be any positive stand so long as the Arab League is acknowledged as a unifier on all matters relating to Palestine.

If this resolution is accepted, it would mark the first step in the pacification of the Middle East. Accordingly it deserves the strong backing of the United States. Peace in the Middle East is avowedly our aim, though a doubt sometimes arises, as in the case of the fuss made of the secretary general of the Arab League, Azzam Pasha, who came here recently. The Arab League simply stands for a holdout, for a perpetuation of a state of war, for a racial grouping, and for a negation of constructive solutions. This country needs to pursue in the Middle East a policy of pacification along a truly geographical line, so that reconstruction could begin in real earnest. Time is as important there as elsewhere.

Time for Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 13 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Time for Unity," published in the Washington Post of December 9, 1950, which discusses the proposed demand for the resignation of Secretary of State Dean Acheson.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TIME FOR UNITY

The Republican Policy Committee's refusal on Thursday to adopt as an official objective of the party Senator IRVING IVES' resolution demanding the resignation of Secretary of State Acheson has the virtue of giving time for some badly needed sober second thought. The resolution is to be submitted to the whole Republican Senate conference on Tuesday. It would be impossible to select a more inopportune moment for pressing this sort of partisan issue, and we are especially surprised to note Senator IVES' part in it. The imperative need in the present crisis is not for recriminations but for unity.

The strength of free men lies in their ability to draw together in emergencies. A splendid example of this ability has just been furnished to us by the British. Prime Minister Attlee's mission to this country won the instant and unqualified support of the opposition leader, Winston Churchill. There was no thought in Britain of using the tragic turn of events in Korea for narrow partisan advantage. There should be no thought of it here—either in respect of General MacArthur or in respect of Secretary Acheson. These men are on the firing line. There will be time enough later on to assess the responsibility for errors of policy which have brought us to the brink of disaster in the Far East. And when the assessment is made, there is not the slightest doubt that a heavy measure of guilt will be ascribed to many of those now crying for Mr. Acheson's scalp.

If the Republican Party as a whole should insist upon the ouster of Secretary Acheson, it would place itself under a plain obligation to define the foreign policy, especially in relation to China, which it thinks the country ought to pursue. Is it in favor of an all-out war to be waged on the Chinese mainland? Does it desire the abandonment of western Europe? What is its conception of bipartisanship? The Secretary's assailants, themselves divided, have hitherto found it much easier to carp than to offer constructive proposals. The replacement of Mr. Acheson by some fresh and less controversial personality may in due course prove desirable in the interest of national unity. But unity will certainly not be achieved by making him a scapegoat for misfortunes to which his critics were major contributors.

Use of Tax Money

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 13 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "It's Fun To Spend," which appeared in the Oil City Derrick, of Oil City, Pa., on Saturday, December 9, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IT'S FUN TO SPEND

Do you wonder what's happening to a lot of those tax dollars that should be going into building up America's military strength? Get this:

Recently the Government awarded a $286,000 contract for permanent visitors' facilities and exhibit building at Shasta Dam, Calif. The structure will contain an auditorium, observation decks and exhibit rooms. This is being done despite the fact that excellent accommodations now exist for those who wish to see the dam and power plant.

This is a minor example, but a typical one, of the reckless waste of Federal funds that is going on all over the country—in spite of deficits, in spite of the continuing demand for higher taxes, and in spite of the unpredictable expenditures for the military forces and for other purposes in connection with the grave international situation.

Governmental waste is always bad—in a time of national peril it is criminal.

A Note on Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 13 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, on December 4 there appeared in the Emporia Gazette an editorial by W. L. White, editor of that famous newspaper.

"Young Bill White" as he is known in Kansas, has had the courage and the daring to say what he believes, based upon his observations in many places in the world.

I ask unanimous consent that this thought-provoking editorial be placed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as I think it is worthy of being read and reread many times.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A NOTE ON WARS

(By W. L. White)

Last summer just as the first American troops were entering Korea, the Gazette in an unpopular editorial referred to that peninsula as a "military booby trap," arguing that the vast mainland of China and Manchuria to which Korea is attached had long ago been piddled away to communism by the short-sighted leadership of George Marshall and Dean Acheson. We therefore could not hope to defend Korea in the event of a major war.

Six months have gone by, and now where are we?

Well, the Communists have again broken our battle line and our troops are again on the run.

The total number of Americans killed, wounded and captured in Korea to date makes this the fourth bloodiest struggle in our Nation's history—surpassing in casualties the American Revolution, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, and the Spanish-American War.

And the goal of it all? Well, it seems there should be free elections in Korea. But why did we wake up to the value of free elections so late? Why, when we were powerful, did we not insist on free elections in Poland, in Hungary, in Rumania, in Yugoslavia, in Czechoslovakia, in East Germany, and in the Baltic states? Why did we sit stupidly by while Communist terror strangled freedom in all this vast, rich, civilized area and then, having stripped ourselves of arms, why do we suddenly begin to shriek for a free election in Korea, a backward country which, in all its 3,000 years of history, never has had free elections nor seemed particularly to miss them?

But you forget political considerations. Last Spring Republican Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY had aired his charges against Owen Lattimore, including a number of which Dr. Lattimore was probably innocent. The martyred St. Owen of Lattimore was declared politically pure and ideologically virginal by MILLARD TYDINGS and the other Senate Democrats, and promptly sat down to write of his Ordeal by Slander. But the country was uneasy. For obviously much had been smothered under whitewash or suppressed, including the smelly Amerasia case.

So the White House was perturbed because St. Owen's public beatification and noisy canonization might have a backwash in the fall elections, and put the control of Congress in doubt.

At this moment there came what seemed to be, from the political standpoint, the Heaven-sent opportunity of Korea. It promised to be a quick, popular little war against a weak enemy, and in behalf of the true, the beautiful, and the good. The unbearable vulgarities of JOE MCCARTHY would be drowned out by bugle and drum. Who then would dare say the Truman administration was not firmly anticommunistic? And so into Korea were sent not Dr. Lattimore, not Dean Acheson—but the little American draftees from Japan. The frailties of our statesmen were to be glossed over by the blood (in modest quantities) of our sons.

We are therefore now at war in Asia, and furthermore, our outnumbered soldiers are now hightailing it down the valleys of Korea in the most humiliating spectacle the American flag has ever flapped over since the battle of Bull Run. How did we get into it? Somewhere in the bookcase you surely must have a copy of that half-forgotten document, the Constitution of the United States. Pull it out and in the fine type you will find that the Congress and only the Congress "shall have power to declare war and make peace."

But don't be old-fashioned. That cumbersome contraption of representative government was set up by those old fuddy-duddies, our founding fathers. A congressional debate on whether or not to go into Korea would have meant weeks of delay; in the end Congress might have decided to stay out altogether. In these swift, modern times, after a rag-tag and bob-tail Supreme Court has made a joke of the Constitution, no one thinks of Congress, but looks instead for dynamic, flashy showmanship from the White House. And remember also that, in the crisis of last June, time was of the essence; it was important that without delay we instantly and immediately dive head foremost into the gaping mouth of that oriental meat grinder. Because that lovable old character, Marshal Stalin, was waiting patiently to turn the crank, any delay would definitely inconvenience him and Russians are, as our leaders have cautioned us, inclined to be irritable and suspicious, and to misunderstand our motives.

Readers of this column will remember that the Gazette was in favor of standing up to Stalin as early as 5 years ago when our truly magnificent armies were still intact, and when Harry S. Truman was a happy fellow-traveler who had not yet discovered the horrid Soviet menace. In view of this fact the writer presumes now to list five guideposts to a future American foreign policy. These are:

1. Since we are now pitiably weak, we should for the moment avoid hopping carelessly into wars which we cannot hope to win.

2. We should not concentrate all our forces in one distant isolated spot. Almost everything we have is now packed into Korea; if hell should break out in Europe, we have left only the Eighty-second Airborne Division to put between Stalin's 300 divisions and the Atlantic Ocean.

3. We should avoid wars to capture regions which are strategically worthless and which, if we won them, would be a future liability.

4. When we are losing a war in a distant area, we should not be offended when a nearby ally offers help. (Stalin is winning this Korean war without the loss of a single Russian life, whereas Dean Acheson virtuously turned down Chiang Kai-shek's offer to send 200,000 anti-Communist Chinese fighting men into Korea; Mr. Acheson felt this might offend those peace-loving agrarian reformers, the Chinese Communists.)

5. Until we are stronger (should Moscow allow us the time to get stronger) we should try to cut to a bare minimum the number of wars we enter solely to win local American elections.

The writer feels that we are now entering a period of terrible stress, in which, if this Nation and all Christendom are to survive, we will need the same steady wisdom, solid character and firm courage that our people had in Lincoln's day. As a flabby, rich, and stupid Nation we cannot hope to survive. We can no longer continue fat, dumb, and happy, babbling that this is the century of the common man, electing to high office any grinning dummy who will pledge himself to bribe us with paper dollar subsidies paid out of our own public Treasury, stupidly believing that if the Kremlin cannot be appeased, then it can be quickly licked in a bloodless, push-button war.

If we are to come through the next grim half of this twentieth century still a republic of free people we will need all of our courage and brains. We cannot hope to survive the storm with a government which is by the nincompoops, of the bird brains, and for the greedy dim wits. Because of its follies such a government will surely and deservedly perish from the earth, and all the sane and all the brave will be crunched in the wreckage of its crash.

Advice From Winston Churchill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HALE BOGGS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article by Joseph and Stewart Alsop from today's Washington Post:

ADVICE FROM WINSTON CHURCHILL

Certain aspects of politics are like certain diseases, which are so painful even to think about that healthy people rarely mention them. But if a man or woman has cancer, it must be mentioned by the doctor who makes the diagnosis and prescribes the operation. And if a nation is in imminent peril of catastrophe, painful things must also be said by leaders who have courage.

No leader in the Western World has greater courage than Winston Churchill. No one any longer will lightly disregard the voice of the great old man, who almost single-handed saved the cause of freedom from the menace of nazism; who was the first, after the war, to see the larger menace of the new Soviet imperialism. And it is time, now, to face up to the real future of the advice he has been giving for the past 2 years.

It was just about 2 years ago that Churchill began a remarkable series of speeches of which the last was delivered on November 30. In all these speeches, whether on the public platform or in debates in the House of Commons, he has said the same things.

First, he has ascribed to the Kremlin an ambition of world empire. On November 30, he told Parliament:

"(Despite) enormous increases of power and territory (the Soviets), show no sign of being in any way satiated, satisfied, or even contented, and we can perceive no limits at present to their aims."

Second, he has flatly stated that the Soviets were only being restrained from launching a third world war by the American advantage in atomic weapons. At Llandudno in 1948, he said: "Nothing stands between Europe today and complete subjugation to Communist tyranny but the atomic bomb in American possession."

Third, he has more and more openly confessed despair of matching the Soviet power by ordinary means, at least in the crucial time before our own advantage in atomic weapons will be too greatly impaired by production of atomic weapons in the Soviet Union. In the last speech, in which this despair is total, he said:

"While it is right to build up our forces as fast as we can, nothing in this process will in this period deprive Russia of effective superiority in what are now called 'conventional arms.' All it will do is give us increasing unity in Europe."

Fourth, he has repeatedly advocated negotiations with the Soviet Union on the highest level. In the most powerful and terrifying of all these speeches, when he told the House of Commons last July 7 that "We are more defenseless than we have ever been," he also said:

"A peaceful settlement may (yet) be reached with the Soviet Government if a resolute effort is made on the basis not of our present weakness but of American atomic strength. This is the policy which gives the best chance of preventing a fearful war and of securing our survival should it break upon us."

Here, however, so awful, so awe-inspiring is the subject, that even Winston Churchill has not spoken plainly. There is plenty of internal evidence of his real meaning, such as the critical reference, in the last speech, to the assurances to the Kremlin that "the United States would not fight what is called a preventive war." There is his further remark that on this basis the war, if it comes, and God forbid, will come at the moment of the (Soviet's) choosing. But his real meaning, which he has stated frankly enough in many private conversations, is only broadly implied in his speeches.

This meaning is that the Kremlin should be given a straight choice by the United States and Britain, between peace now and war now. The high and secret processes of diplomacy would be employed, under the Churchillian prescription, to offer Stalin a world settlement on honorable terms, and to warn that our atomic bombs would be used if the settlement were refused. This, indeed, is the only conceivable way to seek a settlement "on the basis of * * * American atomic strength."

It is dreadful that the wisest leader of the west should have been driven, only 5 years after a great victory, to advocate such an expedient. It is obvious that the most careful consideration should first be given to the kind of world settlement to be proposed, to the probable Soviet response and, above all, to our atomic strength's practical value. But it is also certain that if the odds on an early war at a "moment of the Soviets' choosing," are already two or three or four to one, as they undoubtedly appear at present, Winston Churchill's advice at least deserves to be honestly and carefully canvassed.

Arab States Bulwark Against Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a timely address was made today at the National Press Club by the Honorable Abdel Rahman Cizzam Pasha, Secretary General of the League of Arab States. The subject matter of his address presented facts that all American people shou'd know and understand. He stated an eternal verity when he said that we should not be deceived by the concept that arms alone can decide the issues in the present world crisis.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a verbatim copy of the address:

The world situation requires from us all, and particularly from the gallant people of the United States of America, that we focus attention on both the visible and invisible implications behind the present world crisis. Troubles are accumulating and the clearing of these troubles requires both energy and mental activity.

Gentlemen, it looks as if the world has definitely been divided into two camps. One is carrying the banner for the proletarian class and the other for a nonclass concept; but actually there are two active forces upholding these ideologies, while a vast section of mankind in Africa and Asia stands undecided and perplexed, as this vehement contest about what is right and wrong is going on. If we allow ourselves to be deceived and resigned to a fate that only arms can decide the issue, we will not survive. I believe that never in the history of mankind has violence ever been able to extinguished the torch of right or to conquer definitely an ideal which is justified by its moral force and its necessity to prevail.

We should, therefore, discard every attempt to resort to force as a decisive factor in ideological differences. In my opinion, permanent peace cannot be achieved by the sole maintainance of armed forces or the accumulation of material powers. Such a belief is a fallacy. What is really required is to maintain peace by an equilibrium of diverse forces, including forces of strong conviction and faith, so as to make the existence of peace not only dependent on military victories but on moral and spiritual victories, which make them enduring and permanent.

If we can bring about that equilibrium, then every side will endeavor to convince the other side by logic, appeal, and persuasion. Then the only chance that remains for a victory of one ideology over another will emanate from its real value and its real contributions to human progress and human peace.

In the meantime, what can we do to make war useless to the aggressor? I think we should put our faith not only in our production of war material but in human virtue, wisdom, and judgment. To attain this objective we must build up centers concentrating and radiating ideas all over the world. These centers may vary in their approach and outlook as to their beliefs and ideas, but will always meet with the universal concept that all people are equal and that class conflict is a disruption of the family. In these centers will be grouped people who have between them certain affinities and some common inheritance and common belief. They will be able as autonomous concepts within the universal concept to struggle harder and more efficiently to resist subversive ideas. These centers should be encouraged everywhere in the Old World and the New World, in Asia and Africa as well as in Europe and America.

I think that there are in existence radiating centers of culture and of spiritual concept outside the actual Communist sphere in places like Egypt, Pakistan, India, and Indonesia. These centers can be fortified by the support of a clear, outspoken defense of human liberty and welfare by the people of the United States, a people known for their love of freedom and benevolence.

In Europe and America there are similar centers of thought propagating moral and spiritual ideas. They may be along different lines, but they will meet with those of Africa and Asia on the common ground of equality of races, equality of classes, and equality of opportunities. Then, and only then, the aggressor, if any, will have to seek some cross-breeding of ideas which will introduce a totally new attitude which will culminate in the suppression of what is essentially wrong.

So much for the moral side of the picture. To deal with the realities of the moment we are facing an immediate huge catastrophe. What is wanted is time to get a breathing space to turn that violent prevailing attitude of mind toward a conciliatory one. Thus, we should have a truce. We should not think only of war or appeasement, because appeasement amounts to moral abdication and to treating the sypmtoms of a disease without in fact touching the disease itself. Such a course will set up precedents which can have only disastrous consequences in the settlement of other problems in Europe, Africa, and Asia.

The immediate procedural step for a long-term policy is to have a temporary truce on the Korean war front and on the mental front everywhere. We must find ways and means to enable the leaders of the two opposing camps, the United States of America and the Soviet Union, to meet under the auspices of the United Nations and the pressure of world opinion and to work out an honorable and just settlement or at least a modus vivendi as an alternative to war. They may then be able to illegalize war as a means of settling differences of ideology and national interests, thus discovering a common ground for further concerted actions. Disarmament, partial or complete, might provide an assurance that that common ground will be maintained. They might further agree that the United Nations can be reconstructed as an arbitrator, representing world opinion, whose decisions will then be accepted and implemented.

Before ending this talk it may be useful to call your kind attention to conditions which are making for instability and encouraging violence in an important area of the world known as the Middle East.

The people of this area have inherited and inspired great civilizations and great spiritual ideas. They are receiving wave after wave of propaganda from east and west. They are told by the west that they are backward, underdeveloped, and in need of European tutelage and protection. They are told by the east that they are exploited, enslaved, and despised, and should revolt against western domination. In fact, they are receiving no genuine friendship or sympathy or understanding from either side.

In spite of these strong currents they still stand adamantly for their faith and heritage. It is true they are more inclined toward western thoughts, but they refuse to be the vassals of the west. Although opposed to the material creed of the east, they feel impressed by its support to their human dignity and national inspirations.

I have complete faith in the wisdom of our people, but I fear that they may, under that dual pressure, become indifferent and disinterested. The consequences of such a state of mind in the Middle East as an eternal center of spiritual ideas, will have tremendous repercussions in Asia and Africa. While the east is well led by forces which have combined ideological with material energies and is penetrating deeply in Asia and Africa, the West, with no real moral leadership and by attempting to harness old concepts of imperialism to new concepts of nationalism, is but confusing the peoples of the Middle East and trying dangerously to harmonize the nineteenth century tutelage with sovereign rights and the principles of self-determination of the twentieth. While maintaining a masterly attitude of superiority over these middle eastern peoples, curiously enough the west is paradoxically attempting to secure the voluntary cooperation of those long-subjected peoples.

This confused approach cannot appeal to the hearts and minds of the Arab and Moslem peoples. The only resistance to communism that is being shown at present by the masses of the people in the Middle East stems from their religious faith. It is high time for England, France, and particularly America to reconsider their attitude toward the Middle East and to try some note which will have resonance in the hearts and minds of 70,000,000 Arabs and 300,000,000 Moslems, extending from China to Morocco. If they do not, the west will lose their support in that ideological contest; and the east, through a persuasive, strong, and well directed mental penetration may get, ultimately, the upper hand.

Our people are now standing between the devil and the deep sea, and they may find their salvation either in complete passiveness of noncooperation or in an impulsive indignation, dominated by distrust and dissatisfaction.

All imperialistic powers have no chance at present for a moral lead of Asiatic and African people. The only country in the western camp which can still have a chance of an appeal to the hearts and minds of oriental masses is this country, the United States of America. Its past history and relations with the oriental world is an example of fair-mindedness and human good relations. They have known the United States through the last 150 years, as good businessmen, teachers, doctors and missionaries.

They recognize America as a Nation which stands for freedom and fair play; and in spite of recent blunders the Middle East has not lost faith in American good will.

However, in order to pull the Middle East out of that confused state of mind and from that attitude of indignation and distrust, the United States of America should present herself to the oriental world in her true light, and with a moral leadership that will never sacrifice principles for expediencies. This alone will afford a possibility of constructing a formidable radiating center of thoughts and principles around which hundreds of millions of Moslem peoples would rally in harmony with western idealism.

Not only can the Middle East contribute, as it did in the past, to spiritual and ideological forces to balance power in the moral field, but it can also contribute in the material balance with its huge potentialities of manpower, space and production. It can also be organized as a rallying center for material power to counteract material aggression. These material forces of the Middle East are being neglected and allowed to disintegrate by the intervention of outdated European imperialist powers, pretending to be able to fill with isolated military bases, the vacuum of defense in the Middle East, thus misleading themselves and others. The actual truth is that their military occupations and military bases in the Arab world, while far from filling a vacuum, are in themselves creating a vacuum which can only be filled by the material resources of its people and their faith in themselves and their power.

Our people for a number of years have been extending to America their hands for mutual friendship and vast moral and material cooperation. It is for this country to take it or leave it. Upon her decision depends to a great extent the stability, security, and prosperity of the Middle East and the Moslem world.

The Price of Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. FRANK WILSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following address of Harry C. Withers, executive editor of the Dallas Morning News, before the Dallas Rotary Club:

THE PRICE OF PEACE

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—In the belief that all facts concerning the international crisis should be laid before the American public, and at the request of several hundred listeners who heard Harry C. Withers, executive editor of the News, address the Dallas Rotary Club Wednesday noon, the News herewith reproduces the text of Mr. Withers' remarks.)

It was suggested that I discuss today the responsibility of the United States as the acknowledged leader of the free nations of the world.

Such discussions inevitably involve events which run so swiftly and become so confusing that no man I know can analyze them satisfactorily. Only an arrant fool would pretend to have the answers.

Eight years ago I said from this forum that when World War II was over we would live in a different world. Some of my friends asked me then what I meant. Well, we are living in that different world now. I ask them what they think it means.

THE FOUR HORSEMEN

The most frightening fact of the times is this: The infamous four horsemen of the apocalypse—war, famine, pestilence, death—have been joined by a fifth horseman—communism. Its declared objective is to destroy the United States.

Our diplomats at Lake Success or our generals in Korea may win a temporary respite, but nothing except a united America, armed to the teeth, can defeat that objective.

Are the men who now hold our national destiny in their hands capable of uniting America? Will they let France or Britain, or even the United Nations, say whether 100,000 American boys shall be slaughtered by the heathen hordes of Red China?

I believe Truman would prefer to tell the diplomats to step aside so our soldiers can fight this war. But he has listened to the wrong people so long that he now finds it extremely dangerous to do what he would like to do.

It is the custom of Americans in such critical times to rally behind our chosen leaders. I think it is not disloyal even in these days to ask if our leaders can be trusted to preserve America's security without destroying its freedom.

SOME STRANGE THINGS

And if they can be trusted, are they competent? They have done some strange things to us since they came into power; things that strained our faith in their integrity; things that we ought not to hide now when our hearts beat with the strongest impulses of Americanism.

Although every normal American schoolboy knew 6 months ago that the Chinese Communists were our enemies in Korea, we have been shipping critical war materials to them, some of them as late as last week.

While communism is enslaving helpless nations in the Eastern Hemisphere, our leaders resist efforts to find out what Communists are doing to us in Washington.

It has been charged by some critics that even while our troops have been fighting in Korea there has been a feud between our State Department and our supreme military commander.

I do not believe Dean Acheson is a Communist. I think that prior to the invasion of Korea he was unduly influenced by the friends of Communist China. His course since that invasion has been opposed to communism.

ESSENTIALLY A THEORIST

Essentially Acheson is a theorist who at long last has come to the stage of action and is baffled. He lacks the forthrightness the present situation demands. The world waited with bated breath for his speech last week. He told us nothing we didn't know. We needed from him then words of iron and steel, words that would bring comfort to our men on the bloody battlefield, words that would unite the people of America in a firm purpose to face our dangers and overcome them.

It has been clear to most other observers that Russia's strategy is to involve the United States in war with other nations until we are so weak that she can step in safely and deliver the mortal blow.

Because of our blunders in China, Russian strategy is succeeding and we are losing the fight.

We whipped the North Koreans only to be faced by hordes of Chinese Communists who, we were once told, were simply agrarian reformers.

Korea has cost us $10,000,000,000 and 30,000 casualties and the end is not yet. Russia has not lost a man or fired a shot. She is conserving her manpower and building her war machine.

CAN HAPPEN ELSEWHERE

What has happened in Korea may happen in Iran, in Turkey, in India, in Western Germany or in any spot upon the globe where Russia can persuade one of her satellites to provoke America to resist aggression against free nations.

If we are committed by our policy to give what aid we can to the victims of aggression we may have to fight a series of isolated wars that will whittle us down to Russia's size economically.

When we are at war we are prepared to say with Stephen Decatur: "My country, may she always be right; but right or wrong, my country."

To say that is not to forego our freedom to criticize the things she is doing wrong. It is that freedom you are permitting me to exercise today.

America's defense of freedom throughout the world has made me proud to be an American. If we had not protected Greece and poured billions of our treasure into western Europe, communism now would rule the Eastern Hemisphere.

MORE MONEY DUE

In the last 3 years we have spent $30,000,000,000 to help put other nations on their feet, plus ten billion to save Korea. And we are about to appropriate billions more for our own protection and theirs.

Let us not pat ourselves on the back for that. How could we survive if the rest of the free world should fall before communism's aggressions? We would have to live at the point of a Russian gun the rest of our lives.

I am proud of the speed and resolution with which our Government acted in the Korean show-down. It came upon us like another Pearl Harbor. Our defenses were down, our strength was dissipated, our warnings were shrugged off as a red herring.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

We had turned a deaf ear to MacArthur to listen to Owen Lattimore. MacArthur had repeatedly warned us that more troops were needed to maintain our position in the Far East.

On July 17, 1949, Lattimore said: "The thing to do is to let Korea fall but not let it look as though we pushed her."

In January, 1950, the House defeated the Korean aid act after the State Department insisted that military aid not be provided as such in the bill.

FOSTER QUOTED

On June 13, 1950, William C. Foster told the Senate: "The trend of events in South Korea is more favorable than it has been any time since liberation of the country in 1945."

That is the kind of advice we were getting 2 weeks before the Reds caught us flatfooted. It was Pearl Harbor over again and we are looking for a scapegoat.

Truman's quick response to the situation warmed our hearts, ended the cold war, cleared the atmosphere and inspired our patriotism.

Our cause is armed with justice and dedicated to freedom, not for ourselves alone, but for peoples everywhere who look to us for salvation. We are acting by authority of the United Nations. Fifty-two of the fifty-nine members stood with us against the Russian aggression. We should give Acheson credit for that.

At the risk of being tiresome, let me review briefly the events that have involved us in this situation.

Russia agreed at Potsdam in July 1945, to declare war on Japan and agreed that Korea in due course would become a free and independent nation.

TERMS REVEALED

It also was agreed there that Russia would accept surrender of Japanese forces north of the thirty-eighth parallel and the United States would accept the surrender south of that line.

On September 8, 1945, General Hodges accepted the surrender south of the thirty-eighth. By that time Russia had occupied all of North Korea and immediately banned all travel between the two zones.

At Moscow in December 1945 the United States, Great Britain, and Russia agreed that a free government should be set up in Korea.

Then Russia set about to sabotage the agreement. Every proposal for a free election throughout all Korea, Russia held an election in North Korea, permitting only Communists to vote. It barred the United Nations Commission from entering North Korea.

In September 1948, South Korea, containing two-thirds of the population of all Korea, held a free election, organized the Korean National Assembly, elected Syngman Rhee as president and took over the reins from the United States military government.

In September 1948, North Korea set up the Democratic People's Republic of Korea which was promptly recognized by Russia. Russia then began to train Korean military forces made up largely of Chinese Communists.

RULED LAWFUL

In December 1948, the General Assembly of the United Nations declared the government of South Korea the only lawful government in Korea. The vote was 48 to 6.

Russia reported the withdrawal of all its troops by the end of 1948. It left an army of satellite troops. The United States withdrew its troops in June 1949.

There were frequent exchanges of fire and armed raids across the thirty-eighth parallel until June 25, 1950, when the North Koreans launched an attack all along the line of the parallel, starting the aggression which plunged the United States into another war.

Against tremendous odds we drove the North Korean Reds back into Manchuria. A month ago it seemed that we had won freedom for Korea. We knew Russia had incited the invasion of South Korea and armed it, but we nursed the vain hope that our victory would deter them for a while from further aggression.

Then they unloosed the fifth horseman and supplied him with a vastly superior force to snare the United Nations in a death trap.

More than 90 percent of those are American boys. What is the obligation of our leaders toward those boys? Is their loyalty in this crisis owed first to the United Nations or to the United States? Our natural impulse is to say: Use every weapon we have to save them from death or capture.

MUST BOMB BASES

That means, of course, authorizing MacArthur to bomb the enemy's supply bases in Manchuria and to use the atom bomb if he thinks it advisable. Maybe it would be silly to use the bomb in Korea, but it could hardly be sillier than to tell MacArthur to stop the Reds but not to bomb their rear.

Attlee, the head of a Socialist government, seconded by Pleven, the head of a Socialist government, has come here to persuade Truman, who has led us along the road to socialism, not to do anything to the Chinese Reds which might incite the Russian Reds to start a war.

They have already started it. If we come to Russia's terms on Korea, they may stop it, but that would be surrender on our part and merely would postpone the day of final reckoning. I see no chance for world peace until Communist Russia either wins world domination or is so soundly defeated that her people will renounce communism and liquidate its apostles.

What do the American people want to do about it? An overwhelming majority of them want to protect those boys with every resource at our command.

TOTAL WAR COMING

It may mean total war—but that's coming, anyway. It may mean terrible retaliation. It may mean universal military training. It will mean greatly increased taxes. It will mean Federal control over most of our human and material resources. We are willing. We are ready. We are not afraid.

That is, most of us are willing and ready. Unfortunately there are some groups enjoying liberty in this country who still favor appeasement of Russia. A few of them hope for Russian victory.

Since Chinese Communists entered the battle these groups have held more than a hundred rallies in Washington, in New York, in Hollywood, demanding that the United Nations get out of Korea, demanding that the United States reverse its foreign policy, demanding, in effect, that we let communism have its way.

These groups are a threat to our civilization. They are a menace to the general welfare. They are serving Russia and betraying this country.

There is no place for them in this land. This is no time for traitors or their fellow travelers. We know who they are. We know their apologists in our own Government.

MUST SHUT DOOR

We need to shut the door against them. We need to ferret out their aiders and abettors. We need to open every record in the State Department to expose the Communists on our Federal payroll. If Senator McCarthy has done nothing else he has made it clear that someone in Washington is afraid of what the records might show.

The Senate investigation to detect alleged Communists in Government service was rigged to protect them rather than to expose them. The people repudiated that whitewash by defeating Senator Typings. Now it is up to the people more forcibly than ever. They should tell the Congress to outlaw communism, to throw fellow travelers out of Government jobs, to punish as seditionists those who advocate violent overthrow of our Government.

They should assure the patriotic men who occupy the pulpits of the country that parishioners will no longer support the pulpiteers who counsel compliance with Russia in the name of either pacifism or religion.

Parents should no longer send their boys and girls to colleges and universities where in the name of academic freedom, intellectual crackpots seek to destroy faith in our constitutional Government and in the integrity and virtue of our democratic philosophy.

FREEDOM MAY CRUMBLE

Unless we as individual Americans do these things, our fundamental citadels of freedom will crumble and fall or become the plant forums for the apostles of Russian dictatorship.

Then we, too, like the people of the captive nations behind the iron curtain, shall become the helpless slaves of the Kremlin, subject to the orders of the American commissars, deprived of our property, of our suffrage, of our free speech, of our chance even to know the truth.

This is a living danger to America which can be dispelled only if we act with courage and intelligence and make known to our leaders that it is the purpose of America to fight for individual freedom, not only here but throughout the world.

You have neglected your rights as a citizen. Employ them or you will lose your freedoms eventually. If you lose your domestic freedoms you won't be happy in your job and you can't enjoy your material profits.

If we lose the struggle with Russia you won't be running your present business, but you will be doing the things the Politburo of the American Soviet tells you to do.

NOT TOO PLEASANT

The kind of speech I have made here does not please me any more than it does you. I have heard speakers say that criticism of our Government and even of Russia should stop; that we have a beautiful world and should be talking about our blessings instead of our dangers.

I cannot agree with them. I do not think it is war mongering or unfair politics to lay the facts on the table and interpret them fairly and honestly. Unless the people are informed they cannot act intelligently and unless they are interested they will not act at all until it is too late.

Your American citizenship is the finest charter of human freedom known to man. Unless you cherish and exercise it you deserve to lose your freedoms.

Every one of us, whether employer or employee, is a soldier in the line, defending our form of government and our homeland. There is no territory behind the lines.

This is a great land in which we live. Let each of us do his part to keep it free.

Editorial From the Junction City (Oreg.) Times

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRIS ELLSWORTH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial from the Junction City (Oreg.) Times of December 7, 1950:

A farmer settled in raw country. Over a period of years he built up a good farm, built good barns, equipped it well, and ridded out all the weeds and brush, even to the wild mustard in the fields. He acquired position and prospered, and also a few holdings in another part of the county.

But as the years went by, he began to spend more and more of his time telling the other farmers how they should run their places, what organizations they should belong to—in fact, it got to the point that he began criticizing his neighbors' fences, livestock, machinery, and even the way the children acted. He even began trying to settle all the neighborhood quarrels—his way, of course.

The sad part of the story is that by his eagerness to be all things to all men he let his own place go down, the neighbor's scrub stock got to running with his good herds and due to hard-luck stories, he gave away much of his good seed corn. After a long series of borrowing funds against future crops he found himself heavily in debt, his family dissatisfied and even the hired help finding fault, careless in their work and indifferent to his plans.

Meantime a Johnny-come-lately had come into the picture and was not only running a pretty big place himself, but leasing or otherwise taking over the operation of many other smaller outfits in the county and nearby. There was much distrust of this newcomer—both his methods and the way he treated his help and his attitude toward his neighbors was open to suspicion. It became increasing apparent that he was out to grab everything worth grabbing by fair means or foul. And the question all of the neighbors were asking was "What's the old pioneer going to do—take care of his own place and bring it back to its former good condition, or just go on as he is and still try to out-fox this newcomer, and maybe lose everything seeing as how his own folks don't altogether trust his good intentions anymore."

The problems of nations are just the problems of people, multiplied in size but basic in principle.

Farsighted Leadership Needed To Restore Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Memphis Press-Scimitar of December 5, 1950:

WE ARE ALREADY AT WAR, AND OUR JOB IS NOT TO PRESERVE PEACE BUT TO RESTORE PEACE; IT TAKES FARSIGHTED LEADERSHIP, A SOUND PLAN, AND PLAIN, ORDINARY GUTS

The world situation would not seem so confusing if people would quit speculating about the grave risk of war and accept the fact that war began on June 27, when the United Nations moved against Red aggression in Korea.

The problem now is how to win that war and restore peace.

That demands a plan and the will to see it through.

First, there should be no more talk of peace overtures to Moscow until the free world can talk to Russia on terms of military equality.

Immediate mobilization of all of America's resources of war is therefore necessary.

All of our foreign-assistance programs should be consolidated into a rearmament program, from which those nations unwilling to accept that formula and make reasonable contributions to it would be eliminated. This will separate the dependable from the undependable among our allies.

Spain and Western Germany should be invited to join in the defense of Western Europe on a basis of absolute equality without further quibbling. The urgency of the situation will not permit any more pussyfooting on these issues.

The manpower of these two countries is an absolute must.

In Asia, our wartime relationship with the Chinese Nationalist Government should be restored, so that the 500,000 troops in Formosa will be available for any emergency. Japan should be rearmed and included in anti-Communist alliance with Nationalist China, Australia, New Zealand, Thailand, the Philippines—and India and Pakistan, provided they want to go along.

We should pull our forces out of Korea unless they can be reinforced and prepare to meet Russia on grounds more advantageous to us if Moscow insists on a military show-down.

Russia may not want that.

She may have been getting away with a colossal bluff.

But we can't afford to call that bluff until we are prepared for the worst, if that is what it has to be.

To be so prepared, everything must be subordinated to a supreme mobilization effort.

The requests Britain is making for a share in our stockpiles of strategic goods should be entertained only where they will not interfere with our own rearmament program, and then only to the extent that they will contribute directly to a common defense program. Business as usual cannot be maintained in the face of the present threat to civilization.

The free world has enough manpower to withstand this threat, if it is mobilized, trained, and armed. It has most of the world's steel and oil and capacity for industrial production.

All that it lacks is determined, far-sighted leadership, a sound program, and plain, ordinary guts.

We must look to the Truman-Attlee conferences to produce these things if peace is to be restored. The President can count upon the wholehearted support of the American people in insisting on such a plan.

Speak Out, Mr. President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. GLENN BEALL
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial which appeared in the Baltimore Sun, Baltimore, Md., December 13, 1950:

SPEAK OUT, MR. PRESIDENT

The country hopes that the meeting at the White House this morning will dissolve the cloud of indecision under which we are living.

The meeting has been called by the President, and it is a bipartisan meeting. Its purpose is to help the President make up his mind on the declaration of a national emergency. It is the culmination of a series of meetings which the President has been holding this week with his advisers.

Why a proclamation?

There is no point in rearguing the question whether we should or should not have gone into Korea. We are there. Maybe we shall stay. Maybe we won't. But whatever the decision reached on that point by arms or by policy, the day of calling our current enterprise a police action is long since over. Practically the whole of our fighting force is engaged in this single and far from successful operation. Yet the aggression which took us into Korea is only one element in the appallingly perilous situation that confronts the free world.

The free world is all but unprepared to meet this peril. For 6 months, this country has talked rearmament and done very little to rearm. It is 20 months since the signing of the North Atlantic Treaty. Yet the North Atlantic community has still to begin to erect those defenses which it was the purpose of the North Atlantic Pact to bring into being.

In the nations of Western Europe, as in this country, it has been talk, talk, talk, so far as the actual preparations for defense are concerned.

But while the talk has been going on, and as though time to prepare were limitless, dangerous things have been happening to our domestic economy. For the talk has stimulated a boom—not the kind of boom which comes with a big defense effort, but a purely civilian, comfort-loving boom. New houses, television sets, household refrigerators. New cars. Luxuries in incredible variety. It has been a nervous and apprehensive boom, caused by people who, when anxious, obey their reflexes and think first of themselves.

This boom has clogged our factories. It has driven up wages. It has driven up prices. To sum it up, at the very time when heads should be steady and the economic machine should be kept as stable as possible, we find ourselves in a sharply rising inflationary spiral.

This inflation would be bad enough if the prospect were peaceful. With the grim prospect which actually confronts us, it is tragic.

To sum up, the 6 months since the fighting started in Korea—when Mr. Bernard Baruch called for a swift application of wartime controls—have been 6 months of frenzied productive activity in this country, devoted largely to the production of things other than those we need most.

No one can look seriously at the situation of this country today without admitting that things have gone badly wrong—and that strong medicine will be needed to put us on the right track.

Nor can there be much doubt as to the nature of the medicine. There must be powerful direction from the center. Voluntary action will not do. If we are to rearm—and all-out rearmament now offers the only hope of peace—we need price controls. We need wage controls. There must be the power to allocate materials, the power to allocate manpower. First things must be put first.

The President already has almost all the power to act that he needs. He has an arsenal of powers left over from World War

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

II. He has other powers specifically delegated to him by Congress this fall.

But he does not have quite all the powers that he needs—or at any rate is not sure of them. To be sure of them, he must first proclaim what is no more than the truth, namely, that there exists a state of national emergency.

But over and above this technical reason for making the proclamation there is another and still more important reason. He owes it to the people. He owes it to them as proof that his own mind is made up. He owes it to them to declare unmistakably that the period of the cold war is over, and that the one hope of averting a third world war is to settle down now to the task of building the defenses of the free world and building them well.

Letter From Frederick Brack, of Norwalk, Conn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a letter dated December 9, 1950, which raises some very interesting questions and which I feel will interest my colleagues. The letter follows:

NORWALK, CONN., December 9, 1950.
Hon. ANTONI N. SADLAK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SADLAK: First of all permit me please to congratulate you upon your reelection to office, for I believe that you are on the job truly doing your best in the interest of the people you were elected to serve.

Please also accept my thanks for the books I received from you on the Utilization of Farm Crops about hearings before subcommittees some of which I read with interest and much concern.

Frankly speaking I am amazed at the great volume of all these hearings, time and money spent in putting it all into book form print and so forth, and then we fail to get any apparent result or benefit.

Of what good are all these hearings if the remedy is not applied at the source to bring about the desired and just improvement in the interest of all the people?

According to all reports food in general has never been more plentiful and yet the cost is the highest and still rising.

Just today, Saturday, December 9, when we did our weekly shopping in one of the large First National stores, where prices are supposed to be as low as anywhere, top of round meat was $1.09 per pound. Porterhouse steak was 97 cents per pound. Lamb chops were $1.09 per pound. Slice of ham was $1.20 per pound. Eggs were 83 cents a dozen. Coffee was 79 cents per pound. Butter was 73 cents per pound. Nearly all the fish is expensive, and so it is with most everything else.

We have been reading and hearing a lot about Government action to correct all this for a long time now, but we fail to see and experience any improvement.

In my humble judgment there is too much pussyfooting in placing the responsibility where it belongs and applying the remedy. It would be a blessing to our representatives in office and to our people as a whole if a law were passed to do away with lobbying in Washington, D. C., as soon as possible and let our Representatives do their own thinking, in the interest of all our American people, instead of selfish interests, some of which we read about occasionally.

It is like in the United Nations meetings. One nation has applied the veto 47 times, calls us war mongers and will not agree to anything in the interest of world peace. The Second World War ended over 5 years ago and we all now know that because of the Russian attitude it has and still is costing the American people billions of dollars in taxes to pay for it all the world over with no end in sight.

Can't the diplomats and particularly our own representatives in Washington see the hand writing on the wall?

I pray to God that some of our representatives will have the vision and courage to immediately do something about putting our house of state in order first and then give the Russians just 1 week to decide whether or not they will cooperate in the best interest of all the nations. If they will not, then I say, Stalin and his gang deserve what Hitler and Mussolini got and the sooner the better, to get this world mess cleaned up.

Unless this action is taken, I fear Lenin and Stalin's hopes that the United States will spend itself into destruction, will truly come to pass, for we are very much on the way to it right now.

Who is responsible for the present war and allowing ship loads of war material to Red China, resulting thus far in the killing of over 6,000 of our boys in Korea and the placing of over 20,000 in hospitals?

Whoever is responsible, deserves to be placed in the front firing line in Korea, for they surely are not sincere Americans who believe in the Golden Rule.

All my business and professional friends feel just as I do and wonder why the procrastination at the helm.

I wish it were possible for everyone from President Truman all the way down the line to read this letter, for I believe it to be the feeling of the great majority of our people.

Very truly yours,

FREDERICK BRACK.

The State of the Union

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an excellent letter from a constituent of mine on the state of the Union:

WALDEN, N. Y., December 8, 1950.
Hon. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE,
Goshen, N. Y.

DEAR MRS. ST. GEORGE: Because it is an old American custom for the President of the United States to present at each opening session of Congress a message on the state of the Union, I feel that we, the people who are the blood and bone and sinew of America, we, the people who live in little houses along the little streets should address our Congress assembled on the state of the Union.

Our streets in our little towns don't end any more at the city limits; they keep right on going into Europe and Asia and even the Far East. That's a long way. Some of us in our town find it a little hard to believe this is really true. America itself is so much wider than our lives—the whole world, we can't imagine. And so we may seem reluctant to accept all the responsibilities that come with broadening horizons. But you Members of the Congress on the Hill in Washington, you can see how far our streets really extend, how close our future is linked to the world. This is your great responsibility. Here of all places there is no room for petty politics.

Never in our history have we had such magnificent opportunity for great leadership; never have we had such a need for men who can and will rise to statesmanship. If the people along my street in our town are reluctant to accept this great responsibility it is because we are confused by all the plans and counterplans—the claims and counterclaims. We are not little unimportant people—no people on earth are any more. But some of the problems have become so big, so involved that we can't understand them.

We do not understand why with all the food and all the money and all the help we have given scores of countries overseas we have failed so miserably to win their friendship. We can't understand why the United Nations is so disunited in action. We do not understand why there is so much scornful talk of communism in America and yet no laws against it. Why we should spend lives and billions to stop communism and yet go out of our way to appease its leaders around the conference table.

We can never inspire the confidence of other nations. We can never expect them to believe in us until we know what we believe ourselves. We can never hope to lead the world toward peace until we cease running in all directions.

Is it any wonder that the people in our town are confused? What is America's foreign policy, where has it gotten us? We are tired of hearing your endless reasons why the world is torn apart. If the Congress knows the reasons, then let's have an end of them. We're tired of politics, indecision, vacillation. We want positive productive peace.

We have tried compromise and politics and diplomacy for a long while, now is the time for decision; for statesmanship and leadership. The people in our town, along our streets, tired as we are, still believe with all our hearts in America, in democracy and in you, our representatives in Congress.

The state of the Union, we are told, is linked with the state of the world. If this is true, it is rather obvious, it is not good. The hour has come for Congress to accept its full responsibility.

The State Department needs an immediate cleansing. From the Secretary of State to the bottom of the ladder a clean sweep should be actuated; thus, we the people of our little town respectively present our message on the state of the Union.

With best personal regards, I remain

Respectfully yours,

ROBERT B. HOUGHTALING.

No Heart for the Taxpayer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THRUSTON B. MORTON
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial by C. A. Hummel, editor of the Jeffersonian, a weekly newspaper of Jeffersontown, Ky.:

NO HEART FOR THE TAXPAYER

Another one of those "biggest" has been chalked up for Texas. This time it's the biggest profit—a profit of nearly $60,000, on surplus war material purchased from the Government for just $6.89. An east Texas farmer was the lucky speculator who put it over on Uncle Sam's agents for disposing of surplus property.

Looking over the surplus property list for bargains, the farmer noticed that bids were being asked on 163 aircraft computers. Supposing aircraft computers would be small cardboard computers that might be useful in calculating land areas, he bid a little less than 5 cents apiece, for the lot. His bid of $6.89 accepted, he telephoned the San Antonio depot to send his purchase by parcel post.

But, to his amazement, he found that he had become owner of 163 unused electric fire-control instruments, technically known as parallax computers, which had cost the Government about $7,200 each. Protesting that he did not want the property, he was told that he would have to go through with the bargain. And he did, though it cost him $4,000 to have his stock of computers crated, stored, and then shipped to his farm.

In business now, with a heavy inventory of what could become rather dead merchandise, this trading farmer turned to Uncle Sam again as a prospective customer. And why not, since Uncle is about the biggest user of those contraptions? His letter to the Air Force in Washington brought, within a few days, officers from Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio, to take a look at the merchandise. Why yes, they were interested and a trade was made, with Uncle Sam's representatives agreeing to buy the computers for $63,000. And this time a bargain it was for "Uncle Shylock." The pesky things had cost the Government $500,000 when bought the first time.

Talk about a big corporation having no heart. Where is the heart—not to mention the mind—of big Government?

Souvenirs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DWIGHT L. ROGERS
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I ask permission to include therein an editorial entitled "Souvenirs," which appeared in the Palm Beach Post-Times on December 7, 1950, and which editorial was written by Hon. Charles Francis Coe, the editor and publisher of said paper.

It will be recalled that Mr. Coe received national recognition and an award from Freedoms Foundation, Inc., for the most constructive and outstanding editorial of the year 1949.

The following editorial enjoins upon us the duty of taking an inventory of our national assets and to reexamine the fundamental principles of Americanism:

SOUVENIRS

There comes a time in the lives of men and nations when the attic must be ransacked, old trunks cleaned out, trash of the years discarded to make room for new accumulations. In his front page cartoon of today Mr. Enright portrays Uncle Sam in the process.

Deep in the dust of our history he digs up an old banner. Coiled on the face of the flag is a rattlesnake and the inscription is "Don't tread on me." That was a message served oppressors by our early Americans. That was a fair warning, fairly given, and nobly supported. That passed into our sacred archives, a souvenir of its times, a milepost of human dignity, a clarion call to the souls of free men in the making. As the fruits of its thinking spread, people became accustomed to the warning, rather than consecrated to the substance which enabled that warning. Having struck true richness of gold, they ceased mining, leaving it to the natural forces to wash the gold from the lode into their palms. Slowly the gold of liberty bogged in the inertia of a heedless, busy people.

Now comes the threat to all of the gold in freedom. Now Uncle Sam, marshaling his assets by a review of history, comes upon a souvenir resounding indeed. He rediscovers in the attic of history that which never was and never can be, safely called a relic. The price of liberty is constant vigilance. Millions for defense but not one cent for tribute. A house divided against itself * * *. In union there is strength. Don't tread on me. These were never cliches. They attracted an emptiness through repetition of a parrot-like nature in the gesture of the elementary schools, but actually they were and are pregnant with continuing liberty for these States united. It is well that we review the past, assort the treasures of our trove, renew acquaintance with the rugged virtues which sprouted and nurtured our homeland. It is well, indeed.

Nothing else will preserve us. Nothing else will suffice as warning against the predatory forces intent upon our destruction. Nothing. These are the simple virtues of free men. These are the fortifications behind which grew freedom of worship, freedom of speech, habeas corpus, the secret ballot, government of, for, and by the people. These are America. That which blatantly bellows from a bureaucratic bedlam is not America. That which sings a litany of lost energy, shrivelled ambition, innocuous inertia, something for nothing, that is not America. The preachments of a villainous departure from the firm and rugged precepts of our origin are proving traitorous. The record speaks eloquently for itself.

We are one of two things. Either we are Americans in the spirit and the flesh or we are wanderers into realms strange to Americans and repugnant to every impulse which made Americans. Uncle Sam does right well to lift from his treasure chest souvenirs of his own historic past. Nowhere else will he find the things which birthed, clothed, and fed him from the first cry of newborn human freedom, to this dire challenge to the blood of all who trod before us that he might grow great.

Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THRUSTON B. MORTON
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the Members of the House to a very objective and comprehensive statement made by Mr. Edward Hilliard, an investment banker and broker in the city of Louisville. Mr. Hilliard has for years been a serious student of fiscal matters. His remarks which follow were delivered on November 29 in Louisville, Ky., before the Harvard Business School Club of Kentucky. In these days when our national well-being and security are threatened not only by war but also by economic collapse due to inflation, Mr. Hilliard's observations are most timely. I recommend the study of Mr. Hilliard's views by every Member of the House. His remarks follow:

INFLATION

(By Edward H. Hilliard)

The United States has the disease of inflation in a big way. The value of the dollar has declined to 53 cents as measured in our purchasing power. In the black market of Bombay it has apparently declined to 35 cents. Unless we stop confusing the disease and its symptoms and start treating the disease itself, that value will certainly decline further. Emission of inconvertible money in the form of currency and bank deposits is the disease. In the last 11 years, largely by selling Government bonds to banks, we have increased our currency from $7,000,000,000 to $28,000,000,000 and spendable bank deposits from $50,000,000,000 to $160,000,000,000.

Next to war, inflation is the greatest tragedy than can happen to a nation. War at its worst brings out some noble qualities in man—courage, loyalty, and generosity. Inflation is just the opposite. It makes honest men dishonest, destroys savings, life insurance, and pensions, makes saving wrong and spending right, makes speculators out of all businessmen, demoralizes our national economy, and destroys the effectiveness of our war effort. In the present instance, inflation may readily result in our defeat by Russia.

Inflation is not a general price advance. Price advance is merely one of the symptoms or results. As Webster says:

"Inflation is a disproportionately and relatively sharp and sudden increase in the quantity of money, or credit, or both, relative to the exchange business," coming among other ways, "in times of financial difficulty by governmental issues of paper money. * * * In accordance with the quantity theory of money, inflation always produces a rise in the price level."

In other words, inflation produces a decline in the value of money.

Inflation is emission of money. Emission is the underlying cause of our trouble. Decline in the value of money is merely the first of four results. The second is suspension of specie payments and disappearance of the metallic money formerly used as a standard; third, further emissions of paper of necessity because depreciated paper will not buy what the Government needs; and fourth, the washout—paper money becomes valueless or practically so. Emission, decline in value, suspension, further emission and washout. Sometimes suspension precedes decline in value but the result is the same.

History is full of examples. In 300 B. C. Lysias blamed the corn factors for price advances just like Mr. Truman blamed the speculators here. Diocletian in A. D. 300 used price controls just as we do here. In France there was the John Law Mississippi Bubble and in England the East India Co. We had our colonial emissions and the continental currency, the latter leaving the expression "Not worth a Continental" when that currency went to zero. The Assignats of France in 1790, secured by real property at the rate of five to one, the best secured irredeemable paper currency ever issued, and its successor the Mandats, went out at zero in spite of the fact that "just a little" was originally issued. There was the wild Austrian inflation of 1811, and then Germany, Austria, Greece, France, and others (many of them two or three times) of this last 50 years. Emission, decline, further emission suspension, washout. Dishonesty, increase in racial tensions, destruction of the value of savings, insurance policies, endowment funds, the complete pauperization of the poor who always have the paper money when it becomes valueless. There were dozens of other tragic results.

If inflation is so terrible, and there are so many examples in history, why do we stand for it? For two simple reasons. First, we fail to distinguish between the disease and its symptoms. We ignore the tubercle that is eating the lung and treat the cough. We continue the printing of money and pass laws about price controls. Second, the early phases of inflation are pleasant. The emission of paper currency puts prices up, stimulates trade, increases profits, increases incomes faster than expenses, and makes every man think he is smart. Like the patient in the early stages of tuberculosis, the fever actually makes us feel better. But usually not for long. We here in this country may right now be passing out of this pleasant phase. Expenses are catching up with income for many people. Recently issued statistics show that over one-third of the families in the United States are now drawing on savings for living expenses. Another symptom showing we are nearing the end of the pleasant stage is the confusion in high circles between cause and effect. The emission of paper money forces prices up and forces businessmen to borrow money. Borrowing is a result not a cause but businessmen are now being charged with being the cause of inflation. Emission increases costs of Government itself and creates deficits. Emission is the cause, deficits a result. My guess is that we will shortly hear the historic charge that deficits cause emission. This confusion tends further toward the treatment of symptoms. The disease itself is ignored and continues on its progress.

The fact that we have the disease is incontrovertible. We have had the emission—an immense increase in money. We have had the first effect—the decline in the value of our money. We have had the second effect—the suspension of specie payment and the disappearance of the metal we have always used as money. It is neither possible to convert our paper into gold nor use that paper as the means of purchasing gold at a higher price than the nominal conversion value. We are about to witness the third result—further emissions because of war and the higher prices brought on by the earlier emissions.

Will we have the fourth and last stage? We must immediately stop treating symptoms and hunting hedges. Further emissions will further depress the value of the dollar. We must stop these emissions as far as humanly possible.

First. The Treasury Department should cease acting as an instrumentality for carrying out social objectives of any party. It should recognize that its duty is to "Prepare plans for the support of credit of the United States" as provided in the Statute of 1789 under which it operates. The Treasury Department should openly and boldly come out against policies which are destroying the value of our money. These policies are primarily expenditure of money on objectives not connected with our war effort.

Second. As a means of preventing further decline in the value of the dollar the United States Government should ration itself as well as its citizens. It should immediately stop spending and lending on objectives not connected with our war effort. This reduction in Government expenditures will cause some unemployment but that unemployment will shortly be taken up by the war effort. Reduction in Government spending and lending will cause a reduction in demand by civilians for the very things which the Government must buy for our war effort.

Third. In order to force further reductions in civilian expenditure, excise taxes should be increased and broadened.

Fourth. The market for Government bonds among individuals must be reestablished. So that as few bonds as possible need be sold to banks. Government bonds must be made more attractive to individuals both from the standpoint of safety and from the standpoint of return. Reduction of Government expenditure on nonessentials will tend to reestablish confidence in Government bonds and other fixed income investments. But that is not enough. The income on Government bonds must be increased to attract individual buying. Because of the difficulties of raising the interest rates on Government bonds, tax exemption, as objectionable as that may be, should be offered to the holders of maturing "E," "F," and "G" bonds, who elect to extend their holdings and to purchasers of new offerings of letter and coupon bonds, with the provision that no individual may hold more than a fixed amount of tax-exempt issues.

Unless we recognize the magnitude of the crisis and start at once treating the disease of inflation at its source, this inflation will follow the course inflations have always followed. And what will that do to social security? How will that old man feel if you take away from him a social-security payment of $1 that will buy a pound of beef and give him back at 65 $1 that will buy 1 ounce of beef?

Penal laws about prices and controls are laws treating the cough while the disease continues its course. "In the battle between printed money and price controls, printed money always wins." The value of our printed money will be determined by the financial policies of the United States Government, and not by price controls and penal laws. The value of our money is going down and penal laws about prices and controls will do no more good than they did in our revolution. As Pelatiah Webster said about paper money at that time—

"It is not more absurd to attempt to impel faith into the heart of an unbeliever by fire or fagot or to whip love into your mistress with a cow skin, than to force value into your money to penal laws."

The time is short. Next to joining our fighting forces, there is nothing more patriotic that a citizen can do than fight the policies that are now destroying the value of our money. It is up to us.

Rights and Dangers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of December 12, 1950:

RIGHTS AND DANGERS

The 10 amendments called the Bill of Rights were added to the Constitution of the United States 159 years ago next Friday.

They were framed and adopted to guarantee civil liberties—to protect a people who had known the tyranny of English kings from arbitrary and tyrannical acts of their own new Government.

As the anniversary nears, court decisions based on these amendments are raising grave questions as to the power of the people and their Government to protect the United States from traitorous acts of persons serving the interests of a hostile foreign power.

The Supreme Court held yesterday that a witness cannot be punished for refusing to answer grand-jury inquiries about connections with the Communist Party. This because the fifth amendment says "no person * * * shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

Communist Party membership has not been made a crime. But the opinion written by Justice Black affirms that one admitting employment by the party, or intimate knowledge of its workings, might reasonably fear criminal prosecution under the Smith Act.

This decision apparently means that courts, congressional committees, and Government agencies, as well as grand juries, cannot require persons to answer questions about Communist connections or activities, and that many persons facing contempt penalties for refusing to answer such questions must go free if they claimed the right to avoid "self-incrimination."

The Smith Act is the Federal law, making it a crime to teach or advocate violent overthrow of the Government, under which 11 top leaders of the Communist Party were convicted in October 1949.

Those convictions have been upheld by a New York Federal court of appeals in an opinion written by Judge Learned Hand. The case of the Communist Party leaders, who contend that the Smith Act denies liberties guaranteed by the Bill of Rights, is now before the Supreme Court for final decision.

Last week the same court of appeals, in another opinion by Judge Hand, set aside Judith Coplon's conviction for stealing Government secrets and transmitting them to a Russian agent.

"The guilt is clear," that opinion said. But, it added, "the conviction cannot stand," for Miss Coplon was deprived of "due process of law"—another right guaranteed by the fifth amendment—when the FBI arrested her without a warrant and when the Government failed to prove that evidence used against her had not been obtained by wiretapping.

However, Judge Hand pointed out, it is within the authority of Congress to narrow in cases of espionage, sabotage, and other heinous crimes the legal protections by which Miss Coplon had profited.

Somehow, we must find a way to preserve for loyal persons the liberties shielded by the Bill of Rights and at the same time safeguard our country from the agents of a foreign enemy who would destroy all freedoms. That is an imperative challenge to all the wisdom good Americans can apply to the problem.

Bromfield Sights Need for Reexamination of Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an article by one of my constituents and my very good friend, Louis Bromfield.

Mr. Speaker, it certainly is time for those in control of our Government to give to the people a clear picture of what is going on. I join in the thoughts of Mr. Bromfield and many of the people it is my honor to represent that our program is muddled, confused, and inefficient.

It is time for us to learn the truth, not only of our foreign policy, but our own program as it affects the United States.

Let us have a reexamination, forget politics, and prepare to defend the freedoms that have made this Nation great.

The article follows:

BROMFIELD SIGHTS NEED FOR REEXAMINATION OF GOVERNMENT

(By Louis Bromfield)

Since Secretary of State Acheson has given us a new and rather meaningless word, "reexaminist," it might be well to give it some real meaning.

In a gust of stilted British humor Mr. Acheson launched the word as a term of opprobrium, only to find that it became a word with overtones of common sense, intelligence, and respect.

There is no doubt that the whole of our foreign policy, whatever that may be, will be reexamined and the examination will probably run into the field of vast expenditures for foreign relief of one kind and another which have been made during the past 4 years.

The citizens of the Nation are certainly entitled to know exactly how and where was spent some forty-three billions of their money and whether we should, as Mr. Truman proposes, continue to pour out such astronomical sums indefinitely.

Certainly Congress should endeavor to find out how long we can afford such whole floods of outgoing dollars without sinking our own Nation.

Congress should likewise reexamine the whole of the ECA which, since the announced departure of able Mr. Paul Hoffman as Director, is rapidly congealing into a fixed and permanent organization of second-rate bureaucrats, all intent upon making a temporary agency into a permanent affair which will keep them indefinitely on the staggering Government payroll.

We might reexamine the whitewashed Amerasia case and the Socialist government of Great Britain, supported by American taxpayers, while it blocks European defense and cooperation and carries on appeasement deals with Red China.

But there is plenty of reexamination long overdue in fields outside the realm of foreign policy.

We, the people, through our Congress, might well ask what has become of the findings of the Hoover Commission, set up to bring some order into what is the biggest and probably the worst-run business in the world—the United States Government.

It might also examine the question of why, although the whole of the Nation is for greater economy in government, the number of Government employees continues to increase more and more rapidly.

It might inquire why the number of public servants attached to Mr. Truman personally and the White House has been quadrupled, all at fat salaries several times the income of the average American family.

Congress should certainly attempt to find out what became of another fifty billions of taxpayers' money which has gone to the Armed Forces during the past 4 years and why nothing has come of it but a general state of unpreparedness.

It should ask why at the moment Army camps are filled with reservists and draftees sitting around with nothing to do while the Army goes on drafting men and calling up Reserves. It might go into the problem of a genuine unification and coordination of all the Armed Forces.

And Congress might well go into the delays and the dodges of the Department of Justice in following up the investigations of the Kefauver committee by active prosecutions, when actually interest in the race-track business extends right into the Department itself.

It might inquire into the resentment and anger of many big shots on the Democratic National Committee over the activities of the Kefauver committee.

Some prominent Democrats, with a total lack of decency and morality, have bitterly claimed that the revelations of the Kefauver committee defeated their candidates in the recent election. I think the people would be very interested to know just how much certain figures in the present administration and the national Democratic organization are tied into the crime rings that function from one end of the country to the other.

And Congress might well look into the Treasury Department and find out the truth or falsity of the reports of Governor Warren's committee in California that deals had been made on income taxes between criminal elements and employees of the Department of Internal Revenue.

Apparently while the Justice Department and the Treasury Department have been combing small taxpayer's accounts and those of reputable corporations and citizens, leaks in taxes from the criminal elements have piled up during the past 3 or 4 years of several million dollars.

There is plenty to be reexamined in Washington. What kind of an administration have we? Why does everything seem to be muddled, confused, and hopelessly inefficient and even corrupt?

There is plenty to be "reexamined" in Washington and the new Congress has both the power and authority to do it. It seems certain that the great majority of citizens would like nothing so much as a good wholesale reexamination of the whole degenerating picture in Washington.

Examined bit by bit, it is a shocking picture.

Several Congressmen might well make great future capital and indeed whole careers simply by bringing about more of the reexamination which Mr. Acheson attempts so gayly to laugh off.

Railroad Retirement Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include a speech made by Thomas Stack, president, National Railroad Pension Forum, Inc., at Cleveland Auditorium, Cleveland, Ohio, on October 27, 1950.

Due to unrestricted inflation during the past few years, which continues to reduce the purchasing power of the dollar, it becomes more evident every day that legislation should be passed by this Congress to increase railroad retirement pay to the great group of railroad men who have so faithfully carried on railway transportation so vital to the commerce of our country and its economic stability.

The need for such increase in railroad retirement is further pointed up by the action of the Eighty-first Congress in increasing social security by approximately 75 percent for the other workers of the Nation.

Mr. Stack's speech follows:

Honorable Members of Congress, officers and members of the National Railroad Pension Forum, ladies and gentlemen, my message tonight is one of utmost importance, not alone to the railroad employees of the Cleveland area, but to this Nation's rail workers, in discussing some of the defects of our railroad retirement system and what we are attempting to do to remedy same. So far you have been led to believe that we have a wonderful retirement set-up, with protection for ourselves and families from the cradle to the grave, and our Retirement Board has exemplified these statements with elaborate charts and figures showing benefits have been paid in the millions of dollars to railroad workers. Such statements are hard to understand or comprehend where the interests of the individual are involved and many of us labor with the illusion that we are paying for security that we and our families will one day enjoy. And, so you have never been informed of the many injustices of our Railroad Retirement Act, solely because no one has ever pointed them out.

The new social security law—H. R. 6000—was passed in the Eighty-first Congress and increased benefits under that act some 77 percent, so that now the ratio of benefits eclipse that of our rail worker. In order to explain this remark, let us consider two men aged 60 years who work until they are 65 years old—one under the Railroad Retirement Act and another under industry covered by social security. The one under railroad retirement pays in tax 6 percent of his earnings—matched by another 6 percent by the carrier, or a total of 12 percent of his earnings, while the one under social security will pay 1½ percent of his earnings matched by another 1½ percent by his employer, or a total of 3 percent, or 9 percent less than the railroad employee, and assume both men earned an average of $300 per month in this 5-year period, the railroad man would receive a pension of $24 per month, while the man under social security—if he had a wife also 65 years old—would receive $120 per month.

Now we know that insofar as the tax is concerned, both go into the Federal Treasury and the surplus, over the current payments and administrative costs of both funds, are used by the Federal Government for current expenses. Both funds are equally sound; both are underwritten by the United States Government, and as long as we have a dollar, the Government will pay the obligation—whether it be social security or railroad retirement. This should spike the theory of some, that our railroad retirement law has a superior financial structure.

During the past year we have received some hundreds of letters from widows of employees asking us to check on their pensions; since they receive such small sums they could not believe same to be correct. Some were lawyers representing these widows who spoke with ridicule of the act and asked some information and advice. Let me advise that widows' pensions are not based on the same formula as retirement benefits. In the first place, they are based on earnings since January 1, 1937, and in the amount of $250 per month maximum. They are arrived at by using a money factor determined by 40 percent of the first $75 and 10 percent of the remainder; this is increased by 1 percent each year since 1937, which will amount to 14 percent January 1, 1951. This amount is usually about one-third of the pension her husband would receive, had he lived to get same, and is payable to the widow when she has reached the age of 65 years; hence when the Retirement Board advises those widows they are entitled to pension of $25 or $30 per month, they naturally feel something is wrong, which accounts for the deluge of letters on this subject.

Let us reflect for a few minutes on some of these cases taken from our files. Here we have a Baltimore woman, widow of a railroad man who commenced service with the carrier in 1905 and died in 1941 while on the job. The Retirement Board advised that she was entitled to regular monthly payments of $30.64. However, they rereferred to section 5 of the Railroad Retirement Act which provides in substance that all she could receive was the amount in excess of the total insurance benefits coming to her under social security, and they advised her further that inasmuch as she would receive in her own right $23.71 from the social security her railroad-retirement benefits would be reduced to a monthly figure of $6.93. To make matters worse, they reminded her that she had been paid a burial expense for her husband's funeral and part of this would be deducted each month from her railroad-retirement check and that she would receive $4.34 per month until the funeral expense, which was considered a loan, was satisfied.

Case No. 2 covers a Chicago woman whose husband worked for the Railway Express nearly 50 years; he retired November 1949 and died in March 1950. His pension amounted to $107 per month; she worked under social security during the war and asked for the lump-sum benefit—as she knew in the Eightieth Congress we had legislation passed to insure and guarantee each employee that should they die before reaching retirement age their beneficiary would be entitled to 4 percent of their earnings since January 1, 1937, to December 31, 1946, and 7 percent thereafter—not to exceed $300 maximum salary per month, which is the maximum amount on which we pay tax. She was advised by the Board that since she was over 65 years old the lump-sum channel was closed to her; and they further advised that she was not entitled to the burial expense in view of immediate benefits payable; as a matter of fact she had great difficulty in getting a loan to pay the funeral expenses, and afterward waited several months to get a reply from the Board on the many letters she wrote them on this subject. Finally, through the efforts of your forum she did get a reply that she was entitled to $34.89 per month—but again, there was a big BUT—because she was entitled in her own right to $21.43 under social security, this amount would have to be reduced from her retirement annuity and she would get $13.46 a month, under section 5, paragraph G (2) of the Railroad Retirement Act. So you can see that many of us are today paying for security we will never hope to enjoy unless the present act is materially changed. I might say that our present retirement pensions average about $83 per month, which will not suffice to meet the present economic conditions.

While our Forum has only 5 bills in the House of Representatives and 2 bills pending in the United States Senate, there are 43 bills on railroad retirement before the Interstate Committee of the House on which BOB CROSSER from your Cleveland area is chairman. This gentleman, who poses as the friend of the railroad man, serves special interests and will not permit any hearings on this important legislation. By their works we should know them. It is to explain this gentleman's indifference to our much-needed legislation that I have today appeared in this district. To refresh your memory for the November election, while we are not political, we certainly must put into office those more favorable to our cause. Letters and petitions have been sent to this man from all over the country, and even an acknowledgment was denied.

In the Senate we again ran into similar difficulty with Senator LUCAS, from Illinois, the Democratic whip, and Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, the subcommittee chairman, again serving special interests and refused to bring up railroad retirement in this session of Congress. The latter fortified himself with figures which to say the least were created by the application of the astrological slide rule that can increase or decrease to please the computer's convenience and purpose and showed, while we have two and one-half billions today in the reserve that the liability was close to $20,000,000,000, which, of course, would mean that everyone who had credits from the Retirement Act would demand same overnight and the railroads of the country would cease to exist. He concluded his remarks with a threat, that should the act be liberalized the tax would have to be increased on the employer and the employee. Of course, no insurance company uses such methods in arranging their affairs.

I would rather choose to meet those gentlemen with facts and one does not have to be a professor of economics at any University to use those facts open to all railroad employees. This act became effective January 1, 1937, with a tax of 2½ percent on the employee, matched by a similar amount by the carrier, and in the first 10 years of operation we paid an average tax of 3 percent, matched by another 3 percent by the railroads, and we accomplished in this time a repayment to the Federal Government of $500,000,000 loaned the retirement account to establish it during its infancy; we took on our pension rolls some 48,555 pensioners who never paid 1 cent into the fund and gave them a pension (many of those are no longer with us). It was a charity gesture on our part to help those poor souls; we shall never regret it. The great Lincoln at one time said, "God loves the poor, otherwise He would not have made so many." In the first 2 years of operation we had the greatest influx of pensioners we ever had and ever expect to have and we put into the reserve fund during this period almost $1,000,000,000 on an aggregate tax of 6 percent (just half of what we pay today) when we pay 12 percent or 6 percent by the employees and a similar amount by the carriers. Coupled with this though is the fact that we do not have an honest dollar in the country today; that is a dollar that would buy 100 cents' worth as it did in 1937, as inflation has given us 52 cents buying power on the 1950 dollar.

The idea behind pensions is to give to faithful employees security so that they will not suffer from want in their declining years. Earlier retirement with adequate pensions would help prolong the life of many employees and give a little sunshine in our declining years; it would restore both hope and confidence to these already on pension who are at present facing a very dark future.

I just read an article that appeared in the Topeka Daily Capitol under date of October 10, 1950, in which a statement was used by the Collector of Internal Revenue for the State of Kansas in which figures were broken down for the first 9 months of 1950 and showed there was collected in the State of Kansas under the Retirement Act $13,661,876.87, while under social security, taxes were collected in the amount of $10,105,175.68; in other words while the output on social security was almost twice that of railroad retirement, there were more taxes collected from those under railroad retirement than under social security in the State.

We have today two very important bills pending before the House committee and companion bills in the Senate. One, H. R. 7063 by Democratic Congressman OVERTON BROOKS from Louisiana to increase rail pensions 25 percent and companion bill by LANGER in the Senate, S. 3134, for the same purpose. We have H. R. 4282 by Democratic whip PERCY PRIEST from Tennessee, and companion bill S. 1379 by JOHNSON in the Senate to retire all employees at 60 years with 30 years of service (not compulsory) and eliminate discrimination between male and female employees as exists at present. As stated before, we have only 7 bills in the Senate and House, but there are 50 bills pending before that body—43 in the House and 7 in the Senate—all pertaining to increased benefits under our retirement system, put in by various Congressmen and Senators at the suggestion of their railroad constituents, which shows the keen interest manifest on this topic, as never before were so many bills put into the various committees of Congress on one subject—such as, railroad retirement.

Early in the first session of this Congress in 1949 I went to Washington and tried to secure sponsors of our bills by those holding key positions with the administration. This accounts for the fact that many of our bills were sponsored by Democratic leaders. However, it was called to my attention by one of our leading Senators that should we press for passage of our retirement bills while the social security bill, H. R. 6000, was pending we might be taken under social security. This gentleman showed me the Hoover Commission report in which it was recommended that both Federal civil service and railroad retirement be taken under the social security, and he advised me he had a tentative agreement with the Federal employees that they would not press for action until the social security bill had passed the Senate. I asked this gentleman when he expected action on social security. He advised that it would pass the House in the first session and come to the floor of the Senate not later than March 15. On March 15, 1950, I was again back in Washington and testified before the Senate Finance Committee holding hearings on the social security bill. I pointed out on this occasion the vast discrimination between proposed social security and railroad retirement system. So impressive were the briefs that a member of the committee—Senator HUGH BUTLER from Nebraska, and former construction engineer for the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway, asked permission to put those briefs in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during this period. Now social security passed the House in the first session of this Congress in 1949, but bogged down under the leadership of Senator LUCAS, of Illinois, in the Senate. This man I used to call my friend was head of the policy committee of the Senate and Democratic whip, and it was under his leadership that the social-security legislation did not pass the Senate until August 17, 1950, and, of course, is now law.

I was back again in Washington on August 18 and made a desperate effort to get action on our bills. I interviewed some 115 Congressmen and 32 Senators favorable to our cause, but I found the Congress in the utmost confusion—with tax bills, appropriation bills, omnibus bills, Communist bills, and the Korean War scare taking the play away from all other legislation. To make matters more acute the House went into a series of recesses with only a guard there to open and close the sessions every third day until the Senate completed its business the latter part of September. While the hope for action before January 1 is slim, we are doing everything possible to secure hearings on our retirement bills after the November election so that we could get them on both floors of Congress before this Congress adjourns in December. It is a violation of democratic principles if we were denied the courtesy extended to all Americans in this wonderful country of ours.

I would like to state with authority tonight that 90 percent of our memberships comprise members of the various crafts of the Brotherhood and that only some of those leaders who instruct CROSSER are opposed to us apparently on the grounds that we are invading the field of labor. For 11 long years those who criticize us did nothing to remedy the situation, although they now admit many inequalities in connection with the act, but as far as they were concerned the retired worker was the forgotten man and now with lip service they are trying to impress him with the great interest they have in retirement benefits. One of those leaders sent out 2 weeks ago a letter to his cohorts in which he tried to leave the impression that I was a racketeer. This man is the most despised labor leader of them all; he dictates to CROSSER and to DOUGLAS. Never since the days of Al Capone have we had a dictator and czar of this caliber—throwing his weight around Washington and hiding behind the skirts of politicians to deprive you of just benefits and yet has impressed you as a friend. He voted himself $35,000 a year salary with a pension of $16,666.66, supplemented by a railroad retirement pension, and he does not have to wait until he is 65 years old to take it either. I had four sons in the service; one lost his life in France, to try to exterminate the dictators of Europe, and yet we coddle this third-grade student at home.

In closing, dear friends, I want to impress upon you the sincerity of purpose behind this organization. We need a forum to protect your interests and police pensions from here out. It is my wish that this organization shall continue to flourish many years after I am gone so that never again shall our railroad employees be singled out as guinea pigs for the experiments of the philosophers of socialistic ideas. I have 38 years of railroad service; I will be 60 years old next month; I have dedicated the rest of my life to this worthy cause. The Good Book tells us "No greater love hath a man than to give his life for his fellow man." I am doing God's work in trying to help the poor railroad worker who individually is unable to help himself. I am not alone trying for the material success of the Forum, but looking forward to the great beyond when that Judge of Justice one day will say to me "Come, you faithful of my people, possess the kingdom prepared for you."

I thank you.

A Blistering Indictment of Politics as Usual

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a letter written to me by Charles R. Chidester, of Torrington, Conn., wherein there is set forth what I believe to be a consensus of opinion shared by a majority of our citizens.

In time of crisis "politics as usual" has no place. The fate of not only 150,000,000 Americans is in the balance but the future of humanity may well depend on the strength of America.

The letter follows:

TORRINGTON, CONN., December 7, 1950.

Congressman PATTERSON: We have raised two generations of boys to be diplomatic pawns, political sacrifices, and American heartaches. They have known nothing but Government by emergency. They have been indoctrinated with the thought and example of profligate spending, a never mind tomorrow we will take care of you. What is pathetic is that the "We" were careful not to translate who "We" were. The administration was going to be good enough to give the people back their own money, less of course the usual administration cut.

The people of the country have been accused of cynicism and sophistication where the old ideals of Americanism were concerned. Why shouldn't they be when their Government has adopted an attitude of "What's in it for me" policy to obtain vote getting continuance in office? Buy the farm vote with subsidies; buy the labor vote with a Secretary of Labor who does not represent the entire working people of the country but only its pressure powerful unionized minority; buy large portions of the general public by public housing, public power, public medicine, extravagant public political patronage. The question wasn't whether it was good economics or good government, but how many votes will it deliver.

I can understand why such Democratic figures as Al Smith, Jim Farley, Jim Byrnes, Senator Byrd, and Raymond Moley quit active participation in the welfare party. It had become the captive of the Frankfort group of Socialists, the Pollyannas of the welfare state. The group who could buy it for you wholesale.

The administration followed the same line abroad and set up a world WPA; again it was added to our bill. Although we had a Monroe Doctrine for our side of the water, we ignored its basic concept in dealing abroad. The administration thought they could buy respect and friendship abroad. They didn't predicate their help on any self-help quota. They used our money to support and maintain a Socialist government in Britain, while the British traded our rehabilitation goods to Russia. They agreed to demolish factories in Germany so the Germans became less self-sufficient and needed more help. They supported factions to influence politics in France, Belgium, Greece, and the Near East. They only succeeded in ineffective meddling that created ill-will that was capitalized upon by the Soviet.

Did they succeed? Today we are still owed enough money from World Wars I and II to liquidate our own national debt. To those whom they gave the most in money and war-torn dead, can we now depend? Look at the implied threat of England and France today to appease Red China or we will not be able to stand with you. The same old tune of "your danger is in Europe; you should rearm us and fight for us there."

Can we afford to continue to impoverish our natural resources, to devaluate our dollar, to sacrifice our greatest asset of all—the youth of our Nation—to these leeches? Are we going to turn the other cheek again while 150,000 men are being slaughtered by the Chinese Soviet—Mr. Acheson's agrarians? Is the me-first appeal of Europe more pressing than the lives of these men? Can we continue to fight a war, with one hand tied behind us, waiting for tea diplomacy at the United Nations? The mothers of the boys in Korea don't think so.

A record of many years standing shows where Acheson and his crowd stand. They have deliberately misled the American people long enough. A policy from Moscow couldn't have been more successfully confusing. Five months after the Korean war started our Commerce and State Departments are still allowing materials economically and aggressively important to Red China to be shipped to them. What constitutes treachery to our leaders? Are our elected representatives so blind and uninformed as not to know this? Does the remains of our Korean Army have to fight not only Red China but the Commerce and State Departments, plus the political decorum or indifference of our legislators?

President Truman has said that Acheson would continue in office as long as he did. These are times when the confidence of the American people is essential to our preservation as a free country. If Mr. Truman ties his destiny with a man suspect, there are constitutional ways to dispose of both these men. It is past time for politics as usual.

When Mr. Truman was voted full power to control wages and prices for an all-out defense effort, he chose to wait until after all major unions had their pay boost and until elections were over. This choice of political expedience over moral and economic necessity will saddle the coming generations of our youth with additional billions of taxes. Mr. Truman's refusal to take advice on the qualifications and principles of some of his major political appointments has led to questionable and costly economic programs. Surely Mr. Truman is not an indispensable man if he persists in ignoring conclusive evidence of treacherous associates.

It is pathetic to note that the best qualifications a man can have for a major administration appointment is to be defeated by the electorate of some State where the voter has expressed no confidence in his ability. Let's have more Americans in politics and less politics in America.

Let's make it plain by congressional action that the next country to go to war against us can expect no mercy during the war and no help or rehabilitation after it is over. Let's quit playing Uncle Sap.

CHARLES R. CHIDESTER.

Psychological Attack

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following very interesting article which appeared in the November issue of the Reader's Digest by Constantine W. Boldyreff, a professor of Russian in the School of Foreign Service at Georgetown University, Washington, D. C.:

WE CAN WIN THE COLD WAR IN RUSSIA
(By Constantine W. Boldyreff with O. K. Armstrong)

Despite the war in Korea and the certainty that the tyrants who rule the Soviet Union have a blueprint for further aggression, I believe that a major conflict with Russia is not inevitable.

World war III can be prevented by an immediate and vigorous psychological attack

aimed at the enemy's weakest spot—smoldering opposition of the Russian people against their oppressors in the Kremlin. Despite two generations of indoctrination, despite the relentless efforts of the dread secret police to crush all hope of freedom, there is bitter resentment against Stalin's slave regime. If that latent opposition can be aroused and organized, Stalin and his fellow conspirators will not dare provoke war. Once the opposition in Russia gets rolling, it can never be stopped.

I write as one who has lived a life of active opposition to the Bolshevik regime. After World War I my father, Lt. Gen. Vassily Boldyreff, commanded the White Russian Army in Siberia resisting the Bolsheviks. I was then a cadet. My father was captured and liquidated. In 1930 I helped to organize the NTS (National Alliance of Russian Solidarists), an underground organization secretly working in Russia today toward the revolution we know must someday free our people.

We who have chosen freedom must warn that the democracies are fast losing the cold war. Many well-meaning people presume, as did Trygve Lie, secretary-general of the United Nations, that if leaders of both sides will sit down together their differences can be settled by discussion and compromise. That is not true. Marxist communism is a militant, proselyting doctrine, based upon struggle. It carries inspiring promises, it creates zealots. But it cannot permit liberty of thought or action, it cannot tolerate opposition. Therefore it can never be appeased. It must be defeated.

Our need is to understand the enemy's plan of campaign. Stalin wants war—but not for Russia now. He wants war to strengthen his position internally and bleed the United States white. Here in Stalin's own words is the fundamental principle for Communist strategy of world conquest: "War leads to the weakening of the positions of capitalism in general. It approximates in its effect a proletarian revolution."

So Stalin has devised the diabolically shrewd plan to set the world afire with wars, fought by his puppets under Soviet-trained leaders, while keeping Russia officially neutral. By this means Stalin can enjoy all the privileges accorded honest diplomacy while his stooges stand in the United Nations and damn peace-loving peoples in barrages of propaganda aimed to win the underprivileged millions of the earth.

That was the pattern in Korea. It will be the pattern in Formosa, where Stalin hopes to draw the United States into war with China. It will be the pattern in Germany, where American guns may blaze away not at Russians but at Soviet-supported Germans.

Stalin does not fear the feverish arming of the United States, the diversion of manpower from normal production, the use of resources and the vast expenditures for implements of war. That fits his plan of bleeding the United States white. But one thing he does fear—a revolt of the Russian people.

The masters of the Kremlin dread most a movement that will show their victims how to shake off Communist control. The Achilles' heel of Soviet rule has always been in Russia. Between 1921 and 1941 there were more than 30 revolts, rebellions, and active plots against the Bolshevik regime. Most of these, spontaneous and disorganized, were doomed from the start. But they indicated unmistakably the hatred of the people for their oppressors.

When Hitler's armies invaded Russia in 1941, the people greeted them as liberators. In less than 5 months millions of Russians surrendered to the Germans. By 1942 an organized anti-Bolshevik revolution under the leadership of Gen. Andrei Vlassov was on its way. But Nazi atrocities were more than even desperate anti-Communists could stomach, and the powerful force of Russian patriotism switched from combating the regime to defending the homeland. After the war, hundreds of thousands of Russian prisoners of war and displaced persons refused to return to the Soviet Union.

Today the people of Russia hate the Communist regime more than ever before. Victory in World War II brought no relief for them. Instead, life became more difficult. Authentic reports from the underground indicate the fury and intensity of recent selective purges, comparable in their violence to the bloody carnage organized in 1937-38. There are about 15,000,000 prisoners in concentration camps; hardly a Russian family but has lost at least one member as a victim to Bolshevik cruelty. No one, not even party members and public officials, is free from the haunting fear of arrest.

The people of the democracies need quickly to enlist these allies in the only campaign that spells sure defeat for communism—the war of ideas. These are the weapons we can equip them with:

1. Active and open encouragement.

Neither the size nor the significance of the Russians' opposition to communism has been understood by the free nations. Escapees from the Soviet Union are forced to live wretched, hunted lives in Western Europe, Greece, and Turkey. The democracies have failed signally to encourage and to help these refugees. Yet they are passionate partisans of freedom—our best allies. Most of them have staked their lives to escape communism and will stake them again to destroy communism and liberate their enslaved people.

Assurance should be given the anti-Communist forces within Russia that by every means their hands will be strengthened. Announcement of a plan of assistance for all working in the underground would fire these patriots with hope and determination.

It cannot be urged too strongly that Russians be equipped and encouraged to conduct their own psychological war. The weakness of the Voice of America is that it sends propaganda from America. Its effectiveness would be immeasurably multiplied if its broadcasts were by, of, and for Russians.

Criticism by a foreigner can be misunderstood and resented by the sensitive national. Verbal attacks upon the Red army are harmful because it is Russian, not Bolshevik. The people are proud of its victories. Unfavorable comparisons of standards of living can be misinterpreted as boastful superiority. It should be made clear that the people are being robbed of their birthrights of freedom and truth, but comparisons must be made in the spirit of kindness, sympathy, and understanding.

2. A campaign of truth.

The people of the Soviet Union are famished for authentic news and ideas from the outside world. Russian leaders of liberation should be equipped immediately to speak loudly and clearly to the masses over the heads of their dictators. They must use every occasion to assert:

That credit for Russia's war record belongs to its people, not to Stalin and his gang.

That the Western World does not blame the Russian people for the Kremlin's peace-wrecking tactics.

That all free people share the aspirations of the Russian people for freedom and are eager to help them earn it.

That Soviet propaganda which brands the United States and its associates as aggressors bent on Russia's destruction is fantastically false.

That, above all, the free peoples seek the friendship of the Russian people, and once the Communist menace has been conquered, this friendship can be established on a lasting basis.

How can we get this message across in a major psychological offensive? First method is the radio. Let the Voice of America be augmented by the Voice of Free Russia, with a ring of radio stations all around the U. S. S. R.

Second method is the use of leaflets, newspapers, and other publications, printed both inside and outside of the homeland. Those from outside can be sent in by aircraft and balloons. No government could do this in time of peace, but private agencies can. Mystery planes, sowing the truth, can invade the Soviet skies. Hundreds of patriotic fliers are ready to risk their necks in this service.

Printed items, particularly those that give news of and encouragement to the opposition, have a tremendous impact upon the minds of the Russian people. The fact that they are forbidden to read counterpropaganda makes it all the more sought after. Try as they may, the secret police cannot grab all the leaflets or arrest all who possess them. Moreover, nations denied freedom of press and speech become huge whispering galleries, through which suppressed facts and ideas quickly spread. We know that within hours after the Voice of America announced Mrs. Kasenkina's jump from a Soviet consulate window in New York all Moscow was buzzing with the story.

3. A program of action.

Psychological warfare is effective only when it calls for constructive effort. Foremost in our campaign should be a plan to strengthen all elements of opposition both in the satellite nations and within Russia itself. Workers in the underground require the kind of external help only free peoples can give them—money, equipment, moral support.

Thousands of recruits are available for infiltration into Russia. Underground agents should be prepared to select and urge members to penetrate into key positions in the Communist Party. They should establish close contact with those already in such positions and give them the ideological ammunition they need.

Activities that bring the anti-Communist opposition to public attention should be greatly multiplied. A new form of underground organization least vulnerable to the secret police has been developed—unknown to each other, single fighters, inspired and instructed by leaflets, act individually but uniformly in the effort to attain common aims. They signalize their existence to other anonymous fighters by painting the NTS symbol—a trident—on walls and sidewalks, perhaps with an appropriate slogan. With the mounting confidence sure to follow such a full-scale psychological offensive, the tide of results will rise.

One basic aim of our campaign is to overcome the Russians' fear of the MVD, the secret police. By ruthlessness and cruelty, the Politburo has nurtured the idea that its agents are invincible and invulnerable. Our task is to prove that a myth. Already we have shown that, like the Nazi Gestapo, it can be duped and misled.

Nicolas Sinevirsky, an NTS member, joined the military branch of MVD for several months and returned to this side of the iron curtain. A book about his experiences was published by Possev, the Russian anti-Communist newspaper of Western Germany. This paper is receiving clandestine circulation in Russia and the satellite countries, with devastating effect upon MVD morale. By incessant repetition, by overt acts, the vulnerability of the MVD must become an accepted fact in Russia.

The men of the Kremlin know that once their grip loosens at home their stooges in the satellite nations will also lose their power. And with that loss there can be no more wars fought by Communist-dominated masses. Then the revolt will gather strength and sweep the Russian homeland.

Here is a task to which the best efforts of free nations can be dedicated. The support of their governments is necessary. But the movement toward freedom has always come from the people. Churches of all faiths, labor organizations, educational and civic groups, all can help to equip our liberation forces with the weapons of truth and action. Victory in the psychological war will mean peace. Its loss could mean that all that has been gained in human rights from the Magna Carta to the American Constitution will go down into chaos and enslavement.

A Further Advertising Barrage by Omaha Doctors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, the following advertising material makes up part 6 of my exposé of the tactics of the Omaha doctors in the last congressional campaign.

On November 1, 1950, the Omaha doctors ran the following advertisement in the Omaha World-Herald and other papers.

At the beginning of the article appears the symbol of United States freedom—the bald eagle with a shield carrying three stars and five black stripes and three arrows in the left claw and an olive branch in the right one.

DECLARATION

AN OPEN LETTER TO MY PATIENTS

Legislation has been introduced into Congress at this session which is the first step in bringing about a system of socialized medicine such as England now has. This socialized medicine scheme has been put up by the present administration in Washington. They call it "compulsory national health insurance" which means that you must pay for it whether you want it or not.

This scheme would destroy the personal relationship between patient and physician, would make impossible absolute choice of physician in time of illness, would lower the quality of medical care, and would allow political control of the physicians, dentists, pharmacists, nurses, hospitals, and everyone else who looks after the sick.

And it means more expense—another compulsory deduction from your pay check, less take-home pay, and more hidden taxes.

On election day, November 7, we ask you to vote for a man who will fight this menace to the American way. Vote for HOWARD BUFFETT for Congress in the Second District.

Sincerely,

Vote for HOWARD BUFFETT for Congress on November 7.

Paid for by Healing Arts Committee, M. C. Howard, M. D., chairman.

On November 2, 1950, the following purported news item appeared in the Omaha World-Herald:

DOCTORS PRODUCE 311 SIGNATURES

The Second Congressional District healing arts committee Thursday produced the signatures of 311 Omaha doctors in an open letter to their patients.

Dr. Maurice C. Howard, chairman, said: "This should be answer enough" to Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN'S charge that "only crackpots" are opposing him "in our fight against socialized medicine."

The declaration to patients states:

"This socialized medicine scheme has been put up by the present administration in Washington * * * and you must pay for it whether you want it or not.

"This scheme would destroy a personal relationship between the patient and the physician. It would make impossible the absolute choice of a physician in time of illness.

"It would lower the quality of medical care."

Dr. Howard said the names of the signers will be made public.

On November 6, 1950, the following appeared as a news item in the Omaha World-Herald:

THIRTEEN MORE DOCTORS SIGN OPEN LETTER

Thirteen more physicians Monday added their names to the more than 300 who already have signed the "open letter to my patients" declaration against socialized medicine.

They are Drs. J. E. Bleicher, J. A. Borghoff, J. J. Borghoff, H. H. Boyne, H. H. Brinkman, Alfred Brown, Oscar Carp, Frank Eagle, J. Milton Margolin, Morris Margolin, Dan Miller, Don Nilsson, Max Raines, and M. Steinberg.

Out of Crisis, a Spirit of Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS B. HELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times magazine section of December 10, 1950:

OUT OF CRISIS, A SPIRIT OF UNITY—AGAIN OUR DEMOCRACY DEMONSTRATES ITS GENIUS FOR BURYING DIFFERENCES IN A COMMON CAUSE

(By Cabell Phillips)

WASHINGTON.—The Eighty-first Congress came back to Washington 2 weeks ago in a pervading feeling of pessimism. On the part of the Democrats there was a feeling of bitter disillusion and hopelessness. Their Senate majority had been whittled almost to the vanishing point, they counted among their casualties at least four of their strongest leaders, and there was widespread feeling that their party had been repudiated. On the part of the Republicans there was jubilation, but their triumph was tinged with vindictiveness. Policies were to be reexamined, whitewashes were to be scraped off, and certain prominent necks were to be guillotined at whatever cost of decorum and our posture before the world. In this climate the spirit of national unity was smothered.

With the change in war news came a dramatic change of mood. Recriminations were hastily deleted from speeches. Republican as well as Democratic leaders were summoned to the White House and emerged with almost humble promises of cooperation with the President. Secretary Acheson was treated with rare deference as he laid the grim facts from the Far East before closed sessions of the Foreign Affairs Committees. Arrogance and disillusion were gone. In their place was anxiety and the realization that our Nation hung on the brink of another Pearl Harbor or Bataan.

Out of that cataclysm national unity was reborn. At least it was for this lame-duck Congress. Perhaps it was, also, among all the people of the country, but one cannot yet be sure. Public opinion moves with ponderous and unpredictable steps.

And therein lie the great questions of this hour of our national destiny. Are we as a people ready to lay aside the hostility and suspicions we carried with us to the polls on November 7? Are we ready to quit trying to place the blame for our predicament and stoning the scapegoats and to turn to the infinitely unpleasanter task of extricating ourselves? Are we willing to submerge our separate remedies and accept the single remedy of our national leadership? Are we, at last and at this moment, buffeted and chastened enough to pull on the tough armor of national unity?

National unity seems particularly difficult to come by in democratic societies. Perhaps it is because, in normal times, we lay so little value upon it. Our very structure of government makes almost a virtue of dissent. We have glorified the independence and integrity of the individual man to the point where he instinctively resists herding. We have fought two bloody wars again the fanatical excesses of nationalism and are dedicated now to the doctrine of internationalism. Of patriotism we have a plenty. But national unity is something more than a lump in the throat at the sight of Old Glory waving in the sunshine.

National unity is a composite of both emotional and rational impulses. There are three three conditions to its realization.

1. There must be, first, a common desire. It may be a desire induced by need, by avarice, or by some danger, but it must be translatable in terms of the individual citizen—a desire that he experiences personally and intensively.

2. There must be a common faith, faith in both the chosen leaders and the selected means. This faith must be given often at the sacrifice of one's own judgment and interests. It need not mean the abandonment of the right to oppose, but it does deny the right to obstruct. No commander is going to win a war whose officers veto his strategy and pick their own targets while the bullets are flying.

3. And there must be a common courage, a shared determination to pay the price and to endure the suffering that the winning of the objective demands.

How do we as a Nation measure up today with respect to these three imperatives of national unity? What elements do we have at hand, and what are we lacking?

For the long run our common desire is for a world at peace. But the short run and urgent goal is for a safe release from the debacle that seems to face us in the Far East.

At no time since our involvement in Korea began have our people been as shocked over what seems to be an almost inevitable disaster. This feeling is personal and intense. Thousands of American families have sons and fathers who are either dead or maimed or who stand in hourly peril. There is added now the dread that the fighting will spread and be prolonged. We, and the rest of the world, are tortured by the thought that a third world war has been triggered.

Our reaction is universal and unalloyed by any divergent loyalties or partisanship. In the past we have had important minorities whose sympathies, for reasons of nationality or ideology, were directed in part at least toward our enemies. It is difficult to believe that in this conflict anything more than an infinitesimal group of native Communists are so treacherously inclined.

So our common desire for peace is induced by that most powerful of all motives, awareness of danger, a grim knowledge that cuts across all boundaries of race, nationality, and belief.

Our common faith must, of necessity, be placed in our chosen leaders—the President and his chief civilian and military subordinates.

As individuals, we may neither respect nor fully trust either those leaders or their policies. Without question that is the perplexity of a great many Americans today with respect to the Truman administration. But that administration was put in power by the mandate of a democratic majority.

That mandate placed in their hands the conduct of our military and foreign affairs. We may rightfully question their wisdom and try to influence their decisions. But once those decisions are made, we are all, under the rules we live by, equally obligated by them.

We must accept the premise that our leaders are acting to the best of their abilities and to no other purpose than to protect our national interest. Any other premise in time of crisis would lead to anarchy.

Mr. Truman has demonstrated dramatically that he can command a large share of the people's faith. One such occasion was his stunning election victory in 1948. Another was his courageous and instant response to the first Communist aggression in Korea last summer. In each case there was an outpouring of public confidence in his leadership.

Conversely, there have been plentiful instances of a palpable lack of public confidence. The recent election showed the cumulative effect of many of these disagreements, specifically in the conduct of far eastern affairs, the presence of Dean Acheson in his Cabinet, and the alleged softness of his administration toward Communists in Government. And by an odd and ironic twist, there is developing as this is written some clamor against his retention of Gen. Douglas MacArthur in command of the military operations in the Pacific.

But men alone cannot be the sole repositories of our faith. We must believe, too, in the broad moral principles that motivate them and their policies. These may elude us unless we search for them, for the philosophy of our stand in the world was never more complex than it is today.

History has shattered the protective, insular shell within which we grew to maturity. The cozy warmth of our material and political self-sufficiency has been stripped away.

We stand naked to the same harsh winds of conflict that lash all the other peoples of an interdependent world. Figuratively, but inevitably, each of us is chilled by the snows of Korea and starved by the famines in India.

Faith is a nebulous and unstable quantity. It comes by invitation, not command; but fear and the need of a common defense are powerful stimuli to its coming. The evidence is that it is reviving for President Truman and his program now.

Certainly the Republican dissenters in Congress, with only a few notable exceptions, have given him their fealty. Senators TAFT and WHERRY, among others, have promised to submerge their disagreements over policy and to abate their accusations for what has happened while granting him all the authority he needs to meet the emergency.

The public must follow this lead if we are to have the faith that will sustain us in the months ahead.

Of common courage in times of stress we always have had an abundance. There is no reason to think it is less plentiful now. This is not only the physical courage to face danger on the battlefield; it is the moral courage to make the hard decisions and to accept the big and little sacrifices in which all emergencies abound. Congress has not shied from its responsibility to enact the hated economic controls nor the huge appropriations and revenue measures which our situation demands. Nor has there been any substantial outcry from the people who must shoulder these burdens.

Courage is stimulated by the magnitude of danger. The prospects a fortnight ago, with the fighting seemingly about over, was that we would slacken the pace of our defenses. The temptation to relax and "reexamine" would have been overpowering. We might have lacked the common courage then to continue to prepare for a danger we could no longer see but the comfortable illusion of safety has now been dispelled.

National unity is not, of course, the exclusive property of the democracy. It, or rather its pretext, is sine qua non of the dictatorship as well. But unity in a slave state is only incidentally a matter of loyalty; it is essentially a product of discipline. It is exacted in the way that taxes and military service and production quotas are exacted. To withhold it is to invite swift retribution. "Deviationism" is synonymous with treason.

But these impulses exist, and having no escape hatch through honest debate and controversy, build up seething pressures beneath the surface. Molten lava needs only a tiny fissure in the earth's crust to burst forth as a volcano. Unlike a democracy where national unity has a tough and resilient vitality, in a totalitarian state it can never stumble and rise and walk again. The dissolution that finally overtook German nazism and Italian fascism was utter and complete.

Winston Churchill has written eloquently of the way the British people, paralyzed by apathy and indecision in the early months of the last war, suddenly closed ranks under the hammer blows of the Nazi air blitz to give one of the most magnificent demonstrations of national unity in all history. There are comparable chapters in our own story—the two world wars, the early years of the New Deal, when destitution was the common enemy, and again last June, when Communist aggressors burst over the borders of the free world.

We have the capacity for united action and it is inconceivable that we will not use it again. We have a desire for victory and peace and we have the requisite courage. But have we the common faith?

National unity at this hour is not simply a question of whether we follow an elected official named Harry Truman and the policies of his administration. We don't all have to become Fair Dealers overnight in order to achieve a united front. We must distinguish between the individual and what he symbolizes. In the deepest sense our loyalty is bestowed not upon the man who chances to be in office, but upon an abstraction, the Presidency. We could not have endured the crises of 40 national elections if this were not so.

But we have endured those 40 bloodless uprisings as well as dissensions and disasters of a more grievous sort. And always, with but the one exception of the Civil War, we have closed our ranks, buried our differences, and faced the common enemy with a common will.

It is a peculiar genius we have that enables us to squander our greatest moral resources in this fashion and yet somehow to rally it in time to avert the ultimate catastrophe. That is a matter of exquisite timing and reflexes. Let us hope they are as keen as they need to be.

Further Publicity Given by the Omaha World-Herald for the Campaign of Lying Omaha Doctors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, part 8 of the Omaha doctors' lie and smear campaign is as follows:

DOUGLAS COUNTY DOCTORS PLAN BATTLE AGAINST SOCIALISM—NONPARTISAN GROUP BACKS BUFFETT

Douglas County physicians and members of allied professions are set to throw their hard punches in the battle against socialized medicine.

Completion of their organization was announced Saturday.

The committee of 12 physicians has evolved into nonpartisan doctors' committee, headed by Dr. J. Phil Redgwick.

This committee in turn becomes part of the greater healing arts committee with Dr. Maurice C. Howard as chairman.

Dr. Howard, a Democrat, also is president of the Omaha-Douglas County Medical Society. But the new organization is entirely independent and nonpartisan.

Working under him also will be the chairmen of the dental, nursing, pharmaceutical, hospital, optometrical, chiropodist, and allied professions such as insurance and legal groups. Each group also will have a wives' division.

Said Dr. Howard:

"The healing arts committee looks forward to a positive, constructive crusade to elect HOWARD BUFFETT to Congress November 7 and thus defeat the trend to socialized medicine.

"The doctors have learned they don't have to be engulfed in the tide of socialism. We can buck it. This is political action based on good citizenship.

"It will be a hard-hitting campaign, but strictly above belt, based on good political sportsmanship in the best American tradition. Wide interest already has been displayed. But our aim is 100 percent backing by all medical allied groups."

Said Dr. Redgwick:

"We're taking off our kid gloves, rolling up our sleeves, and we're going all out to defeat the trend of socialism in America by first defeating socialized medicine.

"We want to settle this once and for all so we can get back to our medical practices.

"The Socialists have made this a political issue; the doctors didn't start it. We are meeting that challenge by standing up and speaking in behalf of the Nation's health and the care of our patients.

"We are to solicit support for the candidate on the merits of his position regarding this issue rather than because of party. HOWARD BUFFETT is against socialism. We are for HOWARD BUFFETT.

"The committee feels the care of the sick is not a party issue, but should be the grave concern of both Republicans and Democrats."

Mr. BUFFETT, a Republican, former Representative, is opposing Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN, a Democrat, in the Second District.

MED STUDENTS IN VOTE RALLY—ANTI-SOCIAL-MEDICINE TALK GIVEN

A special bus awaited outside the University of Nebraska College of Medicine Thursday noon.

Inside the college a large register-and-get-out-the-vote rally broke up. Medical and nursing students, not previously registered and who had a few moments to spare, walked straight to the specially chartered bus.

Thus began the first group registering in the healing arts committee's drive. The bus drove directly to the election commissioner's office, then returned the students to their school.

HEAR SAXTON

The students and faculty previously had listened to Robert Saxton, deputy county election commissioner, and Merrill Smith, Lincoln, executive secretary of the Nebraska Medical Association.

Mr. Saxton, a Democrat, explained the mechanics of registering and voting.

Mr. Smith stressed the need and went on to attack the socialized medicine and Brannan plan proposals.

"Socialized medicine is the entering wedge to communism in the United States," he asserted.

IT'S NOT NEW

"Socialized medicine isn't new. It was tried as far back as the Roman Empire."

Other rallies are planned by the healing arts committee.

The nonpartisan committee received its start from a committee of 12 physicians who decided to do something about combating socialized medicine and defeating Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN.

Now it is spreading to include the allied arts and professions.

BUFFETT CLUB SEEKS VET AID—DEVOE SAYS MAKERS OF PEACE "FUMBLED"

"We believe almost every young veteran in Omaha will join with us in the 'Veterans-for-Buffett Club,'" Chairman Donald B. DeVoe said Thursday.

Speaking to the veterans' group, he said:

"Only a few years ago we left our families and homes to fight a war. * * * We won the war. We made this country the strongest nation on this earth.

"The men in Washington were in a position to have dictated almost any kind of peace that we desired. But they fumbled the ball.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

"Why should we again call on the fumblers? It's time some one else carried the ball."

Peter Marchetti, elected membership drive chairman, said: "This is our third meeting. We have more than doubled our membership each time.

"Why don't we pledge ourselves each to bring five new members to our next meeting?"

The group is supporting Republican HOWARD H. BUFFETT for Second District Congressman. He is opposing Democrat incumbent EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN.

MEDICOS LIKENED TO DON QUIXOTE

Activities of the Omaha Healing Arts Committee in the 1950 political campaign were likened to Cervantes' Don Quixote and Squire Sancho Panza by Democratic Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN Wednesday night.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN cast Dr. Maurice Howard in the role of Don Quixote and Dr. J. Phil Redgwick as Sancho Panza. He said they are "locking medical horns with nonexistent socialism and socialized medicine."

He reiterated previous declarations that the Truman health program is not socialized medicine.

GOP OPENS VOTER DRIVE—WILL COMB CITY TO GET ALL REGISTERED

Douglas County Republicans tonight will begin their drive to register more Omahans as voters.

Plans announced by Chairman William H. Thomas call for the most comprehensive approach yet taken by the Republicans.

So far, Mr. Thomas said, 703 volunteers are ready to go.

The plan is to make each volunteer responsible for a small area. Then each worker would be given a list of all persons registered in that area.

The workers, Mr. Thomas said, will call at every nonregistered home.

WILL CONSULT OTHERS

They also will try to visit all Republican-registered home dwellers to see if any members of the family have neglected to register.

The same approach will be used in the 10 days prior to the November 7 election to try to get out the vote.

First assignments and lists will be given out at an eighth ward meeting tonight. The lists have been copied at the election commissioner's office and are accurate up to October 1.

Volunteers also will receive Republican information to pass on to those they visit.

OTHER MEETINGS TO FOLLOW

Mr. Thomas said that in the past the Republicans have tried similar strategy for getting out the vote, but this is the first time it has been attempted on registration.

Other ward meetings will follow tonight's, with the last of the assignments probably being made next Wednesday night, he explained.

In the period ahead of this year's primary election Democratic machinery to boost registrations was rolling well before the Republicans woke up. But the GOP late drive was successful, and the efforts of the two parties, along with those of the nonpartisan President's round table, have brought a record registration.

WAR PARTY IS VOTE ISSUE—BUFFETT GIVES ANSWER TO O'SULLIVAN

Do you want a war party to stay in control of this Government?

That is the real issue this fall, HOWARD H. BUFFETT, Republican candidate for Second District Congressman, said in a speech Thursday night.

"In the last 33 years we have had three different Democratic Presidents," he asserted. "Each of them has involved us in a foreign war. Each of them solemnly promised peace."

Mr. BUFFETT answered two personal charges made by his opponent, Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN.

ANSWERS CHARGES

To the charge that on leaving his congressional office in Washington in 1948 he stripped it bare of pamphlets, former Congressman BUFFETT said he left the office in the same condition as did his predecessor, a Democrat.

All the pamphlets and booklets Mr. O'SULLIVAN wants easily can be had for the asking in Washington, Mr. BUFFETT said. He added: "One department has a stack 52 feet high."

Of the charge that he carried Victor E. Spittler on his pay roll, Mr. BUFFETT said many Congressmen keep one employe back home to aid constituents. Between 1943 and 1946, he said, Mr. Spittler did the work without pay.

SLAPS NEPOTISM

Mr. Spittler finally was paid an average of less than $125 a month over the period he was on the payroll, Mr. BUFFETT said, adding:

"But Mr. O'SULLIVAN didn't say anything to you about his practice of nepotism in his own office. Nor did he tell you that he put his son-in-law on his congressional payroll in 1949 starting at $269 per month.

"Mr. O'SULLIVAN's son-in-law is not a sleeper, but a singer, and went east to take singing lessons. Now that is enough of this sideshow. I promise we are going to keep such nonsense out of our campaign."

DOCTORS' GROUP EXPANDS ITS SCOPE

The healing arts committee is expanding again—this time to take in the entire Second Congressional District.

This was announced Friday by Dr. Maurice C. Howard, chairman.

The nonpartisan committee has as its aim the defeat of socialized medicine. It is working for election of HOWARD H. BUFFETT as Second District Congressman. It is opposed to Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN, the Democrat who supports the administration's health program.

Dr. J. Phil Redgwick, head of the nonpartisan doctors' division, said he has written the 38 physicians living outside Omaha in this congressional district.

He urged not only that they cooperate with the doctors' committee but also that they spearhead organizations in their own communities that would include members of all allied professions.

These outside groups all would be tied in with the central organization headquartering in the Medical Arts Building.

DOCTORS' BILLS HIT SOCIALISM—URGE CLIENTS TO VOTE FOR BUFFETT

At least 25,000 persons in the Omaha area received inserts with their doctor bills this month urging their support aganst socialized medicine.

Dr. Maurice C. Howard, head of the Second Congressional District Healing Arts Committee, said this Saturday:

"We have received an excellent reaction," said Dr. Howard. "Many persons have complimented us for our courage in sending out our stand on socialized medicine along with our bills."

ISSUE PUT SQUARELY

Dr. Howard said the only unfavorable reaction he personally received was in an anonymous letter. He said he is not even sure it was from one of his patients, because it discussed a case he did not handle.

Many of the inserts say:

"The issue of socialization has been put squarely before the people of our country. Legislation seeking to socialize medicine has been introduced to the present Congress and is now being held in committee.

"The present Congressman from this district (Democrat EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN), in a speech before Congress on March 13, 1950, took the position that he was in favor of the pending compulsory national health plan, which is socialization of your health.

BUFFETT OPPOSES PLAN

"'I am absolutely against it.' Former Congressman HOWARD H. BUFFETT is on record and has always worked against such socialistic legislation. May I suggest you vote for him?"

The note also tells where and when persons can register.

Dr. Howard said many physicians also are writing personal notes and letters to their patients as well as talking to them about the subject.

"Future mailings," he said, "will run much higher than the 25,000 sent the first time.

DOCTOR WARNS OF PENDING BILL—OMAHA PLEDGES FIGHT ON LEGISLATION

There is no doubt in the minds of the public that S. 1679, now pending in Congress, is socialized medicine, Dr. M. C. Howard asserted Thursday night.

"And the medical profession of Omaha and the Second Congressional District are determined to continue their fight against socialism and socialized medicine," he said.

Dr. Howard talked to 150 persons attending the second congressional district healing arts committee meeting in the Medical Arts Auditorium. This is the committee that supports Republican HOWARD H. BUFFETT and opposes Democrat EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN for Congress.

INCREASED TAXES

Socialized medicine, Dr. Howard explained, is "medical treatment provided or controlled by a government and subsidized by increased taxation."

S. 1679, introduced April 25, 1949, has been read twice and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, which is conducting hearings, Dr. Howard said.

Title 7 of this bill, he continued, would provide "for compulsory health insurance, politically controlled by the Federal Security Administrator."

The Security Administrator, he declared, would: "Set the rates, collect the tax, control the money, determine the availability of services, and generally dominate the patient and doctor in this program."

WHO PAYS?

"Who pays?" said Dr. Howard. "Every wage earner and self-employed person pays by forcible deduction a certain percent from his pay check.

"No benefits are guaranteed, but many political promises are made. The sponsors use such vague terms as 'when funds are available,' 'insofar as possible,' and 'when facilities permit.'

"Services could be restricted at the whim of the Administrators—but there is no tax limit.

"The only guarantee is a new payroll tax."

Other speakers and the subcommittees they represented are: John O'Brien, druggists; Mrs. Edith Laushman, nurses; Dr. J. Phil Redgwick, doctors; Dr. Elmer Bay, dentists; Dr. N. F. Nolan, optometrists; Dr. W. G. Wiseman, chiropodists; Miss Elizabeth Sallers, office secretaries; Miss Rita Gillespie, technicians.

Inventory Speculation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM B. WIDNALL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, a recent editorial in the New York Times follows:

INVENTORY SPECULATION

Last week we had occasion to comment approvingly on a communication directed by Chairman McCabe of the Federal Reserve Board to the member banks of the Reserve System. In this memorandum Mr. McCabe emphasized the need to screen loans carefully. "Commercial banks," he wrote, "should advise borrowers to avoid overstocking of inventories and to postpone unnecessary business expansion."

That editorial drew from one alert reader this comment:

"The Federal Reserve Board's purpose, apparently, is to discourage inventory speculation by businessmen. That, it seems to me, is a laudable objective. On the other hand, it is hardly surprising if the businessman finds himself a little bit at sea when two Departments of the Government appear to be giving two directly opposite kinds of advice. I recall reading in a trade publication recently of a statement by one Government economist to the general effect that inventories were 'a better speculation than gold.'"

Our reader's recollection is accurate. On November 1 the trade journal of the garment industry, Women's Wear, carried a statement by a well-known Government economist that encouraged businessmen in that industry, at least, to borrow up to the hilt to expand their inventories. The economist was Louis J. Paradiso, chief statistician of the Office of Business Economics. Mr. Paradiso was quoted as saying:

"Those inventories you're holding are as good as gold. They are better, in fact, if you can afford to carry them until about March of next year. Present price increases will look mild compared with what's likely to develop in the second quarter of 1951."

We agree with our reader that these two Government statements on inventories constitute a striking example of inconsistency. Yet who will say that, taken together, they are inconsistent with the administration's over-all policy to date with respect to inflation—namely, to be tough when being tough involves no political risk or inconvenience, and to look the other way at all other times?

"Inspiring Guide in the Conduct of Our Own Lives," a Tribute to Hon. Raymond S. McKeough

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BARRATT O'HARA
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, no one was more respected and beloved during the period of his distinguished service in this House than the Honorable Raymond S. McKeough from the district in Illinois which I have had the honor to represent in the Eighty-first Congress. As a member of the Maritime Commission he continued in equal measure to hold the great respect and deep affection of his associates and coworkers as well as to establish himself in the public opinion of the Nation as one of the great statesmen and towering forces of integrity in the public service.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues will be pleased and heartened to learn of a gathering of more than 100 men and women who had been associated with our former colleague in the important work of the Maritime Commission. They gathered in the offices of the International Claims Commission, of which Mr. McKeough now is a member, as a delegation representing the entire personnel of the old Maritime Commission to present to the Honorable Raymond S. McKeough a scroll on which was printed against the background of a Liberty vessel the following richly deserved tribute:

HON. RAYMOND S. MCKEOUGH

(Printed against the background of a Liberty vessel)

We, the friends and associates of the Honorable Raymond S. McKeough, of Chicago, Ill., who served as member, United States Maritime Commission from October 16, 1945, to May 23, 1950, when the Maritime Commission ceased to exist, do hereby dedicate this scroll to him in gratitude and warm affection, as an expression of the deep regard and admiration in which we hold him as a friend of the people and as a public servant of the finest type, whose integrity, concept of public duty, and ideals of fair play will remain with us as an inspiring guide in the conduct of our own lives.

Notwithstanding trying conditions and often in the thankless but vital role of the dissenter, never discouraged and always strengthened by his fine sense of humor, he ably and courageously served the United States Government and the American merchant marine.

May he long continue in good health and happiness to serve our country.

Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, the Padre of the Good Neighbor Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES J. DELANEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I would like to present a report on the record of my friend, Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, associate editor of Americas. It would appear, from this report, that my friend has acted as an apostle of good will and friendship, especially in the Western Hemisphere.

The report follows:

DR. JOSEPH F. THORNING, THE PADRE OF THE GOOD NEIGHBOR POLICY

Dr. Joseph F. Thorning is the product of a New England mother and a Viking father. The former came from Springfield, Mass., while the latter, Mr. C. M. Thorning, now hale and hearty at the age of 80, worked as a shipbuilder on several boats that still sail the Great Lakes.

Born at Milwaukee, Wis., on April 25, 1896, Joseph Francis Thorning received his early education at Marquette Academy, Holy Cross College, and St. Louis University. While at St. Louis, Dr. Thorning was invited to prepare a series of articles on international friendship for the national review, America. This series led to his election as chairman of the Europe committee of the Catholic Association for International Peace. This group published Dr. Thorning's studies, in collaboration with Prof. Parker Thomas Moon, of Columbia University, on National Security and International Peace. Shortly thereafter, in 1931, Joseph F. Thorning was awarded a doctorate in sociology, economics, and political science by the Catholic University of America. His doctoral dissertation, Religious Liberty in Transition, is regarded as a classic book of reference, according to Carlton J. H. Hayes, formerly Seth Low professor of history in Columbia University and wartime ambassador to Spain.

In 1931, Dr. Thorning, now associate editor of the quarterly, Thought, was asked to serve as European correspondent of America and as special correspondent of the NCWC news service.

These assignments took Dr. Thorning to the United Kingdom, where he developed his interest in international studies at Oxford University, under the direction of Sir Alfred Zimmern. Another of his friends at Oxford was Francis de Zulueta, regius professor of civil law. He also exchanged views with Father Martin D'Arcy, celebrated Thomistic scholar at Oxford.

Oxford University furnished a splendid headquarters for research and writing with the opportunity to make frequent excursions to European centers of learning. Among the universities which Dr. Thorning visited were the Sorbonne, the University of Salamanca, the University of Fribourg (Switzerland), Munich, Bonn, and Heidelberg. At Geneva Dr. Thorning was invited by officials of the National Broadcasting Co. to give a trans-Atlantic address, a novelty at that time, on the so-called World Disarmament Conference. One of his associates on this program was Judge Michael Francis Doyle, now chairman of the electoral college of the United States. In this period, Dr. Thorning acted as a special contributor to the Commonweal.

Returning to this country, Dr. Thorning was appointed special lecturer on sociology and acting dean of the Graduate School in Georgetown University by the Very Reverend W. Coleman Nevils, S. J., one of the most famous presidents of Georgetown. It was at Georgetown that Dr. Thorning began his series of conferences with Father Edmund A. Walsh, regent of the School of Foreign Service. As a result, these two intellectuals, Dr. Thorning and Dr. Walsh, have often been described as "the two leaders who for 20 years understood the nature of the Soviet Union and the mentality of the Soviet hierarchy." When Father Walsh was asked by the general of the Jesuits to prepare a volume on the cause and cure of Marxism, he entrusted the pivotal first chapter of the positive side of this study to Dr. Thorning. In this chapter Joseph F. Thorning explained the celebrated papal encyclical, Forty Years After, by His Holiness, Pius XI.

While at Georgetown, Dr. Thorning formed his friendships with Ambassador J. H. Jefferson Caffery (first career diplomat to hold the blue ribbon post at Paris, France); Ambassador Walter Joseph Donnelly, who has had brilliant service in many American republics, including Brazil, Colombia, Cuba, Peru, Costa Rica, and Venezuela; and the Honorable H. Freeman Matthews, now United States Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs.

In 1937, by appointment from his excellency the Most Reverend Michael J. Curley, archbishop of Baltimore and Washington, Dr. Thorning became chairman of the department of social studies in Mount St. Mary's College, Maryland, and professor of ethics in Mount St. Mary's Major Seminary. At this post, he wrote the well-known monograph A Primer of Social Justice, with a preface by Archbishop Curley.

In May 1938, at Budapest, Hungary, it was reported in the New York Times that Dr. Thorning established a world record by broadcasting, over the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co., the story of the International Eucharistic Congress, in seven languages. Then, as in 1937, Dr. Thorning visited all the battlefields in the Spanish civil war, interviewing leaders on both sides. When he returned to the United States, Dr. Thorning was described by Archbishop Curley as one of the greatest authorities in the Nation today on Spanish affairs.

Once more in Europe in the summer of 1939, the Maryland educator traveled throughout the Balkans. World War II broke out while Dr. Thorning was a guest of the Bishop of Nice on the French Riviera. Upon his return to America, he predicted the fall of Adolf Hitler. Years previously, in a series of articles in America, Dr. Thorning had furnished the first systematic, scientific exposé of Hitler and nazism (1931). Indeed, his piece on Five Years of Hitlerism had been featured by the Religious Press Service and the National Conference of Christians and Jews in 1938. Upon the conclusion of the Spanish civil war in 1939, he was awarded the rank of knight commander in the Order of Isabella the Catholic. His articles on Spain and other European countries had been publicized from Bombay, India, to Brisbane, Australia. One result was that the Historical and Geographic Institute of Brazil, upon the death of Prof. Percy Alvin Martin of Stanford University, unanimously elected Dr. Thorning as its one honorary fellow in the United States. At the same time, he was nominated as a director of the American Peace Society and a fellow of the American Geographic Society.

Throughout the summer of 1941, Dr. Thorning served as director of the first inter-American seminar to South America, with headquarters at the University of San Marcos, Lima, Peru. The next year, he established inter-American seminars at the National University of Mexico and the University of Habana, Cuba. One result was a unique distinction: Dr. Thorning was awarded the honorary degree, doctor of divinity, by the Catholic University of Chile, a pontifical institution. It was the first award of its kind to a North American. Simultaneously, the Republic of Ecuador conferred its national decoration, the Order of Merit. This decoration was given at the hands of His Excellency, Galo Plaza, then Ambassador and now President of the Republic.

For seven consecutive years Dr. Thorning has been invited by the United States Congress to deliver the invocation to start Pan-American Day in the Capitol. On these occasions, he has been described by the Senators and Representatives as a great American and a man of God. He likewise was asked to give the prayer in the Congress in connection with the visits of His Excellency, President Eurico Gaspar Dutra, of Brazil, and of His Excellency, President Gabriel González Videla, of Chile. Frequent reference to Dr. Thorning's addresses and articles is made in the United States Senate and in the United States House of Representatives. Naturally enough, he is a trusted friend of the Honorable Edward G. Miller, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, as well as of the Honorable Thomas G. Mann, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for the same section.

In February 1948 Dr. Thorning was a guest of the Republic of Venezuela for the inauguration of Don Rómulo Gallegos in Caracas. Recently, the Venezuelan Government, through its able Ambassador in Washington, Dr. José Rafael Pocaterra, has announced that former Postmaster General James A. Farley and Dr. Thorning will be awarded the national decoration, Francisco de Miranda, founded in honor of the precursor of South American independence. In the meantime, Dr. Thorning has been promoted in the Order of Isabella the Catholic from the rank of knight commander to that of supreme officer, with the grand cross.

As associate editor of World Affairs, Dr. Thorning has his offices in the Capital. His book reviews are a feature of both the Americas and World Affairs. Furthermore, he has just completed the manuscript of a new book to be entitled "Miranda: World Citizen." This has an introduction by President Galo Plaza, of Ecuador, and a preface from the pen of the Honorable Sumner Welles, former United States Under Secretary of State. Mr. Welles and Dr. Thorning often exchange views on Central and South America.

As a guest of the Secretary of the Navy, the Honorable Francis P. Matthews, Dr. Thorning made the midshipman cruise to Europe on the battleship, U. S. S. Missouri, flagship of Task Force 61. In this capacity he was invited by Rear Adm. Allan E. Smith, United States Navy, commander of the task force, to preside as chairman at the daily 2-hour seminar on conditions in France, the United Kingdom, Belgium, the Netherlands, Italy, and the Iberian Peninsula. When the Missouri and other ships in the task force held an official commemoration at sea of the Japanese surrender anniversary, Dr. Thorning, by unanimous choice of officers and men, was invited to give the benediction.

In February 1950, as a guest of the Republic of Haiti, Dr. Thorning attended the international exposition celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the capital, Port-au-Prince.

On June 19, 1950, at colorful ceremonies near the Organization of American States, Dr. Thorning gave the invocation, dedicating the beautiful bronze figure of José Gervasio Artigas, champion of Uruguayan independence. This program, heard on the Voice of America, included speeches by Ambassador Alberto Dominguez Cámpora, of Uruguay; Dr. Alberto Lleras Camargo, secretary general of the Organization of American States; and the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson. Few inter-American functions are complete without his presence.

Plight of Nonsubsidized Air Carriers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM B. WIDNALL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, today I received a letter from Mr. Ralph Cox, Jr., president of Ocean Air Tradeways, which helps to point up the plight of the nonsubsidized air carriers. This is only one example of many cases existing in America today and the American people should be made aware of what has taken place.

Many veterans of World War II at the termination of hostilities were encouraged to buy Government surplus cargo and passenger planes and enter the air-transport and cargo-carrying fields. They did so without subsidies and pioneered new services and in many cases new routes of travel. Once it was seen they were able to make a go of their operation and develop successfully new methods of service, they became prey for attack and control by others who were interested in seeing them removed from a competitive field.

Under leave to extend my remarks, the letter received by me is included in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

OCEAN AIR TRADEWAYS,
New York, N. Y., December 5, 1950.

The Honorable WILLIAM B. WIDNALL,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WIDNALL: This company is an independent nonsubsidized air carrier, also known by the rather uncomplimentary designation by the Civil Aeronautics Board, as a large irregular air carrier.

We are a veterans' group composed of former military aviation personnel and we started commercial flight operations in March 1946 carrying passengers between New York and Miami.

During the last 4 years we have managed to perform a public service carrying passengers and cargo, domestically and overseas, at rates considerably below the scheduled airlines, but within the financial reach of many thousands who could not otherwise afford air transportation. Our operation in the past and present has been and is in strict accordance with the CAA safety regulations.

This company has the dubious distinction of having been served with the first Federal court injunction preventing its transportation of passengers overseas between the United States and foreign countries as an independent air carrier.

American financial aid to the extent of several hundred thousand dollars, however, was recently given to a French nonscheduled airline in Paris, known as TAI. In other words, our tax money is used to harass and persecute free American enterprise through bureaucratic enforcement agencies, and at the same time subsidize, not only our equivalent nonscheduled air carriers in foreign countries, but also the large scheduled foreign air carriers which seriously compete with the American scheduled carriers, necessitating even greater subsidies to them.

History does not show that Great Britain, during the past century at the zenith of her merchant marine power, so lavishly and recklessly donated surface craft to foreigners to compete with herself as America has done in the field of air transportation.

We, of the so-called nonscheduled air industry, desire no favors, no subsidies, no kind words, or no help from the United States Government; our heritage, our Constitution, and our successful American free-enterprise system entitles us to unmolested economic freedom in pursuing success in this new field which is so badly in need of unhampered pioneering development.

United States Air Force recent statistics show that 40 percent of the reserve air strength in the United States lies within the nonscheduled air carriers who are now faced with the latest CAB directive limiting their flights between two points to three trips per month. During the last 6 months the CAB has permanently put out of business, by cancellation of their operating certificates and letters of registration, dozens of our fellow carriers, some because they operated too frequently, others because they did not operate frequently enough, and still others because they did not have aircraft available since they had been forced to liquidate or lease out their planes for fear of violating the CAB restriction known as the "frequency and regularity" ruling.

Congress never intended the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 to be twisted in its application to discriminate between American citizens the way the Civil Aeronautics Board has done. Actually the act charges the Civil Aeronautics Board with the responsibility to develop American air transportation to the highest possible degree for the benefit of all American citizens, primarily stressing national defense. It would seem that the Board's intentions are just the opposite.

In spite of these many economic sanctions and road-blocks hurled at the nonscheduled industry by its own Government, it was able to throw into the pool of badly needed aircraft for the Korean airlift over 30 four-engine long-range overseas combination passenger and cargo C-54 aircraft with completely trained operating and maintenance personnel. One of Ocean Air Tradeways' aircraft, NC-68736, a C-54, few 523 hours in one 30-day period between Japan and the United States, shattering all known records, both military and civilian.

Since our only recourse to prevent annihilation of this industry by the Government is through legislative action, it is therefore urgently requested that you support H. R. 9184, without amendment, the air mail subsidy separation bill, to prevent further growth of subsidized monopoly and let the people know how much they pay for transportation of their air mail and how much they pay for subsidy which goes to support powerful lobbies and wasteful uneconomic air operations, which serve a chosen few rather than all the voters. This bill is directly in keeping with the Hoover report recommendations for better government.

Respectfully yours,

OCEAN AIR TRADEWAYS,
RALPH COX, JR., President.

Further Smear Campaign of Omaha Doctors as Publicized by the Omaha World-Herald

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, part nine, a continuation of the Omaha doctors "lie and smear" campaign is as follows:

[From the Omaha World-Herald of October 18, 1950]

POLITICAL FOES HOLDING FIRE—BUFFETT, O'SULLIVAN ON SAME PROGRAM

Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN and his Republican opponent, HOWARD H. BUFFETT, appeared on the same platform Tuesday, but stayed clear of direct attacks on each other.

In the question period, Mr. O'SULLIVAN denied he is for socialized medicine.

He said: "There isn't a doctor this side of the hot place who can show me where I was ever for socialized medicine or a compulsory health program.

"There is no bill for socialized medicine now in Congress, and there never will be."

NEVER ACHIEVE PEACE

Mr. O'SULLIVAN argued that he always had been against socialized medicine, and that "I refuse to take the issue now." He said he called the doctors evil old men only "because they lied about me."

Mr. BUFFETT, who left before the O'SULLIVAN remarks, stressed two points:

1. The Democratic Party has never been able to achieve peace.

2. It has shown terrifying inability to remove subversive elements from government.

Through all history, he said, the great enemy of freedom of the individual has been big government.

[From the Omaha World-Herald of October 22, 1950]

REPUBLICANS GOT DOCTORS—O'SULLIVAN AGAIN FIRES SHARP WORDS

(By Harold Andersen)

NEBRASKA CITY, NEBR.—Second District Congressman EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN, of Omaha, declared Friday night that old reactionary Republicans have got doctors to spearhead the campaign against him.

Addressing a Democratic rally, Mr. O'SULLIVAN declared:

"I'm against socialized medicine and compulsory health insurance, and I've said it and said it until I'm sick of saying it.

"But they (doctors) won't believe me."

TELL LIES

Mr. O'SULLIVAN said any one who tells a lie is evil, and "that's why I called them (doctors) evil men."

He is against compulsory health insurance, he said, because it would duplicate many insurance policies now in force. He said he is for only seven sections of President Truman's national health bill.

The Democratic candidate said he tried to appear before a doctors' meeting to tell of his opposition to socialized medicine and compulsory health insurance, but declared "old seven-hundred-dollar-a-day-plus Fouts" opposed his appearance.

BUFFETT REACTIONARY

This apparently was a reference to money received by Dr. Roy Fouts of Omaha for X-raying prospective draftees.

Doctors are so cheap, Mr. O'SULLIVAN said, that rather than use letters with 3-cent stamps, they are enclosing literature against him with their bills.

Of his Republican opponent, former Representative HOWARD BUFFETT, of Omaha, Mr. O'SULLIVAN said:

"He was the most reactionary man that was ever in Congress."

HE'S TERRIBLE

"He's not for the farmer, he's not for the veterans, he's not for labor. He's terrible."

He said that Mr. BUFFETT while in Congress allowed the reactionary Committee for Constitutional Government to use his free mailing privilege to distribute 100,000 copies of an antilabor speech.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN also rapped the World-Herald as the most reactionary newspaper west of the Chicago Tribune.

DOSEK OPTOMISTIC

"I assure you I need your help," he told the crowd.

Walter R. Raecke, Democratic candidate for Governor, did not address the meeting. He was attending the Ak-Sar-Ben coronation at Omaha.

Edward A. Dosek, Lincoln, candidate for lieutenant governor, told the rally:

"I think all Democrats will be elected this year."

[From the World-Herald of October 22, 1950]

DOCTOR RAPS AT O'SULLIVAN—CAUGHT IN ANOTHER, HOWARD ASSERTS

Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN has been caught in another one, Dr. M. C. Howard, chairman of the Second Congressional District Healing Arts Committee, asserted Saturday.

Said Dr. Howard:

"This makes twice in 1 week.

"O'SULLIVAN said last Tuesday there is no socialized medicine bill pending before Congress. We showed that S. 1679, embodying the President's program, is now pending before Congress.

"Friday in Nebraska City, O'SULLIVAN said that he is against compulsory health insurance because it would duplicate many insurance policies now in force and that he is for only seven sections of President Truman's health bill."

SEVENTH VITAL

"How many sections or titles, as they are called, are in the President's bill? Exactly seven."

It is that seventh section that is all-important, said Dr. Howard.

THE BILL AT A GLANCE—S. 1679, H. R. 4312, 4313

Its seven titles provide aid to—

1. Train more doctors, dentists, nurses, hospital administrators, and others.

2. Advance medical research (diabetes, arthritis, rheumatism, etc.).

3. Expand hospital building programs.

4. Help rural and other shortage areas; assist farmers' experimental health cooperatives.

5. Expand State and local public health services;

6. Increase State maternal, child health, and crippled children's services; and

7. National health insurance to cover your medical bills.

Dr. Howard's exhibit from the pamphlet Mr. O'SULLIVAN circulated * * * shows seven sections in the President's national health bill.

"It is the one that provides for compulsory health insurance which O'SULLIVAN said he opposes," Dr. Howard declared. "It is compulsory because there would be payroll deductions for every one and because the Federal Security Administrator directs the entire program."

As for the other six sections Dr. Howard said they follow the pattern the doctors themselves have set.

ALREADY PROVIDED

"The American Medical Association through its 12-point program and the Nebraska State Medical Association through its eight-point program have cooperated in having most of this already enacted—better maternal and child programs, cancer detection and research, extensive polio research and treatment, etc.," Dr. Howard said.

Dr. Howard continued: "O'SULLIVAN also might be interested in knowing that a recent survey showed that 90 percent of the employed groups in Omaha already are insured for health and medical care.

COSTLY DUPLICATION

"The Government program would only be a more costly duplication of the same service and every one would have to pay for it."

Residents of the Second Congressional District should know, Dr. Howard said, that last year Mr. O'SULLIVAN sent out in franked envelopes 5,000 letters and pamphlets advocating the President's health program.

"These pamphlets," said Dr. Howard, "were prepared and made available by a well known left-wing organization—The Committee for the Nation's Health."

A cartoon preceded the following wording which showed a doctor on a bicycle pedaling down a line of numbered patients with their mouths open taking their temperature and commanding, "Say ah-h-h."

Socialized medicine will result in mass medical treatment—the treatment of your illness is not a mass proposition.

[From the Omaha World-Herald]

DOCTORS USE LAUGH APPEAL—CARTOONS EMPLOYED TO ELECT BUFFETT

The nonpartisan doctors committee also is taking to the lighter side in trying to defeat socialized medicine through electing HOWARD H. BUFFETT to Congress.

It is the cartoon approach.

Many doctors have purchased a series of signs for display in their offices. There also is a little booklet entitled "Who Laughs Last?" that tells a picture story.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Dr. J. Phil Redgwick, committee chairman, explains: "Sure there are a lot of laughs, but there i also a serious message.

"Our volunteer workers are mimeographing copies of the cartoons and they will be on display in the waiting rooms of doctors and dentists and available for others who want the series."

One cartoon for example, shows a man with a large stomach who has just been through the line under the socialized medicine program. On his stomach is stamped: "Government inspected."

Czech Council's Chicanery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include the following article which appeared in the December 2 issue of America, national Catholic weekly, entitled "Czech Council's Chicanery":

CZECH COUNCIL'S CHICANERY

In offering editorial endorsement of the Crusade for Freedom, America (September 16, p. 618) expressed its concern that the officers of the National Committee for Free Europe, Inc., the organization sponsoring the crusade, "have been dismayingly slow in realizing that in Eastern and Central Europe they are dealing with peoples whose culture is rooted in religion and, in large measure, shaped by Catholicism." Now that the crusade is over and all who managed to find a freedom scroll have affirmed their belief in divinely bestowed human rights and pledged themselves to resist aggression and tyranny everywhere, let us look at the Free Europe Committee again. It is worth looking at. It has been entrusted by the State Department with the high responsibility of shepherding the groups of political exiles from the iron-curtain countries who constitute informal governments in exile. Living in those countries are 55,000,000 Catholics, one-seventh of the total membership of the church.

The officers of the Free Europe Committee, all genial, if superannuated, gentlemen, will undoubtedly be distressed by any reference to religion. They were disturbed when America pointed out (July 29, p. 438) that the musical theme chosen to introduce the first broadcast to Czechoslovakia by their transmitter, Radio Free Europe, was the official hymn of the Czechoslovak National Church, a hymn without significance except for its religious tendentiousness, a church without significance except for its political purpose—a purpose revived today by the Soviets—to destroy Catholicism.

It will then, admittedly, distress the gentlemen of the Free Europe Committee to learn that the supplement to Report on Czechoslovakia, No. 14, published by their research and information center, offers a chummy comparison of Catholicism and communism as equal instruments of intellectual ensiavement. Edited by Dr. Miloslav Kohac, former chief of the Czech National Socialist Press in Prague, an agency of a persistently pro-Soviet political party, the Report complains that the Communist ideology has put the Czech tongue and its users in a mental deep freeze: "The stereotyping of expressions makes all thinking easier and obscures it, so that it excludes thinking altogether." Dr. Kohac thinks his point might be made clearer by example, so he continues: "This is in imitation of the Catholic method." He is referring to the historic method by which Catholics—and, indeed, many Protestants—learn their faith, the question-and-answer method of the catechism. It is a stultifying method of imposing deceptions, in Dr. Kohac's view: "He [the Catholic believer] has no notion of his own on the subject; he only accepts the illusion which has been laid down for him."

The National Committee for Free Europe cannot disavow responsibility for such abusive talk, the single result (and purpose?) of which is to alienate Catholics in America and—more important—behind the iron curtain. The NCFE's supervisory (and subsidizing) role empowers it to effect changes in the Council for Free Czechoslovakia, a group claiming to represent all democratic political forces in exile but in reality a clique of central European anticlerical, dogmatic Marxists, opposed (currently) to communism but pledged to perpetuate the frantic—and futile—nineteenth century fight against religion in its institutional form and social effects.

A special correspondent of the New York Times, beginning a four article survey on October 4 of the iron curtain political forces in exile, innocently reported general admiration for the unity and harmony in the Czech council. Within the week, on October 9, Joseph Lettrich, representing Slovakia, one of the two partner nations in the council, had resigned. Stormy but inconclusive meetings of the executive board were held on November 4–6 and 18 to see whether the National Socialist clique could continue to pose as a government in exile. There is no reason to doubt their arrogant ability—nor the Free Europe Committee's continuing gullibility.

The National Socialist clique has succeeded in denying trade-union and agrarian interests any influential voice in the Council. It has succeeded in keeping off the Council the elected representatives of the Christian Democratic group, elected by the Catholic People's Party in exile.

What is the source of the influence that can promptly produce docile politicos, radio entertainers, and comforting companions who play the National Socialist game? How account for the easy arrival of Dr. Ladislav Feierabend, an economist posing as a peasant leader, whose declared mission is to destroy politicelly Dr. Josef Cerny, a Catholic, head of the Agrarian Party and heir to the strongest party in Czechoslov kia?

After the last war many Americans noted with surprise that the countries liberated from the Nazi tyranny chose Christian Democratic Parties to lead them. It should not have been surprising: Christianity is the mold and mind of European civilization. After Eastern Europe is liberated from Soviet tyranny, like forces of Christian Democratic inspiration will come to the fore. Why, then, should America short-sightedly place its main bets on discredited, non-Communist socialism as "the wave of the future"?

At the close of their annual meeting on November 19, the 180 Catholic bishops of the United States declared: "It is of primary importance for our people to realize that human freedom derives from the spiritual nature of man and can only flourish where the things of the spirit are held in reverence. Our present principles of action need to be evaluated in the light of that truth." Accepting the Liberty Bell at Independence, Mo., on November 6, President Truman likewise affirmed: "Our concept of freedom has religious roots." Copies of the President's speech should have been delivered to the State Department—and to its annex, the National Committee for Free Europe, Inc.

"Scare Words" Index

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that during the next few years the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the Members of Congress will have occasion to hear many gravely spoken scare words which in reality will be as false as the hair on some people's heads or the teeth in the mouths of some people.

In order that the splendid information passed out by the Democratic National Committee relative to the utterances of "scare words" and authorship may be perpetuated for other readers and lawmakers, I wish to present the following index of "scare words" for publication in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

"Scare words" index

Following is an index of material contained in the "scare words" document. This recap gives the when, what, and who of the statements in short form so that you can find them in the book when you need them for speeches or other causes.

Internal Security Bill of 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and to include therein a letter which I recently wrote to a friend explaining my opposition to the Internal Security Act of 1950. The letter is as follows:

DEAR FRIEND: I am glad to send you the following analysis of my opposition to the Internal Security Act of 1950.

First let me say that no vote I cast in Congress has ever put party above country. My vote on the anti-Red bill was in no sense a partisan vote.

I regard this bill to be so bad, so dangerous, so thoroughly unconstitutional, so very unwise, unsound, and ill-advised that I had no other choice than to vote against it.

Lord knows, no one in the Congress has been more active, energetic, vigorous, or more outspoken, not infrequently the position of party notwithstanding, against the Communists than I have been.

But it is a misnomer to call this bill a Communist-control bill. It might well be better termed a thought-control bill, or an opinion-suppression bill, or a belief-stifling bill. In my opinion, it would help rather than hurt the Communists. It is opposed by all our Government intelligence agencies which state that the bill would seriously damage the security and intelligence operations for which they are responsible.

Here are just a few reasons why I voted against this bill:

1. It requires the publication of a complete list of vital defense plants, laboratories, and other installations and thus serves notice on our potential enemies where these essential services are located. This provision is absolutely indefensible. Of itself, it would warrant opposition to the bill.

2. It compels the Department of Justice and FBI, in order to carry out its unworkable registration provisions, to waste valuable time, energy, and money and disclose sources of information which are invaluable in the war against internal communism and efforts to protect the national security.

3. It prevents the great assistance we now receive from many aliens regarding intelligence operations.

4. It destroys the long-established American principle of asylum for political refugees. It would bar public men, businessmen, and students from admission to the United States on visits from Spain and several other nations with similar government, thus antagonizing governments that are presently friendly to us.

5. It facilitates the naturalization of subversive aliens.

6. It gives to Government officials almost unlimited power to control and restrict and prohibit the exercise of free speech, opinion, belief, and conscience and would enable them to harass sincere citizens for the mere expression of their views. In this country we punish men for their crimes and not for their thoughts which this bill seeks to do.

7. It would require the Attorney General to assume the impossible task of producing concrete legal evidence that men have particular ideas or opinions. Under this provision sincere and honest persons striving to ameliorate sweatshops, promote the public health or housing legislation might well be brought under the broad sweep of this measure.

As I stated substantially in my House speech this bill is patterned after the totalitarian police slave state and, in principle, is hostile to the spirit and letter of the American Constitution and, in fact, repugnant to our free institutions.

It would be aimed at men like you and me who are never afraid to speak out our minds and some bureaucrat in Washington could very easily, under its terms, move to take punitive action against us if they should disagree with our expressions of opinion or belief. You can appreciate that such a latitude would enable such a bureaucrat to conduct witch hunts, star-chamber proceedings, lettres caches, and every other type of unconstitutional indignity upon men and women intent upon serving the Nation.

We have on the statute books laws against treason, espionage, sabotage, advocacy of overthrow of government by force and violence. Perhaps they need strengthening in some particulars. I am anxious to strengthen them, if necessary. But first I want to see existing laws along these lines enforced vigorously, impartially, and fearlessly. I want to see Communists and Communist sympathizers driven out of the Government and out of high places in American political, industrial, educational, and social life. But, in my opinion, we cannot and must not place restraints upon free expression of opinion and belief. Such a course would be to play into the hands of our enemies by negativing the democratic forms and embracing the very totalitarian forms we seek to defeat.

It is estimated by the Department of Justice that it will require at least 4 years to effect the registration of Communists and, of course, many will escape because they will be constantly resigning from the Communist Party, going underground, changing the names of their organizations, and the like. To work this out administratively presents a colossal and impracticable task. I doubt that it can be done at all in any satisfactory way.

This measure would put the Government into the business of thought control and opinion control. It would suppress the free press and the free dissemination of literature so vital to democracy. It would require the Attorney General to deport any alien running a well stocked bookshop containing books on government and economics, politics and sociology written by Spaniards, Yugoslavians, certain South American citizens, and others. In its restriction of Russian literature it would be doing irreparable damage to our own intellectual life and the growth and spread of vital information necessary to an understanding of the purposes, aims, and activities of Marxian communism. To complete the job of tearing down our structure of free thought and free press and free individual activity under the Constitution we should only have to resort to the Hitlerian mass destruction by burning all books and literature emanating from Communist circles, or explaining Communist doctrines. Such a result would be the complete negation of our freedom, and a total surrender to a febrile national hysteria.

There are other provisions concerning naturalization and immigration which I will not discuss in detail but which are equally obnoxious to thoughtful Americans who respect the Constitution.

I hope you will study this bill carefully. If you do so, you will conclude, I think, as I have, that it is one of the most dangerous measures ever presented to the American Congress. I had no choice but to oppose it, and I am very proud that I did, even though I stood alone among the Congressmen from New England.

With usual regards and good wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP J. PHILBIN.

End Irish Partition Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, to include therein an excellent article on the military implications of the partition of Ireland by Mr. Samuel Crawford. It appeared in the November issue of the Catholic Home Weekly, Ave Maria.

This is a very thoughtful, penetrating analysis of the whole question of partition and it effectively points up the desirability of uniting the Irish now, not only because this is morally, politically, and militarily desirable, but also because it will contribute so much to unified defense of Western Europe.

I hope and urge that our Government will soon take action concerning this vital question and move to impress upon the Government of Great Britain the urgency of establishing unity, amicable relations and wholehearted cooperation between all segments of the Irish people based on democratic principles. Our British friends should be advised that we expect them to cooperate with us in marshalling all our resources and strengthening all our allies in order successfully to oppose the Communist threat to the free world.

It is somewhat inconsistent that the British Government should recognize Red China, whose armed forces are presently slaughtering American boys in Korea, and at the same time refuse to move to unify and strengthen the noble Irish Nation, whose sons and descendants in such overwhelming numbers have stood so gallantly and at such great cost and sacrifice, by the cause of freedom whenever it has been assailed. It is very difficult for Americans to understand the British viewpoint in any event, nor can we understand the viewpoint of many of our so-called friends and allies. They talk ad infinitum in the United Nations about freedom, democracy, and the other attributes of the free way of life. They vote to check aggression and to accept the leadership of American arms in enforcing the decrees and orders of the United Nations but, when the chips are down, and real sacrifices are at hand, they send very little help.

I hope that there will be a change in this attitude and that henceforth we can rely upon Britain and our other friends and allies to join more wholeheartedly with us in our efforts to stem the ominous tides of communism and disruption which are sweeping across the earth. An immediate ending of the partition of Ireland would be an excellent way for them to begin a genuine policy of cooperation and effective support of democratic aims. The above-mentioned article by Mr. Crawford, follows:

THE PARTITION OF IRELAND

(By Samuel Crawford)

In the United States Senate on July 31, Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE advocated American mediation between Ireland and her neighbor, Great Britain. Ireland, the Senator reminded, was an Atlantic nation "possessing strategic terrain and valuable manpower." Senator LODGE declared that the United States "should use its good offices to promote whatever adjustments are necessary between Ireland and Spain and their neighbors, so that they can help the rest of the non-Communist world." In the case of Ireland the problem to be adjusted is, of course, partition, by which six counties of northeast Ireland are cut off from the rest of Ireland and still occupied by Britain.

Let it be noted at once that partition, this source of grave international friction, exists in an area of peculiar sensitivity, an area that, strategically speaking, has been called part of the United States. This global concept of national territory has been enunciated with soldierly directness by the chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, Gen. Omar Bradley. He was asked, "What now constitutes the United States of America in defense terms?" "The reply to this question was definite and quotable, says Wythe Williams in the Birmingham (Alabama) News of June 13, 1950. "Here is the reply as outlined by the chairman of the Joint Chiefs:

"'In defense terms, the United States of America now embraces Japan, the Philippines, Alaska, Greenland, all of North, Central, and South America, the islands of the Caribbean, Western Europe, England, Ireland, and the Azores. Over this vast portion of the world the responsibility of guardianship is now largely in our hands'."

Since the Korean crisis the number of responsible newspaper columnists who have seen the inherent fallaciousness of partition as a solution in Korea has been on the increase. Said Dorothy Thompson in the Evening Star (Washington, D. C.) for July 15, 1950: "We are ostensibly fighting to * * * drive the North Koreans behind the thirty-eighth parallel, thus reestablishing the untenable status quo which made the aggression possible."

For years eminent Catholic churchmen have left no doubt as to where they consider right lies as regards the partition of the historic Irish nation. For example, His Excellency the Most Reverend Richard J. Cushing, D. D., archbishop of Boston, said in his cathedral last year: "Ireland is destined to be totally united and completely free. The policy of attempting to divide the Irish nation—the policy of artificially splitting for political purposes a people whom God has united on every other level—is one of the mistakes which all the logic of peace, security, and good order will speedily correct." Again the same archbishop, on August 3 this year, declared: "The Irish people, wherever they may be, are the champions of Christianity in a world menaced by Asiatic communism. * * * The end of partition will bring a breath of hope to enslaved nations everywhere" (Boston, Mass., Herald, August 4, 1950).

Among non-Catholic ecclesiastics a bishop of the German Evangelical Church, Bishop Otto Dibelius, has also brought us back firmly to first principles. Referring to the Korean War, Bishop Dibelius stated at Toronto: "People must realize that it is impossible to divide a nation by unnatural frontiers or an iron curtain. Such a country will always desire to come together again and be united."

The New York Times of July 13, 1950, reported Bishop Dibelius' statement under the opposite captions: "Bishop sees Korea as lesson for UN—Dibelius finds German picture exactly comparable with nation too long divided." It will be ironic if the public in the democratic countries eventually come to realize the evils of the 5-year-long partition in Germany and take steps to reunite it but fail to realize the evils of the 30-year-long partition of Ireland. That would be a strange though not unusual inconsistency.

The sands are running out. We are getting perilously close to the date when world war III will rip across the world like a knife through silk. If the problem of partition is not settled peacefully around the council table while there is time to talk it may be too late to settle it so for a long time. The consequences of continued delay will not be merely paper injustice. At the very best they will be—

1. For the loyal Nationalists of northeast Ireland: continued oppression in the British police state under the British flag;

2. For Ireland as a whole: internal stress and friction with the nearest neighbor, Great Britain;

3. For the western democracies as a whole: the loss of Ireland's cooperation in actual warfare—the absence of a unified Ireland's full cooperation in defense and attack—the lack of what Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE recently called strategic terrain and valuable manpower.

Selective indignation can be very misleading. It is selective indignation which causes so many well-intentioned people to turn a blind eye to tyranny in one place, while campaigning vigorously and with much citing of scripture against tyranny elsewhere. German totalitarianism was vanquished in World War II—with the assistance of Russian totalitarianism. A blind eye was turned in that direction and the obvious lesson regarding Soviet capabilities and intentions was not drawn from the assassination of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. For these other countries were in the Russian sphere of influence. One must not ask awkward questions. And now Russian totalitarianism threatens the world with world war III. The six-county police state with its Special Powers Acts is, forsooth, in the British sphere of influence. Is the attitude of the great democracy of the West (which to its everlasting credit still recognizes diplomatically the countries of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania) to be one of nonintervention so far as Ireland is concerned? Are we just to shrug our shoulders in polite aloofness? Such an attitude is hardly in keeping with the crusading zeal of a great nation which has the will and the way to show practically that it loves justice and hates iniquity.

It may not be out of place to go back to first principles. I have contended that it will make for concord and peace among the nations if Ireland is reunited. Expediency counsels judicious intervention by an honest broker such as the United States, in the interests of world peace. But this should not blind the detached observer to the fact that the case for the unification of Ireland rests also on principle. If a pickpocket swipes John Doe's billfold any honest citizen may possibly chase after him for the sound reason that as long as the criminal is at large he is a general source of trouble to the neighborhood—no one knows whose turn it will be next. But do not blame John Doe if he gets active not on general altruistic grounds but for the particular selfish purpose of getting back his own property. After all, he has a right to his own property in strict justice.

If John Doe impetuously shouts "stop thief," a third party would sound rather ridiculous if he were to buttonhole John Doe and say: "Look here, old chappie, beastly noise that, what. We really don't like people shouting in this neighborhood, you know. What, you say, your billfold was swiped, old man? Too bad, of course, but really you know the chap who took it may be making good use of it, what. But please—no shouting here." If the thief, not a third party, were to try and sell John Doe that line, the latter's feelings can be imagained, but hardly described.

The principle on which Ireland's case for reunion rests is a principle well understood in America, if not always elsewhere. It is the principle of national self-determination. The essence of democracy lies in the right of a people freely to determine how they are to be governed. The unit for self-determination is the nation. Ireland through a nationhood of 2,000 years has that right. Ireland through 700 years of resistance has that right. Partition is the denial of the right to self-determination. It is a refusal to accept the majority will of a people. Abraham Lincoln's words at Indianapolis in February 1861, are pertinent: "On what rightful principle," he asked, "may a State, not being more than one-fiftieth part of the Nation in soil and population, break up the Nation and then coerce a proportionally larger subdivision of itself, in the most arbitrary way? What mysterious right to play tyrant is conferred on a district of a country, with its people, by merely calling it a State?"

Partition was imposed by the British Government with the misguided support of a Tory group in northeast Ireland against the passionate protest of the overwhelming majority of the Irish people. Established by force, it is maintained by force, and by the shameless manipulation, with British connivance of electoral boundaries within the cut-off area. Perpetual interference in a nation's internal affairs by an outside power is contrary to the rule of law among nations. Partition gravely injures economically, politically and culturally, both parts of Ireland.

Counting heads there are roughly two-thirds of the voters in northeast Ulster in favor of partition and one-third in favor of unity so that a change-over of one-sixth of the total electorate plus one man would give a majority for unity. Thus with the present slow and steady turn-over of informed opinion, with the kinsmen of William Orr and Harry Munro and Henry Joy McCracken returning to the allegiance of their republican ancestors of 1798, one might expect that in the foreseeable future the problem would automatically disappear. However, the gerrymandering of the electoral boundaries prevents any such simple solution. As the population in favor of a unified Ireland grows the electoral boundaries are again altered to insure a permanent local majority of members of Parliament opposing the unification of Ireland.

The unnatural manipulation of electoral districts in order to give a facade of respectability to Tory machinations and to insure a permanent parliamentary majority in favor of the British occupation has been brought to a fine art in the six counties. Take County Fermanagh. In all Ireland there are 32 counties. Fermanagh is one of the 30-county block which wants Ireland to be one national entity. Now in Fermanagh at the last general election for the Six County Parliament in February 1949, the Nationalists polled 15,000: they won one seat. The Tories polled 13,000: they won two seats.

Derry city founded by St. Colmcille, is as one might expect, Nationalist by a substantial majority, 29,000 to 18,000. But the resources of civilization were not exhausted. To deprive the Nationalists of the Parliamentary seat, the city electoral division was rearranged. Part of the city was omitted altogether. Then the city boundaries for Parliamentary elections only were stretched 8 miles into the county to gather enough Tory votes to eclipse the Nationalists in the truncated city itself.

The same pattern of gerrymandering appears in the elections to local bodies. In district after district it is made impossible for the Nationalist majority to elect a majority of the local representatives. Tyrone is typical. In Tyrone where the Tories are only 40 percent of the population they polled nearly 66 percent of the representation on the county council.

The detached observer is aware from time to time of an Irish educational program against partition directed at men of good will in countries like the United States where there is a functioning democracy. The detached observer is, however, entitled to ask what are the Irish in Ireland doing about providing a solution for the problem. One reply is this—if the British would just get out the problem would solve itself. There is much truth in this contention. But exactly on what lines would the most probable solution be? The leaders of the greater part of the country are prepared to accept a Federal solution under which the reserved powers at present exercised by London would be transferred to an all-Ireland Parliament, while the Belfast area would retain local autonomy with much the same powers as at present. Such a solution would appear to be not only a reasonable one but a feasible one.

The hand of friendship has been extended by the leaders of Irish-Ireland for many years. On February 9, 1939, the then Taoiseach (Prime Minister) Mr. Eamon de Valera could say in the Unity debate in the Irish Senate, "My hand has been out always and never for one instant, though sometimes we had to put up with a good many rebuffs, did I fail to have my hand out." The responsible Cabinet Minister in the present government, Mr. Sean MacBride, Minister for External Affairs, has stated:

"While we are determined to reestablish the unity of Ireland and to ensure that the will of the Irish people will prevail in their own island without outside interference our fellow countrymen in the six counties have nothing to fear from us. We will guarantee them in a united Ireland complete religious and democratic freedom and are prepared to give them any reasonable safeguards that may be necessary to allay any fears real or imaginary that they may have."

At Downpatrick, County Down, recently Mr. MacBride pointed out that in an All-Ireland Parliament the present Six County Parliament would wield much influence and might well participate in an All-Ireland Government. Mr. MacBride said: "The advent of Six County representatives in an All-Ireland Parliament might well result in a government wherein the present-day partitionists would participate."

It is regrettable that the realism and reasonableness of successive Dublin administrations have not found an echo in the northeast of Ireland. Free Ireland has no Communist Party and no Communist problem. A strong united Ireland would be a stout shield for the west in the present ideological struggle against atheistic communism. The present set-up of divided Ireland weakens Ireland and weakens the democratic world. Thus the welfare of millions of persons is endangered by the prejudice of a small group of politicians in northeast Ulster and in England. There are times when moral pressure can justifiably be brought to bear on obstinate groups in the interests of whole peoples; and surely this is a case in point.

The Primary Function of Air Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM B. WIDNALL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, the reversal our forces have encountered in Korea is as unexpected as it was avoidable. We have had almost 6 months to limit the battlefield, and build up our own advantage. Instead, after winning notable victories, we are suddenly confronted by an overwhelming force of Chinese Communists, who may indeed be able to drive us off the Korean peninsula.

I am not one who cries for anyone's head, or who ventures to blame any one leader, political or military, for the current debacle. I will speak out, however, in support of the air power that could have made our early victories secure, that would have stabilized the situation, and that we still must employ if we are not to go down to defeat in a third world war.

With air power the battlefield can be isolated, and from behind a strong defense line the attack can be carried to the enemy. In Korea, in place of following this doctrine of the proper use of air power, we dispersed our troops, made them vulnerable to Chinese Communist treachery, and abandoned the advantages we had previously gained.

Mr. Speaker, one writer on air power who fully understands the doctrine and proper employment of air power, is Gill Robb Wilson. He is fair, he is objective, and he never confuses the issue. In his column, The Air World, in the December 1 issue of the New York Herald Tribune, Mr. Wilson has written:

> Reams have been written about the use of air power in Korea and principally about close support tactical air power. There is a danger in this which must not go unnoted. The danger is that in enthusiasm for the auxiliary use of air power we forget its primary function and neglect to hew to the principles of that function. * * *
> Fundamentally, the genius of American air power is to prevent the necessity of great pitched battles by our armies against overwhelming numbers of Asiatic Communists. Failure to utilize this genius literally brought disaster in North Korea. Kindred failure on future battlefields well might cost the survival of the free world.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Gill Robb Wilson's timely warning that we are not only misusing our air power, in which we alone have superiority to the Chinese Communists, but are endangering the future of the entire free world.

The article is as follows:

Measured by American air-power doctrine the campaign in Korea since the Inchon landings has represented earthbound strategy, which if followed in a third world war would assure defeat.

By the criteria of air doctrine the United Nations would have established a strong defense line across the narrow waistline of Korea from Pyongyang to Wonsan. Then from behind this line air power would have been thrown to exploit the area north to the Yalu River and advance made only when air power could assure that it had the situation under relative control

Had Red China elected to advance against the UN defense line through the mountains in winter and in the face of attacking air power her task would have been enormous. Had Red China chosen not to advance she would have been in the field with a vast army to no purpose. In neither case need the UN have modified its stated objective of proceeding ultimately to the Manchurian boundary.

FORCES DISPERSED

However, in place of following the air doctrine of isolation of the battlefield, which was brilliantly accomplished prior to the Inchon landings, the UN forces were dispersed across a battlefield which was not isolated and ran head-on into the Reds from across the Yalu.

No military commander on earth better knows his science than General MacArthur, and no one ever has employed air power better than he.

What accounts for the moves which led to the last fateful situation of UN forces is unknown at this writing. Was it a calculated risk which backfired due to breakdown in intelligence? Was it international political pressure overriding military science? Was it extraordinary ill fortune in weather which disrupted reasoned timetables? Was it incalculable partisan activity such as the Soviets have featured on other battlefields?

Any of these or none or all together may have conspired to produce the end result of disaster. With this we are not concerned. Our concern is that our forces were made vulnerable to Red China treachery of undeclared war because a cardinal doctrine of the function of air power as a primary force was violated.

FORGET PRIMARY FUNCTION

Reams have been written about the use of air power in Korea and principally about close support tactical air power. There is a danger in this which must not go unnoted. The danger is that in enthusiasm for the auxiliary use of air power we forget its primary function and neglect to hew to the principles of that function.

The advantage of close-support aviation as had by our ground forces in Korea would never be had by either side in like degree in a major campaign of a third world war. Our aviation could provide such support in Korea only because it had scant opposition aloft, and did provide it only because the situation was so desperate. Tactical air power in Korea was basically on a rescue mission for most of the campaign prior to Inchon.

Ordinarily, ground forces would not be caught in such desperate straits. If Army commanders get to calling upon air power for such routine use we shall shortly have frittered away our air forces in an auxiliary capacity. This would mean the end of American air supremacy and bring the United States to the dilemma of matching manpower with the Soviet Union.

Fundamentally, the genius of American air power is to prevent the necessity of great pitched battles by our armies against overwhelming numbers of Asiatic Communists. Failure to utilize this genius literally brought disaster in North Korea. Kindred failure on future battlefields well might cost the survival of the free world.

Extension of Aid to Yugoslavia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House to provide $38,000,000 to relieve hunger and starvation in Yugoslavia is one that presents a complexity of thought as a result of the political situation that exists throughout the world today. It makes decision difficult. A vote either for or against the bill is equally open to serious question.

The desire to relieve suffering and hunger is basic and fundamental in our Nation. It has found expression all through our history as a nation. It has been extended to all types and kinds of people. We have never drawn any distinction as to race, color, or creed, nor to the type of government under which the peoples we have helped lived. Human need has been the criterion that has guided our course.

On the other hand our Nation is unalterably opposed to communism. Yugoslavia is a communistic nation and ruled by a dictator. Should our dislike for communism prevail over a desire to extend help to a people in need of food? This is the question presented for decision. For myself I am willing to vote for the bill on the assumption that the need exists and that the moneys will be spent to relieve hunger.

However, there is another element it seems to me that can properly be taken into consideration in making a decision, but it is based on expediency rather than any fundamental principle. I refer to the statement that has been made during the debate that Marshal Tito has 30 to 33 divisions that could be thrown into a war against Russia. Whether this would be done no one can say, but the thought that they might be so used, is based upon the known antagonism that now exists between Tito and Stalin. The most that can be said is that the giving of the relief provided for in this bill is expected to create a friendly feeling upon the part of the Yugoslavian people and its leaders toward our Nation in the event of war with Russia. No one will doubt that we need all the friends we can get from any source. It is my opinion, with this effort to obtain help from Yugoslavia in return for the relief we will extend under the provisions of the pending bill, that it might also be well to take some appropriate action that will insure help to us from Spain and Nationalist China. There is no doubt that both of these are opposed to communism and would be glad and willing to assist us in the event of war with Russia. It is only a gamble whether help would come to us from Yugoslavia in a conflict with Russia. It is a certainty with respect to Spain and China. Why do we discard or neglect a certainty and accept uncertainty? I hope we will soon adopt a realistic policy in this matter of building up friendships that can be depended upon to stand by our side in the hour of need.

A Plea for National Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 14 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, on the evening of December 12 I made an address in New York City at a dinner of the Democratic National Committee. My address was a plea for national unity. I called upon both the Republican Party and the Democratic Party to forget about 1952 and to think and act only in terms of the security of our country and the peace of the world.

I ask unanimous consent that this address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR HERBERT H. LEHMAN BEFORE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE DINNER, TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 12, 1950, WALDORF-ASTORIA HOTEL, NEW YORK CITY

I am glad to be here tonight and to see so many old friends.

But tonight is not the time for small pleasantries or small politics. These are times for sober thought, for prayerful reflection. These are times for action, but not for hysteria and not for panic. Ill-considered action could be as dangerous as no action at all. A false step, even a false word, can lead to disaster.

At no time since the founding of our Republic has our country been in greater danger than it is today. The military situation in Korea is still shrouded in doubt. Our thoughts must turn to the gallant military forces of the United Nations, who are so courageously fighting against unprecedented odds. Our hearts and our unending gratitude go out to our valiant soldiers and marines who are seeking to reestablish a stable line of defense against the organized horde of Chinese Communist invaders who so treacherously fell upon them.

No one can, as yet, predict with assurance what the course of battle may be. I hope and pray that the front will be stabilized and that the fighting in Korea will come to an end on terms which we can accept with honor. But it would be the utmost folly under present circumstances not to recognize the critical situation with which we are confronted.

While I have pointed out to you that the immediate situation is shrouded in doubt there are some things that in the past weeks have become abundantly clear.

First, whatever the fortunes of war, it is clear that we will make no dishonorable compromise with an aggressor. To do so would run counter to the spirit of our freedom-loving people. To do so would dash the hopes which we have not yet abandoned of building, through the United Nations, an effective system of collective security.

We cannot compromise the basic cause for which we fight. We cannot compromise the unity of the free world or the principle of respect for the liberties of our sister nations.

Second, we must recognize that the military situation in Korea is only part of our danger. It is only part of our problem. The danger to our national survival, to the cause we fight for, to the cause for which our forces in Korea have made measureless sacrifices, is world-wide. There are imminent threats in Iran, in Indochina, in Malaya, in Burma, in the Philippines, in Germany, in Yugoslavia, and in all of Western Europe. In our concentration on Korea we dare not forget these other threats.

We dare not undertake any action which would split and shatter the unity of the free world, so precariously forged and tempered with the blood of our sons in Korea.

Third, it is clear that Communist Russia has set no limits on its ambitions. And now that it can no longer count on advancing its aim of world dominion through subversion, it is willing to embark on a mad career of flagrant and unprovoked aggression. It makes no difference whether Mao Tse-tung is the puppet or the partner of Marshal Stalin. It makes no difference whether the North Koreans invaded the Peoples Republic of South Korea under orders from Peiping or Moscow. In either event the Kremlin stands publicly branded by its conduct in and out of the United Nations as the spearhead of a conspiracy, aimed at all the values that free men and women everywhere hold dear.

Finally, it is clear that we have now taken the measure of the menace which confronts us. And we shall do whatever may be required to fend it off.

The task ahead will be difficult in the extreme and will require great sacrifices. We would far rather devote our energy and our great industrial capacity to improving the standard of living and the well-being of men and women both at home and abroad. The choice, however, is not of our making. Ruthless men in the Kremlin seem bent upon dragging the civilized world into a holocaust of another war. While we shall continue our struggle for peace in every way open to us we must prepare to meet their challenge of war.

Nothing less than mobilization of our manpower and our resources on a great scale, both militarily and economically, will any longer suffice. The balance of power which has shifted so gravely against the free world must be restored. This is the only way which offers any hope of avoiding a general war. But, more than this, it is the only way of avoiding defeat in case war comes in spite of all of our efforts.

The only things that really count now are the survival of this Nation, the lives of our fighting men overseas, and the freedom and unity of the peace-loving world. We cannot hope to attain these things unless we have unity. Any other course will lead to disaster.

We must demonstrate our determination to preserve the area of freedom and to build it into a bastion from which the cause of freedom may make new advances. This awakening of the United States to a sense of danger and to the need for sacrifice will, I am convinced, prove contagious. As we assume ever more vigorously the leadership of the free world we will find a growing company of ready followers. The nations of Western Europe, in particular, which suffered so bitterly in two World Wars, have been hesitant, as we have been, to face the facts and to draw from the facts the necessary conclusions in terms of action. Surely this is understandable. But I suspect that in measure they have been waiting for us. Without us, their cause was, in any event, lost. With us their cause becomes a hopeful one. By taking stern and formidable measures I am convinced that we shall galvanize the rest of the free world into taking stern and formidable measures as well.

In our idealism we found it hard to believe that any group of men, to satisfy their mad ambitions, would be willing to plunge the world into an orgy of destruction just at a time when the advances in modern technology have made it possible to spread the good things of life over an ever-widening area. In our love of justice we have sought to build a world of justice and of law. We shall continue to do so in and out of the United Nations against a background of constantly growing strength. For there is some slight hope that the Kremlin will have a change of heart when it takes stock of the immense power of the freedom-loving peoples arrayed against it.

But we are now fully awake to the danger which confronts us and we will not by compromise lessen our efforts to strengthen ourselves and our allies and friends abroad. Under these circumstances the outcome can no longer be in doubt. As in the case of every despotism, there are weaknesses in totalitarian Russia which give promise of its ultimate defeat. The structure of a tyrannical government is built upon the unrest and disaffection of most of its subjects. Communism and a foreign dictator were imposed upon the peoples of Eastern Europe. They were never freely accepted. This is a factor of the utmost importance which I believe will assert itself increasingly as the Western World arms. And all history teaches us that in the long run evil must capitulate to good, falsehood to truth, and the minions of a slave state to the spirit of free men on the march.

If we are firm enough and wise enough, we will avoid catastrophe. But a household divided against itself can be neither firm nor wise nor strong. We have the right to expect unity in the free world. But beyond this we have the right to expect—nay, to insist upon—unity in world affairs at home. If ever there was a time to merge our differences in a common cause, that time is now. United in determination as well as in action, our cause and the cause of freedom in the world will prevail.

Unity not only can be achieved, it must be achieved. But it cannot be achieved if one group or another seeks to make political capital out of national danger. It cannot be achieved if we are asked to sacrifice the cause we fight for as the price of unity. It cannot be achieved by insisting on the sacrifice of this official or that official on the public block of unjust and undeserved attack.

And so with all the earnestness of my heart and soul I call upon both the Republican Party and the Democratic Party to forget about 1952 and to think and act only in terms of the security of our country and the peace of the world.

The overwhelming majority of the American people today demand true national unity. Those who do not accede to that demand at whatever cost to personal pride or political prospects will break faith with our people and with the hopes of all mankind.

Make no mistake about this: All the values every man holds dear are more desperately threatened today than at any time in the long history of man's struggle for freedom. Faced with this tragic fact, there must be no question about the manner in which we Americans will conduct ourselves. Marshaled solidly behind the President of the United States, either through peaceful means if this is possible, or by war if this is forced on us, we shall see this thing through to ultimate victory. United in a common cause, our high purpose of security and peace in the world will win out and we will find our way through this dark day into the light which lies beyond. Divided we face ruin and possibly slavery. May God give us strength and wisdom and faith.

The Rugged Path Ahead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN D. JOHNSTON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 14 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, there appeared in the December issue of National News an article entitled "The Rugged Path Ahead," which was taken from an address by Erle Cocke, Jr., national commander of the American Legion, made before the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce. I have read this article, I have found it very interesting, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RUGGED PATH AHEAD

(By Erle Cocke, Jr.)

What I am about to say here may come as a shock to some of you. My purpose is to shock you. My words can serve no better purpose than to wake up all the people.

There are certain grim facts which every American must recognize today as the ABC's of American survival.

Soviet Russia is our deadly enemy.

Soviet Russia is also the deadly enemy of human freedom everywhere.

Soviet Russia is pursuing a master plan for world conquest.

The war lords of Soviet Russia are using communism only as a tool of world enslavement. It is the most effective tool ever used by any dictator, because it the most versatile tool ever invented. It can be made to mean so many different things to so many different classes and masses. That is why communism has been so successful in creating Red fifth columns everywhere. But we must never forget that the driving urge behind communism is Russian imperialism.

Finally, every American must realize that the United Nations cannot save us from the perils of communism. But a strong America can save the United Nations.

Only a strong America—which means an America safe to be with—can serve as the international rallying point for free men and women everywhere in a united and a successful resistance to expanding world communism.

This is the logic behind the American Legion's 1951 peace-through-strength program.

In fighting for American strength for peace by compulsion—and that is the only way in which we can make sure of peace—the American Legion asks:

1. Enactment by Congress without further delay of a universal military training law as the manpower framework of a modern American defense establishment plus immediate total mobilization of our Armed Forces to a full war footing. We need the full draft to meet our immediate peril. We need universal military training for the long pull as the most effective and least costly system of maintaining necessary national preparedness. The American Legion believes we are on the brink of world war III. We believe that only our immediate total mobilization will discourage Communist leaders from starting a total war.

2. Strengthening of our own internal security through the strict enforcement of the new Communist-control law to the end of at least immobilizing every Communist beachhead in the United States. If we are going to have to fight Soviet Russia, we don't want to be faced at the same time with the necessity of fighting a vicious Red fifth column at home.

3. Curtailment or elimination of every possible public and private nonessential expenditure.

From now on national security must have first call upon our national wealth. Our Government must take the lead in drastic reductions in all nondefense costs. Our people must follow the Government's lead.

American dollars must become fighting dollars. They will have no business for a long time to come, jingling as spare cash in individual pockets.

We can never shrink from the cost of the defense of our freedom, however stupendous it may be. The only alternative is life upon our bended knees as slaves of an alien dictator.

It is part of Soviet Russia's master plan to increase the cost of our defense to ruinous proportions in the hope we will spend ourselves into disaster. Joe Stalin is counting on our economic bankruptcy. He believes fondly this is the surest and safest way of destroying America without the firing of one Russian gun by a Russian soldier.

This is a threat which can only be met by American willingness to undergo unprecedented individual and collective sacrifices. The American way of life has always been luxurious. We shall have to settle for an American way of life that can remain free only if it becomes frugal.

This is the rugged path that stretches ahead of all of us. We are facing record taxes, increasing Government controls, and growing civilian shortages. There is no relief in sight. If we escape total war in the immediate future, we shall face years of continuing international tensions and recurring national emergencies. We cannot pass this sternest of all tests of our patriotism on a basis of politics as usual, business as usual, pleasure as usual, and spending as usual. All of us must return to the old-fashioned American virtues of hard work, thrift, and sacrifice. We must not tolerate shirkers in our midst.

There are, I am sorry to say, not only shirkers in America today but actually men who call themselves Americans, and yet who, for a "fast buck," are willing to sell out our country.

I am referring to merchants, brokers, exporters, and shippers who are trading with our enemies. They consider it clever to find loopholes in our laws and in our export-license regulations to carry on commerce with Communist nations. These men may be within the law, but they are traitors to America. They should be dealt with as enemies.

This unscrupulous trading with Red China is particularly perfidious at this time. We are living in fateful hours. Red China has intervened in North Korea. The Kremlin gang's most fervent desire is to embroil us in a large-scale war with Red China. We have nothing to gain in such a war. Russia has everything to gain. We cannot match China's manpower. China is not our real enemy. Soviet Russia is.

An all-out war with China can only bleed us to the point where the big Red Army of Soviet Russia can flatten us like a steamroller. We could kill millions of Chinese and drop A-bombs on Chinese cities. The net result would be that we would only weaken China to make her more amenable to Moscow direction, lose countless precious American lives, spend hundreds of billions of dollars, and deplete our stock of atomic weapons. In the end, if we did win such a war, what would the victory profit us? We'd still have Soviet Russia to deal with.

Red China is only a symptom of world disease. The intelligent approach to any problem and particularly to the problem of survival is to determine the exact cause of the problem and deal with the cause.

The time for that resolute and drastic action has come.

The sooner we serve notice on Soviet Russia that we will not fight any more satellites which she elects to "sick" on us but shall hold Moscow responsible for any further aggression and use all of our strength to destroy the breeding place of world trouble, the better off we will be.

It is useless to make threats unless we can carry them out.

But this is a threat which our survival demands. We must build our strength to make such a threat good. That demands immediate mobilization of our Armed Forces to full war strength; immediate enactment of UMT; a tough policy toward all Communists and traitors at home; and a full realization and patriotic willingness to bear the burden of sacrifice which this "operation survival" requires.

We must condition ourselves for the most savage period in all of our history. But how many of us have given serious thought to the twilight which is descending on our American way of life? How many businessmen have discussed this at lunch—instead of business as usual? How many of our civic, fraternal, professional, business, labor and other groups have pondered the immediate perils that beset us all? How many of us have made our opinions known to our Members of Congress?

Let's make it clear to the world that we are united on a resolute program of peace through strength.

America is a Nation of free Americans. Here the individual counts. We are living in a land of the free because it has always been the home of the brave.

We can keep it that way—all of us together, with God's help. We can do it because the most important part of the word "American" always has been found in the last four letters which spell "I can."

A Serious Hour in the Nation's History

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 14 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial written by Dr. George Lang, professor of philosophy at the University of Alabama, and district governor of Rotary for the district of Alabama, addressed to his fellow Rotarians. The letter is captioned "As if," and contains a beautiful and timely message.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AS IF

Fellow Rotarians, I have written the November governor's letter as if all were well with the world, as if we were trying to promote our program of vocational service and community progress without let or hindrance in the security of peace and in the confidence of unrestrained purpose.

But all is not well with the world. Time is running short with us. Even before this letter reaches you destiny may have ordained us to a death or life conflict, whether by divine decree or by connection of causes and effects. And the governor's letter may seem, if you read it at all, as but an echo of a distant past when men thought of freedom as an achievement, and of peace as the triumph of modern man's knowledge and will.

But yesterday, we had high hopes of tomorrow's plans for tomorrow was quite certain to come; we rejoiced with those who had reason for rejoicing; we wept with those in sorrow. At our luncheon table but yesterday we held familiar conversation about our town, our city, our Nation; we talked of Christmas and taxes. We observed that we needed playgrounds for the children, parks, schools, and camps. We talked of colleges and churches; of farms and garden plots, of camellias and cotton; of commerce and industry. We sang Old McDonald Had a Farm touchingly, or lifted harmony to heights of perfection in Sweet Adeline; we teased the fellow next to us, and we applauded lustily for the speech of the day not remembering what the speech was about; we knew that all was well with the world and we were on top of it.

And in the evening we turned homeward from desk or shop to the family circle; rest, and the benediction of comfort, the protection of government, the security of the freedoms that proclaimed the worth of the individual and the dignity of man. We reflected that we had much to be thankful for.

Was it just yesterday? And is it not true today? And why so serious as you look at your son or neighbor's son, saying:

"Not in all our history as a Nation and a Republic (how precious that word "Republic" sounds just now); have we faced so serious an hour. All that we prize as values in our social organization is threatened with extinction. The foundations are shaken."

Yes; emotions will spring forth to put nervous thoughts into nervous language. Somewhat of fear will possess us. We are human enough to want to blame someone at a distance for the mess. It was the brass hats, the Government, the British, and I know not what enemy sowed the seed of our disaster as fancy weaves its fabric of rationalization.

But the hour is serious. It is no time to behave like children playing in the street. We must not let the child's mind tell us what is in our environment; we must think with the mind of maturity, with a man's mind. For the child, being a child, without reproach, falsifies its environment; it makes the environment unreal; it does not see things as they are. As men we must put away childish things and see our world realistically.

We are not hopeless, nor yet in despair. The Russians and the Chinese have miscalculated though we have underestimated them as foes. For if war must come these enemies of human decency will meet liberty-loving freemen from all the corners of the earth, not less American freemen, who love liberty more than life itself, men who will fight to the death for the land of their birth and upbringing, and for their institutions. Hear again the voice of Winston Churchill and take courage:

"The uniform success which had attended their arms (the Japanese), had inflamed their martial spirit, and began now to engender a mood of unwarranted exaltation, and a belief that the Western Powers had not the will to fight to the death. This belief was soon to cost them dear."—The Hinge of Fate.

Whence had the Western Powers this will? Let Wordsworth answer:

"Thou hast great allies;
Thy friends are exultations, agonies;
And love, and man's unconquerable mind."

Very cordially,

GEORGE LANG,
District Governor, 238.

Mr. Acheson's Troubles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 14 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article entitled "Mr. Acheson's Troubles," written by Walter Lippmann, and published in the Washington Post this morning. It is a very thought-provoking article, and I am asking that it be printed in the RECORD in order that others may read it.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. ACHESON'S TROUBLES
(By Walter Lippmann)

If and when the President decides to reorganize his Cabinet, the new Secretary of State will do well to examine the great reason why Mr. Acheson lost the confidence of the people.

That reason is, so it seems to me, that Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson chose not to face candidly, not to debate openly, and not to make Congress and the people judge decisively the great issues of foreign policy which arise out of our conflicting interests in Asia and in Europe. Honorable men can and do differ on these issues. But though there is much to be said on both sides, a choice and decisions which follow from it have to be made. All the choices before us are hard ones. In all of them the risks are great and for all of them many of the consequences are incalculable.

If ever the Nation needed, if ever its responsible leaders needed, the clarification and the assurance that can be had in this country only from thorough and honest debate, it is here.

But what actually happened was that Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson chose to finagle the issues rather than to face them and to decide them. They refused to argue it out openly with Senator KNOWLAND and the others of his party.

They tried instead to smother the dispute by conceding bits and pieces here and there when the heat became too great, hoping that somehow they could "fob" off the opposition without adopting its policy.

As one might well have foreseen, as indeed Mr. Acheson was warned in ample time by disinterested and friendly observers, the result of the finagling was to infuriate and not to placate the opposition. Holding their convictions passionately, the attempt to deal with them cleverly rather than openly lent enormous support to the false and malicious charges against Mr. Acheson and the State Department. For the performance in respect to China and Formosa was sufficiently insincere to make it plausible to many people that this must be due to hidden and secret sinister influences.

The insincerity was not due to sinister and hidden influences. It was due to the fact that Mr. Truman, who is a professional politician, and Mr. Acheson, who is an amateur politician, tried to play politics with a question of the highest national significance. They sought to deal with General MacArthur and Senator KNOWLAND and the Republicans in Congress as if a great issue in foreign policy were like an appropriation or a tariff bill that could be compromised and logrolled. This, I submit, is the cause of Mr. Acheson's troubles. Thus it may be possible to satisfy Senator KNOWLAND on an appropriation bill—to take an imaginary example—by conceding to him so many post offices in California. But, given his convictions, which are ardent and sincere, you will insult him rather than satisfy him with the equivalent of two or three post offices on Formosa for Chiang Kai-shek.

In foreign affairs when the stakes are life and death the attempt to make policy by the method of the pork barrel will lead—as indeed it has, though not yet irreparably—to disaster abroad and to disunity at home. The Truman-Acheson course in the Far East has combined the worst features of the two conflicting policies and it has gained none of the advantages of either. They have continued to recognize Chiang—though they have disowned him. They are negotiating with Mao—though they do not recognize him. They will not let Mao into the UN—but Mr. Wu is sitting in the Security Council debating with Mr. Austin and negotiating with delegates of a very large number of nations in the UN.

In this attempt to placate everybody at home a little, they have lost the confidence of almost everybody. And so while the attack from the opposition continues to be fierce and unrelenting, their supporters continue to be silent.

It is impossible, I believe, for Mr. Acheson to repair his fundamental mistake which was his refusal to confide in the people—his refusal to debate the great issue, and if his real views could not command general support in Congress, his failure to resign. The position he has been in since last winter has been terrifying to contemplate—that of the principal adviser to a President who has little knowledge of his own in these matters, and himself so vulnerable that the problem of dealing with his domestic critics must dominate his judgment of the problems abroad.

The mere possibility, which can never be wholly excluded from the minds of people who know what's what here and abroad, that the gravest decisions might be dictated in part by the need to placate his critics, are shattering to the nerves of an ever-increasing number.

The initial mistake is for him irreparable in that no man can win back the confidence of the people, once in great matters that must have their assent he has failed to confide in them.

The new Secretary of State will have to go back to the people and he will have to earn their support, not for himself but for a coherent policy which is designed, is measured, and is tailored to defend with the means which we can command the vital interests of the country. There is no use his thinking, no matter how eminent and popular he may be at the outset, that he can form such a policy or unite the Nation behind him if what he offers them is a little of everything that seems to have votes behind it.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Investigation of Organized Crime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 14 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a statement prepared by me regarding the assistance the American Bar Association is rendering in combating organized crime.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION HELPS COMBAT ORGANIZED CRIME

I wish to call your attention to the assistance extended to the Special Committee to Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce by the American Bar Association.

During the last meeting of the American Bar Association here in Washington I had the pleasure of addressing the section on criminal law. The meeting was devoted to a discussion of the menace of organized crime. The Attorney General of the United States, the Honorable J. Howard McGrath, and the distinguished Governor of Illinois, the Honorable Adlai Stevenson, also addressed the meeting. The speeches of these gentlemen, as well as my own, and the introductory remarks of the chairman of the section, Mr. Arthur J. Freund of St. Louis, were inserted in the RECORD of September 19, 1950. During the course of my remarks I indicated that our committee would welcome the help of that section and the members of the bar generally. In response the following action was taken by the board of governors:

"The board of governors recommends to the house of delegates the appointment of a commission of seven members to cooperate with the Special Committee of the United States Senate to Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce in making a study on the subject of the need for modernization of rules, procedure and practices in the field of criminal law, the steps which are being taken to codify and bring up to date criminal codes, the efforts which are being made to plug loopholes in criminal procedures and eliminate outmoded and archaic practices and procedures whereby violators of the law escape prosecution, the adequacy or inadequacy of public offenders acts, the methods of and practices in sentencing, the tendency on the part of the legal profession to withdraw from the practice of criminal law, together with the reasons therefor, etc. Upon this commission there are to be represented the section of bar activities, the conference of bar presidents, the national conference of commissioners on uniform State laws, the section of judicial administration, the junior bar conference, the section of criminal law and the conference of chief justices. Each of these sections or groups which are asked to cooperate should be requested to give their full cooperation in manpower and assistance in the work of the commission.

"The commission is to employ such executive secretary as they desire, and there shall be given to the president and the chairman of the commission authority to solicit funds for carrying on the work from such foundation as they jointly approve."

The foregoing recommendation was approved by the American Bar Association and the following commission has been appointed by its president:

Robert P. Patterson, chairman, 1 Wall Street, New York 5, N. Y.; Howard L. Barkdull, Union Commerce Building, Cleveland 14, Ohio; Philip S. Habermann, Wisconsin Bar Association, 122 West Washington Avenue, Madison 3, Wis.; Bolitha J. Laws, United States District Court for the District of Columbia, Washington 1, D. C.; Walter P. Armstrong, Jr., Commerce Title Building, Memphis 3, Tenn.; Arthur J. Freund, 506 Olive Street, St. Louis 1, Mo.; Laurance M. Eyde, Supreme Court Building, Jefferson City, Mo. Advisory member: James V. Bennett, Bureau of Prisons, Department of Justice, Washington 25, D. C.

The above commission held its first meeting in my office on October 27, and discussed plans for its future activities.

It is a source of considerable gratification to our committee to have the cooperation of this distinguished commission. We feel certain that the commission and members of the bar generally will have a number of useful suggestions for our committee. In addition, we hope that all the various State and local bar associations will be advised of the work of this commission and submit any suggestions or comments they may have which might further the work of the Committee on Organized Crime. Our hearings and investigations up to date have developed a number of interesting problems on which we would like to have the views of lawyers, judges, and law enforcement agencies, as well as private organizations devoted to the study of prevention of crime and delinquency and allied problems. Our committee will certainly be happy to give any such studies and suggestions the most careful consideration.

Citizens' Pensions: An American Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 14 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Emily Cuyler Hammond entitled "Citizens' Pensions: An American Plan," which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune, September 30, 1950.

This article discusses in some detail the defects of our present system of social security, and also mentions briefly the alternative plan which I proposed, which would provide universal eligibility to all the aged with insufficient incomes, and at only a moderate cost in taxation to the economy as a whole.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITIZENS' PENSIONS: AN AMERICAN PLAN—SENATOR BUTLER PROPOSES SYSTEM WHICH WOULD GIVE PROTECTION TO RICH AND POOR ALIKE

(By Emily C. Hammond)

Social security has been the New Deal trump card and the Republicans' bugaboo for 15 years. The New Deal aparently gave the voters their hearts' desire: The golden guaranty of individual security in old age. And the voters were grateful for the blessings to come. What could the Republicans do? How could they offer more? They could not depreciate the value of security. They certainly could not shoot Santa Claus. So they went along.

Accordingly, a sinister old racket crept into American politics to take the place of free beer before elections. The Romans had a name for it: Bread and circuses. Bismarck added a new wrinkle. He taxed the people to give them the feeling they were paying for the crumbs he tossed them, and called it social insurance. President Roosevelt imported Bismarck's idea from the Weimar welfare republic and rechristened it social security. But by whatever name, it is a political bribe, pure and simple. It is the stock in trade of the welfare state, but it is not social and it is most definitely not security.

Public charity in the guise of the federally aided, State administered old-age assistance programs has not decreased as was expected but, even taking into consideration population growth, has increased by leaps and bounds. Stimulated by free Federal money, it has gone up from a total of 107,000 persons in 1933 to 2,760,000 in 1949, or an increase of 2,480 percent.

Thus today out of 11,500,000 men and women over 65, around 3,000,000 technically unqualified for insurance are receiving old-age assistance—that very public charity from which we were struggling to emancipate ourselves. Only about 2,000,000 are receiving old-age and survivors insurance as a right. Of these, some 250,000 are receiving supplementary old-age assistance after going through the mill of the means test because their insurance is insufficient.

The social security amendments of 1950, as they passed the Senate, still neglect millions of Americans, particularly the most needy. Old-age and survivors insurance rights continue to be denied not only to around 9,000,000 of the present aged but to between 15,000,000 and 20,000,000 gainfully employed workers, including those most likely to be in need in the future such as marginal domestic servants, migratory farm labor and sharecroppers. That adds up to between 25,000,000 and 30,000,000 forgotten votes—enough to swing an election.

Everybody is for security—let there be no mistake. If the handout statists had succeeded in giving true security, the Republicans' worst fears would undoubtedly be realized. The Democrats would be in the White House forever.

However, there is a wide divergence of opinion as to the wisdom and ethics of how it should be attained. Also, the complexities of the Social Security Act are such that few understand its economic unsoundness, its capricious formulas or its consequent innumerable injustices, much less how it will work for them personally.

People confidently expect at 65 to receive the promised pension. It never occurs to them that calamity might befall them, that they might be taken ill and be unable to continue to work in covered employment the full prescribed number of quarters and so be ineligible for benefits. They think security means that Uncle Sam will take care of them no matter what happens. Many are apt to take social security so much for granted that they make no provisions whatsoever for security themselves and continue in old age to cheat on charity.

The high-salaried cynics know full well that their social-security taxes are too small to buy annuities on an actuarial basis unless they pay these taxes during their whole working lives. They realize that the employer's contribution is passed on to the consumer in higher prices and it is the public at large that pays the employer's half of the bill. Nevertheless, they shrug and say, "We're on the road to socialism anyway, why shouldn't I take my share of the loot?"

The lower wage earners for the most part learn the hard way either through their own experience or that of someone near to them, that social security for them was an empty promise. They see old folks in need receiving too little or nothing because of some incomprehensible technicality. Their reaction is one of disappointment, bewilderment, or bitter disillusionment.

This is not to say that nobody gets anything out of social security. Actually it is a vast, federally operated slot machine at which you must pay for the privilege of earning a living in most employments, whether you like it or not. If you are lucky, you may hit the jackpot. If you are unlucky you will lose everything you put in.

The Democrats and the Republicans alike of this Eighty-first Congress have really outdone themselves in an effort to make the game attractive. Old-age and survivors insurance coverage has been extended to some 10,000,000 formerly excluded individuals; benefits have been increased between 85 and 110 percent, and eligibility has been tremendously liberalized. Any one 65 years old or over today is qualified for old-age and survivors insurance benefits if he or she has a credit of six calendar quarters—3-month periods—in covered employment.

While 9,000,000 of the present aged remain beyond the scope of social security, a few lucky ones who have had the coveted six quarters are chosen to be taken within the fold. While marginal domestic servants, migratory farm laborers, and sharecroppers are out, some of the richest men and women in the country, among other self-employed, are chosen to be in. While benefits in the lower wager groups are raised from $10 to only $20, benefits for the higher salaried people shoot up from $45 to $80—whether the recipients need it or not. Under what is called the new start, however, every one over 62 years of age in covered employment on the effective day of the law can make a killing whether his wages be high or low.

A farmer, for instance, can work as a farm hand for a neighbor for a year and a half at $17 a month, pay a total social-security tax of $4.50, retire at 65 to work on his own farm and draw $20 a month for life. If his wife is the same age, the two of them, with the normal life expectancies, can hope for a total of $4,826. Of course, "that ain't hay" for only $4.50; but the indisputable bonanza is for the high-salaried professionals.

For instance, a self-employed lawyer of 62 or over can, under the new law, take a $30,000-a-year job with a corporation; work for a year and a half; pay a total of $81 in social-security taxes; quit to return to his private law practice and, after 65, collect $80 a month from the Government for life. If his wife is 10 years his junior, and he lives to be eighty-five and his wife to be eighty-six, their combined prize will amount to $31,920. This one is a handout in anybody's language. It has neither actuarial base nor sociological excuse.

At the same time, Uncle Sam's giant slot machine which awards such windfalls to some is rigged against youth. The youth of today, who will pay social-security taxes at a mounting rate during all of their working lives, could do as well or better by buying a policy from a private insurance company. And the youth of tomorrow will be burdened by back-breaking taxation. It is estimated that the system will cost $2,082,000,000 in 1951 and mount to $10,919,000,000 by the year 2000.

The Eighty-first Congress really tried to discover a formula that would protect the excluded 25,000,000. It failed dismally for two reasons: First, because old-age and survivors insurance tied to the payroll tax, was designed to give security to regular wage earners, not to the people as a whole. Second, because at the present scale of jackpots for the wealthy and consolation prizes for the needy, if every one were covered, the expense would be prohibitive. No politician would dare ask for the taxes involved.

It is for these two reasons that the demand is growing for a new approach. Senator TAFT has called the present system a fake, certainly not insurance, and unfair to millions of worthy American citizens. He voted, he said, for the amendments merely as a temporary measure until a universal, pay-as-you-go system could be perfected. Senator MILLIKIN and a number of other Republicans have said virtually the same thing. Southern Democrats voice similar sentiments in private.

In the House Ways and Means Committee, Representative CARL CURTIS wrote a scathing minority report tearing the present system to shreds and demanding study of pay-as-you-go.

In the Senate Finance Committee, Senator HUGH BUTLER wrote the minority report and offered a concrete, constructive program of his own.

Senator BUTLER proposes to scrap the present dual old-age and survivors insurance-pauper's assistance system and substitute a universal pay-as-you-go citizens' pension plan, which would give protection to all Americans, rich and poor alike, but pay benefits only to those whose incomes drop below a given minimum.

Citizens' pensions would be administered without the abhorred means test. Through the mechanism of the income tax, if an individual 65 or over estimated his income for the year ahead at $600 or less, he would receive a citizens' pension of $50 a month. For every $50 more of annual income, the citizen's pension would be reduced by $1 a month, so that at about $3,000 it would taper off altogether.

The program would be supported by an income tax of about 3 percent on the first $3,000 of income—instead of the present payroll tax and sundry other hidden taxes—earmarked for old-age security to secure pay-as-you-go economic soundness. It is estimated by Mr. George Immerwahr, former chief actuary of old-age and survivors insurance that this would effect an ultimate saving of $5,000,000,000 a year over the present system.

Thus, says Senator BUTLER, "the important problem of old-age protection would be solved in a manner that would neither bankrupt the Nation nor humiliate the recipients."

Such a program as this would be American as opposed to the carbon copy of the German system that brought the German people to their knees. It would be democratic, nondiscriminatory, and just.

Whosoever accepts the challenge and adopts a platform of true security can count on 25,000,000 forgotten votes and really go to Washington. Whether the Republicans seize this opportunity or a constitutional coalition of all opposed to the hand-out state, it better be soon, before more of our American aged suffer insecurity, and our American economy cracks from the burden of unnecessary hand-outs.

The United States Air Force in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN D. JOHNSTON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 14 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I have before me an article written by a native South Carolinian, Ansel E. Talbert, which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune on Monday, December 11, 1950. Mr. Talbert is chief of the New York Herald Tribune bureau in Tokyo, and is president of the Aviation Writers Association of North America. During World War II he held the rank of lieutenant colonel, and served with the Eighth Air Force. His account of our Air Force in Korea is very interesting. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE THUNDERJET GOES INTO ACTION ON KOREA FRONT—UNITED STATES PLANES RAIN ROCKETS ON FOE—CREWS LIVE IN TENTS AT KOREAN AIRFIELD

(By Ansel E. Talbert)

WITH A JET AIRCRAFT GROUP IN KOREA, December 10.—The United States Air Force today, for the first time, threw its most heavily armed jet fighter, the F–84 Thunderjet, into combat in Korea to aid the embattled United Nations ground forces in their attempt to establish a firm new defense line.

The Thunderjets struck with rockets and bombs at the Communist troops along the battle line. Although reports from the ground front were anything but encouraging, there were no signs of defeatism or discouragement today at the snow-swept air base from which the recently arrived Thunderjets are being serviced and operated.

The constant whine of powerful jet engines being run at full throttle in the cold winter air was intermingled all day with sounds of hammering as Americans and Koreans rushed construction of new buildings. The group's personnel for the most part are living in winterized tents and accomplishing maintenance and repair at open parking strips in defiance of below-freezing temperatures.

The Thunderjet is a sleek but sturdy monoplane powered by a single turbo-jet engine. It has a speed in excess of 600 miles an hour and a much longer range and combat radius of action than any other jet fighter in squadron service with the Air Force. The plane can be loaded with as many as 32 5-inch rockets for attacks on tank and transport columns, and the rocket mounts retract into the wings after the rockets are fired.

F–80'S USED PREVIOUSLY

Until today the F–80 Shooting Star, the first jet plane ever purchased in quantity by the Air Force, has been the only jet used by the Air Force in Korea, although the Navy has been operating Panther jet fighters from its aircraft carriers.

By a stroke of bad luck, the F–84's were grounded by a minor engineering "bug" at bases in the United States just before the Korean war started. This defect has been corrected, and the Thunderjets are now being turned out in large numbers by the Republic Aircraft Co., of Farmingdale, Long Island. The number at this base will be more than quadrupled within the next few days.

A joint effort by the Air Force and the Navy brought the first Thunderjets to Korea. The planes in this new task group are from the Twenty-seventh Fighter Escort Wing, based at Bergstrom Field, near Austin, Tex. The wing, part of the Strategic Air Command, is commanded by Col. Ashley B. Packard, of Douglas, Ariz.

Colonel Packard received orders to proceed to Korea almost exactly 1 month ago. His pilots flew their planes to San Diego and they were loaded on fast Navy aircraft carriers which immediately started across the Pacific at forced draft. The pilots and ground crews were ferried to Japan by the Military Air Transport Service.

Preparation of the Thunderjets for action was begun as soon as they arrived on December 5. The first Thunderjets were flown from Japan to this Korean base, from which present operations are being conducted, and they have been over the enemy lines on test flights since the day they first arrived.

The Twenty-seventh Fighter Escort Wing officially has been made a part of the armed forces of the State of Texas, and the Lone Star flag flies at all flagpoles at this base, together with the Stars and Stripes and the blue banner of the UN. High-heeled Texan cattlemen's boots are much in evidence among the group's "jet jockeys."

These men include veterans of the American Eagle Squadron of the Royal Air Force that fought during the Battle of Britain and of the Royal Canadian Air Force which at one period before America's entry into World War II had more Texans in its ranks than did the United States Air Force. Almost all the crack Air Force units from both the European and Pacific theaters of World War II are represented.

Foreign Policy of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 14 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a letter I have received from Arlo I. Pierce, commander of Emerson-Hovey Post, No. 168, Veterans of Foreign Wars, of Portsmouth, N. H., enclosing a communication of the post to President Truman. I ask that the communication to the President also be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communications were ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

EMERSON-HOVEY POST, No. 168,
VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS,
Portsmouth, N. H., December 8, 1950.
Hon. CHARLES W. TOBEY,
United States Senate Office Building, Washington 25, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR TOBEY: We, the members of the Emerson-Hovey Post, No. 168, VFW, in meeting duly assembled, take cognizance of a motion of a brother post, Concord Post, No. 1631, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and by motion of our local post endorse wholeheartedly the action of the Concord Post, and wish our chosen representatives in the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives made aware of our sentiments. Enclosed is a copy of the Concord Post's letter to President Truman which expresses our sentiments.

We request that the chairmen of the Foreign Relations Committees in the United States House of Representatives and the United States Senate, and the chairmen of the Armed Services Committees of the United States House of Representatives and the United States Senate, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff of the Armed Forces be advised of our sentiments.

We shall be very grateful for your personal acknowledgment of this letter.

Respectfully yours,

ARLO I. PIERCE,
Commander.

"HARRY S. TRUMAN,
The President of the United States of America, The White House, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We, the members of Concord Post, No. 1631, VFW, in meeting duly assembled, take notice of the following facts and wish you to know how we and millions of others feel about current world problems.

"1. We recognize our duty to God and country.

"2. We realize we are living in trying times.

"3. We love peace and we know we are not enjoying it.

"4. We know our duty to our fighting men.

"5. We do not want one American, or friendly person, needlessly sacrificed.

"6. We trust you realize 'friendly person' does not include those who might only qualify under technical and diplomatic terminology.

"7. We do not like the expression 'anything short of war.'

"8. We have all served our country in foreign areas in the past, and would, if necessary, do it again.

"9. We remember efforts at appeasement, compromise, and expediency, and we dislike them all. To compromise with evil is evil.

"10. We feel we have been lulled into complacency, and we don't like it.

"11. We hate to see Uncle Sam taking so much nonsense from 'Uncle Joe.'

"12. We still believe 'fear itself is the only thing to fear.'

"13. We still like the expression 'liberty or death.'

"14. We believe our leaders in the field must have and deserve our complete support.

"15. We believe a 1-week tour of duty for our diplomats, bearing arms in a front-line assignment with orders to hold their fire, would be impressive.

"16. We know no peaceful nation will ever willingly say they desire or are ready for war.

"17. We know many weak nations fear the bully when they consider facing him alone.

"18. We believe every nation that dislikes 'Uncle Joe's' tactics is worthy of our friendship.

"19. We feel a lot of weak nations will survive if they have the will to live.

"20. We have helped a number of nations with their problems and we do not believe that the party helped should dictate our policy.

"21. We cannot conceive of cooperation as a unilateral affair.

"22. We place a high value on our American ideals and human life, but such values should not be permitted to encourage a real or potential enemy.

"23. We know it would be naive to believe 'Uncle Joe' was not calling the shots in every troubled area.

"24. We realize that the Russian Government hates God and the United States of America.

"25. We know we intend to keep what we have, and we are not looking for anything except honorable peace in the world.

"26. We know 'Uncle Joe' wants every material thing we possess.

"27. We know 'Uncle Joe' will take what he wants when he is ready to do so.

"28. We think 'Uncle Joe' hasn't mentioned all of his problems.

"29. We know 'Uncle Joe' hates the truth and will seldom be guilty of using it.

"30. We believe a threatened punch in the nose is the only language a 'bully' respects or understands, and then only if he feels it might be delivered.

"31. We do believe the A-bomb is a valuable possession.

"32. We believe 'Uncle Joe' shares our opinion but not our stockpile.

"33. We feel 'Uncle Joe' knows we have his address.

"34. We would convince 'Uncle Joe' we like action rather than words.

"35. We think it foolish to lead 'Uncle Joe' or his hirelings to believe we would not make tactical use of the bomb.

"36. We believe 'Peace on earth and good will to men' might be attainable if 'Uncle Joe' were told we can and might postmark objects in our possession for delivery in Russia.

"37. We dislike being sold 'down river' in an exchange of pretty words while the 'guts' of men are being exposed in Korea.

"38. We consider 'honey' and 'sugar coating' and 'salve' and platitude are poor taste.

"39. We believe 'guts' on the home front are as becoming to character as they are to those risking their all in combat.

"40. We request a display of 'guts' on the part of our policy makers that will convince our fighting men that they do not fight in vain.

"41. We pray God will send courage and wisdom to our leaders regardless of party labels.

"(This communication to President Truman sent by telegram December 4, 1950.)"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR V. WATKINS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 14 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, as one of the sponsors of the resolution referred to in an editorial published in the Washington Daily News on December 7, 1950, I am gratified to note the editorial support of the resolution. I ask unanimous consent that the Washington Daily News editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE PEOPLE'S VOICE

A resolution introduced by 20 Republican Senators cautions President Truman to undertake no commitments with Britain, which are not subject to Senate review in treaty form. This is a proper assertion of the Senate's right to a voice in the conduct of foreign relations.

During World War II President Roosevelt drifted into the bad habit of negotiating with other governments on a personal basis in a manner certainly never contemplated by the Constitution. He not only neglected to seek the "advice and consent" of the Senate, but he also often bypassed his own State Department as well.

The agreements made at Cairo, Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam included political commitments which were in no sense essential to conduct of the war and were clear evasions of the Senate's right to share the treaty-making power with the President.

This secret diplomacy has continued to operate since the war, to the practical exclusion of Congress, particularly in the Far East.

We may be dealing with a question of life or death and in a representative democracy the people have a right to know what is going on. Then, if they are not satisfied with the measures being taken, they can suggest alternatives.

If the President expects to have public confidence, he must take the people into his confidence and conduct our international relations in the manner provided by the supreme law of the land.

Destroy Human Ambitions and the Incentive To Produce, and You Destroy America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the Eighty-second Congress is already behind the eight ball. I do not believe that at any time previous during the last 75 years has a new Congress faced a public with any more questions in its public mind than does the Eighty-second Congress. Unless the tide is changed; unless the course which we have been traveling is changed; unless the administration and the Congress obtains a better grasp of the affairs of this country, I shall not be at all surprised to see one of the greatest political revolutions—and by this I mean a revolt at the voting booth—ever seen in this country in the 1952 election. Personally, I am more interested in having this form of government of ours and the liberty of our citizens and the institutions we have constructed preserved, than I am to see a great political revolution. Mr. E. F. Hutton, of New York City, has issued a timely and constructive statement which I now submit for the Appendix of the RECORD. Mr. Hutton addressed his remarks to the Eighty-second Congress. Mr. Hutton's address follows:

Gentlemen, I have been watching the passing show without bitterness, but with a keen sense of apprehension and sadness—the trend to socialism. I have read and listened to many Government professors—expert economists, intellectualists—in language and written statements—far afield from our way of life and constitutional law, far afield from that which God gave to our Republic, which is truly the fruits of the inventive, venturous, and valorous minds of productive men.

This country was sired, conceived, and birthed as a republic, not as a democracy. He created man for His purposes—to be free and to be of service to his fellow man. God created man for the purpose of the political state, says socialism—which means, "I am their goods and chattel. You, the state, are all there is."

Socialism is the outstanding issue of the day. You, men of the House and Senate, elected to administer our laws, should explain just what it will do to our citizens and not for them. One's judgment is no better than his information.

Would you, gentlemen, like to be socialized—become hired hands of Government, and your rights, as lawmakers, destroyed? Such would be the fate of our institute of medicine, including dentists.

Let it never be said that our Eighty-second Congress surrendered its prerogative—"the right to be right"—to any other branch of Government. Power usurped is never voluntarily reinstated.

Thomas Jefferson had the vision to anticipate what could happen. Read the words:

"A single step taken beyond the boundaries specifically drawn around the powers of Congress is to take possession of a boundless field of power, no longer susceptible to any definition."

The laws of the United States are the framework of your duties. These laws are made by the legislative branch, enforced and carried out by the executive branch, inspected and interpreted by the judiciary branch. That is how it should be, according to our Constitution and Bill of Rights.

Reviewing the past, it would seem that "all men are not angels," including those outside of Government. The greed for dollars has eclipsed the mighty spiritual value of God. It is well we think and revalue life as it is today.

In my book, there are, in the House and Senate, a host of men of integrity—both Democrats and Republicans—worthy of the name, and well fitted to administer our way of life, based upon constitutional law, who believe in Government by law, not by decree, who believe in the reclamation by the Congress of the powers constitutionally vested in the Congress, and who are against administrative bureaucracy, directives, and decrees—quasi judiciary—which is attempting to become the ultimate lawgiver.

You, gentlemen, of the House and Senate—Republicans and Democrats—realize that all freedoms, material and spiritual, reside within our Constitution and Bill of Rights. This priceless possession should not be in the hands of any executive, administrator, committee, bureau or department, whether under a Republican or Democratic administration.

Our American risk capital system made possible the growth and the wealth of this Nation, composed of all kinds of business activities. Our young Nation of free people filed intention of going into business with the Declaration of Independence. Our corporate charter is the Constitution and Bill of Rights. Its basic products are liberty and freedom for all people. So the tally board of assets and liabilities in our own history must be proof of the wisdom of freedom—our way of life.

Why change our form of government to a mandate to socialize America—which means political control by bureaucracy of our business activities. To socialize industry, is to cripple industry in order to expand socialism.

Surely you gentlemen fully realize the incentive to produce made possible the system that produces more and more goods, at less and less cost, so that more and more people can buy them. That's America. Destroy human ambitions and the incentive to produce, and you destroy America. That is a simple truth and one cannot, by calculus, trigonometry or algebra, prove otherwise. The incentive for free production by free people is so vital that if destroyed America is finished.

The answer is in the hands of the Senate and House—you, gentlemen, who are the guardians, trustees, and administrators of the future destiny of America, under constitutional law. Keep the people free, and we will produce as free people, fight as free people—rather than as vassals of the state. Protect any further whittling away of the charter of freedom, according to your sworn oath of office.

"I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me, God."
